Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit some figures furnished me by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, showing the number of railroads who have borrowed money from that Corporation and the amounts secured, also the purposes for which the loans were granted. Since the credit of the Federal Government is behind the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, I think the taxpayers will be interested in this information.

One hundred and nineteen loans aggregating $377,639,426 were authorized to 65 railroads. Two million three hundred and eighty-three thousand three hundred and thirty-two dollars of this had been canceled or withdrawn, $17,421,336.47 remained at the disposal of borrowers, and $357,684,757.53 had been disbursed to them, of which $20,523,340.60 had been repaid.

The proceeds of these loans were to be used for the following purposes:

For completion of new construction	$48,545,483
For construction and repair of equipment and Dotsero Cutoff by Denver & Rio Grande Western Railroad	13,550,000
To pay interest on funded debt	91,507,981
To pay taxes	22,849,124
To pay past due vouchers for wages, materials, etc	20,173,009
To pay principal of maturing equipment trust notes	28,861,342
To retire maturing bonds and other funded obligations	92,849,993
To pay loans from banks	37,793,900
To pay other loans	16,171,587
Miscellaneous	5,387,007

The loans authorized to each railroad, together with the amount disbursed to and repaid by each, are shown in the following table:

	Authorized	Disbursed	Repaid

Federal income taxes amounting to $25,994 were also paid by the borrowers out of money advanced for tax purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. The purposes of this title are (1) to encourage and promote or require action on the part of the carriers which will (a) avoid unnecessary duplication of services and facilities of whatsoever nature and permit the joint use of terminals and trackage incident thereto or requisite to such joint use, (b) control allowances, accessorial services and the charges therefor, and other practices affecting service or operation, to the end that undue impairment of net earnings may be prevented, and (c) avoid other wastes and preventable expense; (2) to promote financial reorganization of the carriers, with due regard to legal rights, so as to reduce fixed charges to the extent required by the public interest and improve carrier credit; and (3) to provide for the immediate study of other means of improving conditions surrounding transportation in all its forms and the preparation of plans therefor.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 4, strike out the word "and" immediately preceding "(c)" and insert in the next line, between the word "expense" and the semicolon, a comma and the following: "or (d) results in the greatest reduction in freight and passenger rates consistent with the requirements of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended by section 205 in this act, with respect to justness and reasonableness of rates."

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I understand the meaning of this section to be that it is an effort on the part of this committee—and I want to congratulate them for their splendid work in connection with the legislation—to enable the railroads to perform the greatest public service possible at the least cost and realize the greatest net return on their operation.

To my mind—and I think most Members of the House who have studied the question will agree with me—the most difficult thing the railroads have to contend with in the matter of income and earnings is the question of freight and passenger rates.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New York. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, it will absolutely preclude the coordinator from considering service.

Mr. MAY. Oh, no.

Mr. PARKER of New York. It will; and service is fully of as much account and importance as rates. There is no question in my mind that he can pay no attention at all to service.

Mr. MAY. I will say to my friend from New York [Mr. PARKER] that to my mind there is grave question as to whether the Interstate Commerce Commission has not been a detriment rather than a help to the railroads, and particularly by their arbitrary action for the last 20 years. They have literally handcuffed the railroads to a schedule of rates that makes it impossible for the shippers to patronize the roads and thereby they have helped to destroy traffic rather than create and increase traffic. The law of legitimate competition under fair traffic practices has been destroyed and the very principle of competitive activity is what has developed our great system of railway transportation until it is the finest and best in the world. If the Commission were forced to release the shackles, they could then have some reasonable chance to compete with busses and trucks that run by multiplied thousands upon great Federal highways thousands of miles of which we are building every year.

The amendment will enable the coordinator, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to do the very thing that this bill does not authorize him to do, namely, to regulate downward freight and passenger rates in this country which has not been done for 20 years. Of course, I realize that it may be argued here by the committee, if they oppose my amendment, which I think they ought not to do, that there are hearings pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission for that purpose now; but I undertake to say that some 2 months ago the Commission granted the privilege, as a test—and this is merely experimental legislation—to three southern railroads of reducing passenger rates for 6 months. The result of that is that they have increased their revenues, have had more traffic, and have improved the service. That will be the result of any scheme that the coordinator or the Commission may undertake under this legislation in authorizing a reduction in freight and passenger rates.

We talk about tariffs in the House of Representatives, and we condemn the Smoot-Hawley tariff and the Hoover-Grundy Tariff Acts, and I think they ought to be condemned, but the meanest tariff in the United States is the schedule of freight and passenger rates on railroads, and everybody knows it. The only purpose of my amendment is to authorize the Commission by express legislative mandate to lower these freight rates, if it becomes necessary to do so, and when you come to consolidating terminals and the facilities of railroads in the great terminals of the country it may become absolutely necessary, and I believe it will, that one railroad shall concede to another a portion of its rate or make some adjustment of rates, and under the present legislation they will have no power to do that, unless this amendment be adopted.

Mr. DUNN. Is this mandatory?

Mr. MAY. This is merely permissive. It expresses the will of Congress, to show that we want a reduction in rates. The press a few days ago charged me with having feelings about the matter. I have no feeling about it at all. I want to help the railroads, and I believe the greatest step toward helping them is to give them a reduction in freight rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. I call attention to one schedule of freight rates particularly applicable to my section of the country, and I hope you will not think that I am hammering away particularly for my constituents in this, but what is true of rates on coal from southern fields to the lake ports is true of rates on oranges from Florida and fruits and vegetables from Texas and on steel and iron products from East to West. It is true everywhere.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Not now. I put in the RECORD, on page 3908, on the 11th day of last February, a table furnished by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the present rates on bituminous coal in carload lots from the southern fields to the lake ports. In that table it is shown that the rate from Kentucky and West Virginia and Virginia to the lake ports, to Toledo, Ohio, is $2.37 per ton. One Mallet engine will pull 150 cars of coal that will average 50 tons to the car, and some of them will average 70 tons to the car, and that means 8,000 tons of coal that will amount to $20,000, and two train crews will do that in 15 hours. Yet the three railroads—the L. & N., the Norfolk & Western, and the C. & O.—were denied permission to reduce these rates when they applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission for that right. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GOSS. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, it has the effect of upsetting the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Lake Cargo Coal case. Is not that true?

Mr. MAY. No.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman is legislating on the floor to upset a decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MAY. It does not have the effect of upsetting the decision, because this is merely a legislative enactment; but I will say that the decision ought to be upset. Who ever heard of a case where the shipper, the carrier, and the consumers were all demanding a reduction and then it was refused?

Mr. GOSS. That is the point. The Commission made its decision, and now the gentleman comes on the floor with an amendment trying to upset their decision.

Mr. MAY. Such a judicial monstrosity ought to be upset. Probably a judicial perversion would be a more appropriate name.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. If this is a legislative act, we do upset that decision; but I ask the gentleman if it will not be upsetting a decision in favor of the people back in his State and in the States of a great many other gentlemen here?

Mr. MAY. It will not only be that, but it will be in favor of the people of every section of this country and will set a precedent as to what the Congress of the United States means and what it wants on the question of freight and passenger rates. Freight and passenger rates are throttling business in every section of this country and every avenue of business. Freight rates have become so prohibitive that a carload of coal in my section of the country sells for $10, and yet it costs $180 to get it to the market. If that is not an obstruction to commerce, I do not know what it is. That is what we call "killing the goose that lays the golden egg." Everyone knows how essential it is that the value of railroad securities shall be preserved in order not only that the railroads may finance themselves but that investors in their stocks and bonds may be protected. The railroads are as essential to our business and commercial life as is the blood to the human system. When either is obstructed paralysis sets in, and that is just what has occurred to both business and commerce.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I told the House yesterday that I thought freight and passenger rates were both excessive, but surely upon the floor of the House is not the place to fix rates.

I call attention to page 53, section 205, paragraph 2, which I think entirely answers the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY]. That leaves with the Interstate Commerce Commission, as it is now, the question of fixing rates. If the gentleman is displeased with leaving the fixing of these rates with 11 men, after a hearing, surely he does not want to take it away from 11 men and give it to 1 man who is a temporary employee of the Government.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Section 15a of section 205 is an amendment, in a way, of the Interstate Commerce Act as it now exists?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. It merely provides that when used in this section the term "rates" means rates, fares, charges, and all classifications, regulations, and practices relating thereto.

Mr. GOSS. Read the next section.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. Read the next one, section 2. I will read it in my own time.

In the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates, the Commission shall give due consideration, among other factors, to the effect of rates on the movement of traffic; to the need, in the public interest, of adequate and efficient railway transportation service at the lowest cost consistent with the furnishing of such service.

I think that is a complete answer.

Mr. MAY. If the gentleman will yield, may I explain my purpose by saying that this bill as reported is the substitute bill of the House for the Senate bill, and at the time I prepared my amendment I had only the original draft of the bill that I do not think contained this clause.

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, title II of this bill has been on the calendar during all of last session of Congress and the early part of this session of Congress.

Mr. MAY. I asked the legislative counsel to prepare this amendment, and it was prepared at this place.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman was looking at the coordinator bill, I presume.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Even if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] were adopted, it throws the decision right back to the Interstate Commerce Commission, because there would be appeals taken immediately.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COX: After the comma, following the word "use", in line 22, on page 33, add the following: "provided no routes now existing shall be eliminated except with the consent of all participating lines or upon order of the coordinator."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the bill as it passed the Senate carried this language. It was written in, in the interest of the short-line railroads of the country. You understand that these roads now enjoy the benefits of arrangements made as a result of agreements between the short-line roads, and in some instances upon the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the established routes are interrupted, it will probably mean putting out of business altogether many of the short-line railroads in the country.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. COX. In just a minute. The short-line railroad is a community interest, employing largely people of the vicinity, and are able to carry on because of these arrangements that have been made between them.

This simply serves as a restraint upon the regional committee in dealing with the short-line roads. It does not mean that they may defeat the will of the coordinator. It simply means that the committee cannot, of its own motion in the absence of an agreement between the short-line roads, abolish these routes that have been established. The coordinator may even, in the absence of agreement between the roads, order the routes abolished. In other words, it gives the coordinator the power to determine as to what shall be done.

I offer the amendment, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of the short-line roads. It was carried in the Senate bill and was written in for the express purpose of taking care of these neighborhood properties.

I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY].

Mr. MAY. Is not one of the important features of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, the fact that it will stamp out and eliminate numerous small industries in the communities along the short lines, if the short lines are abandoned?

Mr. COX. That is true. The short-line roads serve these community enterprises, and if they are wiped out as a result of the action of the committee, under the influence of the big roads, it simply means a paralysis of the small industries that have been built up along and are served by the short-line roads of the country.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the committee considered this amendment, considered it with Mr. Eastman, a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, sitting with us. He thought it was an undesirable amendment.

More than that, a representative of the short-line railroads was in my office this morning and told me that the bill we had reported to the House was entirely satisfactory to them. At the present time the shipper has a right to route his freight as he pleases, and he will have it after this bill is passed. The coordinator has no authority under this bill to abandon a line. That is the business of the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the act of 1920, and this does not change it.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. COX. The gentleman observed the language in the amendment that has been offered, which gives the coordinator the power to work his will upon the situation? In other words, the amendment provides——

Mr. RAYBURN. It says "on agreement of the parties or"——

Mr. COX. "Or upon the order of the coordinator." Therefore the coordinator controls in the situation.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think the word "or" makes a difference.

As I say, the committee rather thinks it would be a dangerous proposition, and I do not think the Senate committee adopted it. I think it was one of those amendments which was accepted on the floor of the Senate.

I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. It shall be the duty of the committees on their own initiative, severally within each group and jointly where more than one group is affected, to carry out the purposes set forth in subdivision (1) of section 4, so far as such action can be voluntarily accomplished by the carriers. In such instances as the committees are unable, for any reason, legal or otherwise, to carry out such purposes by such voluntary action, they shall recommend to the coordinator that he give appropriate directions to the carriers by order; and the coordinator is hereby authorized and directed to issue and enforce such orders if he finds them to be consistent with the public interest and in furtherance of the purposes of this title.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BECK: On page 34, line 17, strike out lines 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21 and insert the following: "he consider the matter in dispute and advise such carriers and committees as to his conclusions as to what should be done by the carriers in the matter in controversy to serve the public interests and promote the objectives set forth in section 4."

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment upon my own responsibility and without discussing the matter with anyone until within the last half hour. I have offered it for the purpose of challenging the attention of the Committee to the power herein given to the coordinator to "enforce" any order whatsoever in respect to the railroads, even though the subject matter of the order may refer solely to intrastate commerce, or to the financial set-up of an organization, or the reduction of its fixed charges, or the further employment or discharge of employees.

There seems to be a difference between two members of the very capable Committee on Interstate Commerce, of which I had at one time the honor, and was very proud, to be a member, as to what is the meaning of the words "that the coordinator shall enforce."

On the one hand, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] yesterday said that the coordinator would have no power to enforce any order except insofar as the prestige of his high office would insure a moral pressure upon the carriers to agree to whatever the coordinator might decide.

Upon the other hand, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] only half an hour ago emphasized the idea that the expression "enforce" had considerable teeth, because, possibly having it in mind, he said what I fear may be true, namely, that this coordinator will have greater powers than had ever before been vested in any public official in the whole history of our country. I do not pretend to quote his language exactly, but that was the substance of it.

In this connection I differ with him, because I think the coordinator will have two very close rivals in dictatorial powers, one the director under the economic recovery bill and the other the Secretary of Agriculture in respect of agriculture; but, certainly, the dictator of agriculture, on the one hand, and the dictator of the manufacturing industries, on the other, and now the dictator of the railroads, will, like Pompey, Crassus, and Caesar, divide the entire industrial field of America between them and exercise dictatorial powers not unlike the great triumvirate of ancient Rome.

The purpose of my amendment is simply this: I recognize that this bill is in many respects, an admirable bill, but I do think it is a mistake, following the prevailing fashion of creating dictators, to say that the coordinator over the carriers shall have the final decision and power of enforcement as to any matter, as to whether, for example, the carriers shall take on or discharge employees, whether they shall reorganize a railroad or whether they shall reduce the bonded indebtedenss of a railroad. I say in any of these matters, if the carriers do not agree with the coordinator, to make him a dictator, not only decide the question in controversy but to enforce it. This, to my mind, is very doubtful wisdom. I am too old in years and too old-fashioned in my conceptions of government to favor the creation of such dictators.

Mr. TERRELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. BECK. I yield.

Mr. TERRELL. Does the gentleman feel that Congress, under the Constitution, can confer power upon this coordinator so affecting the rights of the individuals who own the railroads, that he may say that their property shall be destroyed in accordance with his dictation?

Mr. BECK. In reply to the gentleman from Texas, I think Congress has no such power, and I think that the first time the coordinator attempts to enforce a matter that is not within the scope of interstate commerce, he will find that the courts will say so, unless they have wholly lost courage. But I told the House some days ago that, having made one final plea for the sanctity of the Constitution, I was disposed in future to regard that as my "swan song" and, therefore, I do not base my objection upon constitutional grounds.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECK. I believe the coordinator ought to decide emergency questions that may arise in the present critical situation between the carriers whether they affect interstate or domestic commerce. I would, however, place the sanction of his decision upon the force of public opinion, because, if in this trying period of time the coordinator says that two carriers who differ between themselves as to what is necessary in the public interests, then the force of public opinion, together with the great coercive power of the Interstate Commerce Commission in respect to interstate railroads, will insure the enforcement of what the coordinator requests. But you give him in this bill the power to enforce. How? How is he going to enforce? If a railroad is ordered by the coordinator to discharge a thousand employees and the railroad declines to do so, can the coordinator walk into the railroad offices and strike the thousand men from the rolls of the company? If a carrier declines to reduce his fixed charges, can the coordinator go in and strike a pen through the mortgage and cancel or reduce the bonds to the particular amount that is required?

You are giving a single individual absolute power over every detail of railroad management and you are attempting to give him some vague power to enforce. How? If he goes into court, what is the court to decide? The court can only say that Congress made him the final judge of what the railroads should do in a matter that is nonpracticable.

Mr. HUDDLESTON rose.

Mr. BECK. I know what the gentleman is going to ask. See if I do not anticipate his question. The gentleman is going to ask whether there is not an appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I shall refer to that. That is true, but they are not a body of lawyers; they are not judges. As a matter of fact, and I have said it before, and I say it again, that it is a very debatable question whether the Interstate Commerce Commission has not done far more harm to the railroads than it has done good in its operations of 45 years.

But, be that as it may, nevertheless, will you trust to one man or to the whole Commission all the details of railroad management, some of which are beyond the field of Federal power, as my friend from Texas [Mr. TERRELL] called to the attention of the House in his inquiry a few minutes ago?

I do hope the Members will pause in giving such power to any man, however able; and the proposed coordinator, Mr. Eastman, is a very able man, a very high-minded man, and I am sure has nothing but the interests of the country at heart, which I acknowledge, but he is a very positive and aggressive man and a firm believer in the Government ownership of railroads; and when he sits as the dictator of the railroad destinies of this country, you may find a situation in which this last creation of dictatorial power in this emergency legislation will bring to the country the folly of it all, because there is no excuse, even in this emergency, to set up in a Nation that is supposed to have a "government of laws and not of men" the arbitrary rule of dictators. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the question that must be determined is whether or not you are going to have a coordinator, and the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] goes to the very heart of the matter. If you are going to have a coordinator in this emergency—and it seems that the shippers, the railroad owners, and, with the amendments in this bill, labor, are willing to have a coordinator—in section 4 of this bill is set out what this man is going to try to accomplish: "The purposes of this title are (1) to encourage and promote or require action on the part of the carriers" that will do certain things. Before this coordinator does anything to bring this about he cooperates with the committees named by the carriers, and I think in 90 percent of the cases they will come to an agreement. In some cases they will not be able to come to an agreement, and in that instance the coordinator is given the power to act, like the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power under the interstate commerce law to act now, and the bill gives this single individual an opportunity to do these things, if we want them done. If the House or the Committee determines it does not want a coordinator, that is one thing. I am not so keen for it myself. [Laughter.] But if you are going to have a coordinator, if you are going through with this gesture, in my opinion, then you will certainly get a mere gesture and nothing else, if you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. However, if you are going to have a coordinator with power to do something in this emergency that will relieve the situation, you have got to give him the power to act and the power to put into effect orders and to enforce such orders in a legal way.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. COX. What is the coordinator expected to do that holds promise of relief to the general public? That is what I want to know.

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, I think the public is not injured by this legislation. I think under the advice of the coordinator, in all probability, there will be some things done in transportation that ought to have been done years ago, and on his advice something will be done. Certainly, I believe the coordinator, with his advice and with his standing is going to be able to bring about some economies, will stop some waste, and in some degree, at least, will point the way to the time when the 100,000,000 people of the country may receive some benefit from it.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BECK. Let us view the thing concretely and suppose the regional committee is of opinion that the New York Central ought to absorb the Pennsylvania Railroad system and the coordinator reaches the conclusion that this is true. In the first place, is it a healthy power to allow one man——

Mr. RAYBURN. He does not have any such power, I will say to the gentleman. The coordinator has no power whatsoever over consolidations. That is left in the Interstate Commerce Commission where it has been since 1920.

Mr. BECK. I know my candid and always clear friend, if he reads this section in connection with the preceding section, will see that there is nothing that affects railroad management as to which the coordinator may not make an order and enforce it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I will say to the gentleman, that has been discussed by us and we intend to say in this bill, and do say, I am persuaded, as I said in my statement in explanation of it yesterday, that the coordinator has nothing to do with the consolidation of railroads and I do not think there is anything in the act that would specifically give him that authority. We do not intend it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. There is nothing of a permanent nature the coordinator can do whatsoever. This whole act discharges itself and ends at the end of 2 years by its very terms and nothing that can be done will extend beyond that period. Hence no dealing with corporate structure is possible under it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. (a) A labor committee for each regional group of carriers may be selected by those railroad labor organizations which, as representatives duly designated and authorized to act in accordance with the requirements of the Railway Labor Act, entered into the agreements of January 31, 1932, and December 21, 1932, with duly authorized representatives of the carriers, determining the wage payments of the employees of the carriers. A similar labor committee for each regional group of carriers may be selected by such other railroad labor organizations as may be duly designated and authorized to represent employees in accordance with the requirements of the Railway Labor Act. It shall be the duty of the regional coordinating committees and the coordinator to give reasonable notice to, and to confer with, the appropriate regional labor committee or committees upon the subject matter prior to taking any action or issuing any order which will affect the interest of the employees, and to afford the said labor committee or committees reasonable opportunity to present views upon said contemplated action or order.

(b) The number of employees in the service of a carrier shall not be reduced by reason of any action taken pursuant to the authority of this title below the number as shown by the pay rolls of employees in service during the month of May 1933, after deducting the number who have been removed from the pay rolls after the effective date of this act by reason of death, normal retirements, or resignation, but not more in any one year than 5 percent of said number in service during May 1933; nor shall any employee in such service be deprived of employment such as he had during said month of May or be in a worse position with respect to his compensation for such employment, by reason of any action taken pursuant to the authority conferred by this title.

(c) The coordinator is authorized and directed to establish regional boards of adjustment whenever and wherever action taken pursuant to the authority conferred by this title creates conditions that make necessary such boards of adjustment to settle controversies between carriers and employees. Carriers and their employees shall have equal representation on such boards of adjustment for settlement of such controversies, and said boards shall exercise the functions of boards of adjustment provided for by the Railway Labor Act.

(d) The coordinator is authorized and directed to provide means for determining the amount of, and to require the carriers to make just compensation for, property losses and expenses imposed upon employees by reason of transfers of work from one locality to another in carrying out the purposes of this title.

(e) Carriers, whether under control of a judge, trustee, receiver, or private management, shall be required to comply with the provisions of the Railway Labor Act and with the provisions of section 77, paragraphs (o), (p), and (q), of the act approved March 3, 1933, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States', approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto."

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 7, page 37, beginning with the word "after" in line 3, strike out down to and including the figures "1933" in line 7.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman and Members, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this morning, the Economy Act got its face lifted yesterday over at the other end of the Capitol and came very near getting another portion of its anatomy lifted.

The operation, in my judgment, greatly improved its appearance, making it look almost human. I hope when the bill comes back to the House it will be treated as was the inflation amendment on the farm bill, the conferees being relieved by vote of the House of the responsibility of deciding what they are going to do about the Senate amendment to the Economy Act.

This bill also got its face lifted at the other end of the Capitol in an important respect, and that amendment has been incorporated in the House bill by the Interstate Commerce Committee. I hope with the aid of the operation of my amendment it will remain there. That is what is known as the "amendment to freeze labor", to prevent the wholesale discharge of employees when the act goes into operation.

From the reports drifting into Washington from all over the country it strikes me that the economy nose dive has about reached bottom. I think that spirit of optimism ought to be reflected in the labors of this Congress, and so far as I am concerned, I am willing to respond to it by voting to repeal the recapture clause of the Railroad Transportation Act of 1920, which required the railroad companies of the country to pay over to the Government some $250,000,000 that they never have paid. But in exchange for that largess I think the railroad companies ought to lay off the idea that they are going to obtain remuneration for their extravagant waste in railway management at the expense of the railway employees of the country.

The Senate amendment I refer to is in the House bill. It is paragraph (b) of section 7 (a) and is a very short paragraph. It only took one semicolon to divide it into two parts. I am going to show you that it is susceptible of being divided into three parts, and one of these parts is very objectionable and may serve to throw the interpretation and operation of the whole paragraph in doubt.

Section (b) provides that—

The number of employees in the service of a carrier shall not be reduced by reason of any action taken pursuant to the authority of this title below the number as shown by the pay rolls of employees in service during the month of May 1933.

That is a very clear proposition.

The last provision, after the semicolon, is equally clear. That reads as follows:

Nor shall any employee in such service be deprived of employment such as he had during said month of May or be in a worse position with respect to his compensation for such employment by reason of any action taken pursuant to the authority conferred by this title.

Somebody may say at this juncture, what are you kicking about, with two such plain propositions in the bill; but this is the thing which, in my judgment, may throw this whole matter into confusion and cause the Members of this House no end of worry and concern after the Congress adjourns if it is left in the labor provision. In the first paragraph it is provided, as I have stated, that the number shall not be reduced below the number shown by the pay rolls as employed in May 1933, and then continues:

After deducting the number who have been removed from the pay rolls after the effective date of this act by reason of death, normal retirements, or resignations, but not more in any one year than 5 percent of said number in service during May 1933.

It is said there are something over a million employees left on the railroads of the country at this time. Under that language they could cut 5 percent of those employees off as soon as the act got into operation. Not only that, but this is a continuing power, because it provides that they shall not cut more than 5 percent off "in any one year", and that would be an increasing percentage of the number left. If they ditch 50,000 or 60,000 the first year, you would not take 5 percent of what was left the next year, but you would always go back to the base period of May 1933 and cut off 5 percent more of the number of employees who were on the pay roll at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yesterday in general debate one gentleman on the floor was making an argument against this whole provision. He thought it ought to go out, and he said that this law will be administered by human beings, and they no doubt will have sympathy with the railway employees of the country, the men working on the railroads. The gentleman very courteously permitted me to interrupt him. I suggested to him that a lot of us here voted for the Economy Act with that understanding, but it did not seem to be working out that way. The gentleman agreed and said no, it did not, but he said it is commencing to diverge in that direction.

Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, I do not want any assurance of that kind, and I do not want any divergence in a direction; I want to arrive at the direction in this law. If we want to protect these railroad employees and prevent the railways of this country from discharging tens of thousands of them within 30 days after this Congress adjourns, let us nominate it in the bond; let us write it in the law. Gentlemen will remember the game we have been up against here until recently under the regulations of the Veterans' Economy Act about the threatened closing of hospitals and regional offices, and how, instead of being here attending to our duties on important legislation, we have been running in circles down around the War Department and the Veterans' Administration begging them not to cut off these regional offices and not to close these hospitals. We are confronted with the same proposition here, except that it is on a larger scale. Not only the railway employees will be concerned but all of your communities will be concerned in this legislation when they get ready to put into effect economies that will paralyze or wipe out or dry up little towns in your district and mine and cut employees out. You are going to have a continuing job on this bill after you get home. We have scared the veterans of this country to death, and we are backing up on that proposition. We have had time to learn something about it; we have had 3 months to see how the law would operate, and fortunately we have been here long enough to find out, and we are going to correct it. We were going to reorganize the Government by the act we passed 3 months ago, going to wipe out bureaus and consolidate departments and cut off thousands of employees. We are soft pedaling on the proposition now. We are now starting in to scare the railroad employees to death and put them up in the air, and we will not have any time to correct it if we make a mistake in this bill, because we will not have any 3 months before adjournment in which to learn about it and rectify it.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New York. The testimony before the committee showed that the natural decrease from death and retirement is 5 percent. That is why we put this in at 5 percent.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Then why put it in if 5 percent are going to die and retire or get fired in a year? Why put it in the law? Why put this continuing proposition in here of 5 percent for every year hereafter on the basis of the average in May 1933?

Mr. PARKER of New York. The bill runs for only 2 years.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. Do I understand the gentleman's idea is that after deducting the number who have been removed from the pay rolls, if his amendment prevails, they would have to put men on in their places?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. My idea is this. We have had to study this hastily, we never saw the bill until today. If my amendment prevails it will not authorize any deductions under the provisions of this act.

Mr. CONNERY. They will have to put other men to work?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has again expired.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. I want to make sure of a point, so that it does not go out to the country in a wrong light. I interpret this law to mean that the railroads can reduce their employees in any amount, regardless of the passage of this law. Is that true?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. They can do it.

Mr. GOSS. And they will be able to do it after the passage of this law, except where the coordinator orders it. Will the chairman of the committee answer that?

Mr. RAYBURN. As I understand the gentleman, if we do not pass this bill the railroads can discharge anybody they please?

Mr. GOSS. Yes. So that they can discharge them in either event.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. When they start to do that they will have somebody else to argue with other than the coordinator.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. RAYBURN. Does the gentleman understand that this bill specifically provides that no act of the coordinator shall result in discharging anybody from employment? That is exactly what the bill provides. I want to say to the gentleman further that he may be a better representative of labor than the gentlemen who are paid here to represent them, and who in my association with they have shown themselves to be very able men, and they agree to this language.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes. I understand that railway labor agreed to this proposition as it reads now, because as was stated yesterday on the floor, this was the best proposition they could get; but, in my judgment, they can get a better proposition, and that is to cut out any ambiguous or doubtful language that is now in this bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Four of the heads of the internationals called to see me the other day and said they wanted this bill passed; that it protected their interests, and that without this bill a reduction of employees would occur. This is for their protection and not against it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And if I sat down with those four gentlemen this morning and went over this bill with them and pointed out some of these things, perhaps they would agree with me, too.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I say further that they were represented by one of the best lawyers in the United States, who drew this particular provision, Mr. Richberg. Does the gentleman think he is more competent to deal with this matter than the man I have named?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. No; I would not for a moment pit myself, legally or in any other way, against Mr. Richberg; but if you want to freeze railway labor and keep it where it is, you do not need that proposition in there. When you strike it out, you will have this bill absolutely clear and understandable. It is clearly a concession of some kind. It must be intended to subserve some purpose other than to relieve the railway companies of the necessity to replace employees who drop out in the natural order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] has again expired.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, in passing on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado there is one consideration which must not be overlooked. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] correctly stated that the representatives of all the railway labor organizations of the country approved section 7 of the bill exactly as it appears in the bill. He is correct in saying that Mr. Richberg was really the one who drafted the amendment. Section 7 was very fully discussed with the President of the United States and he approved it. Now, if we wish to make sure of the provisions contained in section 7 of the pending bill and which are so valuable to railway labor, if we wish to make sure that the bill including these provisions so valuable to labor receives the approval of the President, then it is the part of wisdom on the part of the friends of labor to accept the section as it appears in the bill. I think that we would be jeopardizing the interests of labor by disregarding the agreement reached by the President, the representatives of all the railway labor organizations, and others. Section 7 as it now stands and as agreed upon gives labor very broad protection. I want to make sure that the measure will be approved by the Chief Executive.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, after listening to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio and the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I dislike to oppose the committee on this amendment, but it seems to me that by passing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] we will put men back into the jobs of men who have retired or died. It does not seem to me it will do much harm to the bill or much harm to the railroads to put another man back in a job where a man has died.

Mr. CROSSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. CROSSER. I think the President felt we were going the very limit if we took the normal decrease in number due to death and resignations, in offering this freezing amendment.

Mr. CONNERY. I really do not see how it is going to do the railroads any harm, and this is putting men to work. Putting men to work is certainly a laudable ambition. When a man dies you should fill his place.

Mr. CROSSER. But that was the feeling of the President, I am sure, that we could not go much farther, safely, at this time.

Mr. CONNERY. I believe you are not going far enough. I am with the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] when he says that the labor representatives of the brotherhoods will naturally take what they can get, but if somebody offers an amendment on this floor that gives them a little more, I do not think they will object to that, and I do not think the amendment which the gentleman has offered will kill the bill with the President.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Is this bill satisfactory to organized labor?

Mr. CONNERY. I understand it is absolutely satisfactory to organized labor. I talked with the representatives of the brotherhoods, and they said it was satisfactory to them and that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] would probably offer amendments which they would favor.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman that when we pass this bill, railroad labor is in a much better position than it is today.

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, I agree with the gentleman, except that I see a chance with this amendment, offered by the gentleman from Colorado, to do even a little better for labor.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Is the gentleman not willing to leave it to their representatives?

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman knows as well as I do, when after Mr. Green of the American Federation of Labor has come before the Labor Committee and said, "I am for this bill", if on the floor of the House somebody offers an amendment which would be greatly beneficial to labor, that Mr. Green would not oppose it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Suppose the amendment were worse for the country?

Mr. CONNERY. No amendment that benefits labor can be bad for the country. It is not bad for the country to put another man to work when a man dies. It is good for the country.

Mr. RAYBURN. What if there is no money to pay it?

Mr. CONNERY. There is not much money involved there.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado would make possible the employment of 5 percent more men than if it were not adopted?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; it would. It would put men to work in the place of those who die or retire.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. Subsection (b) of section 7 says that the number of employees in the service of a carrier shall not be reduced by reason of the action taken pursuant to the authority of this title of the bill.

I still contend, if I can read the English language, that there is nothing in the operation of this title of the bill that will prevent a railroad from laying off its employees other than those coming under the authority of this title. I should like to get this point straightened out.

Mr. RAYBURN. There is not any question in the world.

Mr. GOSS. Is not that true?

Mr. RAYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GOSS. So, under this section they are going to be able to lay them off anyway.

Mr. CONNERY. It seems to me, then, after what the chairman has said, that if we have affirmative language in the bill telling the coordinator we do not want these men laid off, that we are doing something at least to help to remedy the present situation.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Of course, railroad labor is for this section?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think there is some danger of getting a bill so good for labor that it may be defeated?

Mr. CONNERY. No; I do not think so.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. The gentleman knows we had a good bill in our Labor Committee, but it was so good it did not come out.

Mr. CONNERY. I think the gentleman knows that our 30-hour week bill did not come before this House because we applied it to foreign imports; and if the gentleman will notice in today's paper, the Senate Finance Committee yesterday put in an amendment on the industrial recovery bill which will allow the President to put an embargo on foreign products, thereby showing we were correct in what we put in that bill.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. The railroad labor organizations are agreeable to this section. This is the reason I do not think we ought to disturb it, because if we disturb it, it might have the effect of defeating the legislation.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. The only suggestion I care to make to the gentleman from Massachusetts is that if we attempt to tamper with these sections which the railway labor organizations are agreeable to, I fear it will have the effect of endangering passage of the whole bill. This is the only objection I have.

Mr. CONNERY. I do not think it will have that effect on the bill. If I did I would not be for it.

I think we can amend it by adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado and still pass the bill.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. COX. Much has been said about protecting the interest of users of railway properties and protecting the interest of labor. Can the gentleman inform the Committee who, in the writing of this bill, represented the users of the services that the railroads render?

Mr. CONNERY. The Chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee can advise the gentleman more about that than I, but I figure that if we are going to repeal the recapture clause and make the railroads a present of some $300,000,000 or $400,000,000, it would be advisable——

Mr. RAYBURN. If I may interrupt the gentleman, we are not going to make the railroads a present of any such amount.

Mr. CONNERY. What is the effect of it, then?

Mr. RAYBURN. We are simply admitting that we cannot collect an impossible debt.

Mr. CONNERY. That is one way of putting it, but the railroads get the present just the same. Anyway we are taking away $400,000,000 from the disabled ex-service men of the United States. That is a debt the Government owed that the Government should not repudiate. I do not want to mix that issue up with this, but I do not see any harm to come from this amendment—I see a benefit to labor—and I shall vote for it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WILSON). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Colorado and Mr. O'MALLEY) there were—ayes 34, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COX: At the end of the section add the following: "Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to independently owned and operated steam or electric railroads, commonly called short lines, which had in 1932 railway operating revenues of less than $1,000,000."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, this is another amendment offered in the interest of short-line railroads of the country.

We know the short-line railroads are having their difficulties just the same as the large railroads. Under existing conditions it is almost impossible for them to keep going. We know that the short-line railroads serve largely agricultural communities. These communities now are unable to buy the services that the railroads render because of the high rates already in existence.

If you apply to the short-line railroads the provisions of section 7 of this bill, you will put them out of business altogether.

The business of the short-line roads is largely seasonal. It is the hauling of cotton, of grain, of vegetables and fruits, seasonal operations. During the busy seasons these short-line roads employ the people of the vicinity, of the neighborhood, and when the volume of business decreases, in order to keep going, they must let the seasonal labor go.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if you put upon these short-line roads all this Labor Committee machinery that is provided for in this bill and lay upon them the restrictions that will be imposed if this amendment is not adopted, it means that you eliminate them from the transportation business of the country.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment ought to be adopted and every Member of this House, if from agricultural sections and familiar with the conditions of agriculture and with the plight it is in, and has been in since 1923, and who is acquainted with the service the short lines render, the character of business it accommodates, the people who are the most interested in it, ought to vote for this amendment, because otherwise the short-line roads might as well fold their tents and cease striving.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

If we adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, we may just as well strike out the section altogether.

In the first place, the term "short-line railroad" is so indefinite that it may mean almost anything. If you are opposed to class legislation, then you should vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia. The amendment proposes to apply one principle, one rule to one class of railroads and another to a different class. The real effect of the amendment would be to prevent workmen from acting unitedly through freely chosen representatives in negotiating or arranging the terms and conditions of the employment of such workmen. After a long struggle the railway labor organizations secured legislation making it certain that labor may freely choose its own representatives to negotiate with their employers as to the terms and conditions of employment. This amendment would, to a great extent, interfere with the right to exercise that right.

Mr. COLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. COLE. The gentleman is familiar with the fact, but I call his attention to it so the committee may be advised. Mr. Jones, representing 71 percent of the American short-line railroads of the country, appeared before the committee and approved, in substance, this legislation.

Mr. CROSSER. Absolutely. Mr. Jones, representing 71 percent of what are called "short-line railroads", approved this bill.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. If the principle established in this bill is any good at all, it has to be applied universally in order to work it out.

Mr. CROSSER. It must be applied universally if it is to amount to anything at all.

Mr. O'MALLEY. If we have to make exceptions, the principle in the bill will be worth nothing at all.

Mr. CROSSER. That is quite true. I am very strongly in favor of this section. It makes certain that we shall have free and independent representation for employees as well as for employers to carry on negotiations for the settlement of terms of employment or the settlement of labor disputes.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. COX. Is the gentleman familiar with the operations of the short-line railroads of this country?

Mr. CROSSER. To some extent; yes. I am not a railroad man, but I have familiarized myself with them to some extent.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman know that if you were to impose these restrictions upon the roads, their operation costs would be so great they could not continue to go on?

Mr. CROSSER. I do not think so, and the best answer I can give is that Mr. Jones, the representative of the short lines, endorses the bill, and he ought to know what he is talking about.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Are not the short-line railroads today carrying this burden?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. COX. Oh, the gentleman must surely know that the short-line railroads have not entered into martial relationship with labor as the larger railroads have done, and as is being sanctioned in the main by the provisions of the pending bill.

Mr. CROSSER. This bill does not change the situation to any extent, and let me call attention to the fact that if any railroad is to receive a benefit from the repeal of the recapture clause as provided in the second title of the bill, it is the short lines. I do not feel, therefore, that the short lines have much to complain about. We must maintain the principle in general or it will be more or less meaningless. If we believe in the principle of negotiating collectively, let us vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia. Let us make it absolutely certain that men may group themselves together and freely choose representatives for the purpose of negotiating decent terms and conditions of employment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina: Page 37, line 22, strike out subsection (d) in its entirety.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I should like to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "for" on page 37, line 24, and also the first word on page 38, or that part of the provision applying to property losses. With all deference to the committee and their splendid work, I cannot see why the country should bear this loss.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina: Page 37, line 24, after the word "for", strike out the words "property losses and."

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, if I understand this provision, it undertakes to compensate parties having to move, by operation of this law, from one locality to another.

I can readily see why the Government or the railroads proper should bear the cost of a man and his family, for instance, but I cannot understand any equity that would require the railroads to underwrite the losses of a man in the selling or the disposition of his property incident to his moving.

I simply offer this as a matter of equity, and I hope the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TAYLOR].

It is assumed by the gentleman in his argument that there is no basis in reason for compensating persons for loss of property resulting from the removal of railway shops and offices from places where they have heretofore existed. This assumption is entirely erroneous. It would be agreed, of course, that if a person's property were taken by public authority for public purposes compensation must be made. If, for example, a man's residence were to be located on a street which makes possible easy access from a street to the man's house, and if public authority for any reason were to cut the street in front of the house of the person in question 10 or 15 feet below the original level, the owners of the house would be entitled to compensation, of course.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. I would say that he would be entitled to compensation.

Mr. CROSSER. Everyone is guaranteed that his property cannot be taken for public purposes without just compensation. The owner of the house which we have taken for illustration had adjusted himself to the existing order of things, and justice requires that he be protected against the invasion of rights which he may have acquired by reason of his adjustment to the prevailing order.

Practically every reason that can be advanced to justify compensating a person whose property may have been taken by condemnation proceedings applies with equal force in favor of compensating persons the value of whose property has been destroyed by the removal of railway shops and offices from places where they had been located and where persons establishing residences had reasonable ground to believe the shops and offices in question would continue. The property rights destroyed in these cases are as valuable and often more so than is property the value of which has been destroyed by the change of a street or highway as suggested.

In a case like the one at Palestine, Tex., where the municipality issued bonds in the sum of $300,000 to procure money to pay as a bonus to the railroad for establishing shops and offices, everyone agrees that the property rights which would be destroyed by the removal of railway shops and offices should be paid for. The only difference between that particular case and the more common case where railway shops have been established without specific contract with the municipality is that in the former case the obligation of the railroad was expressed in a formal way, whereas in the ordinary case it is fair to argue that there was an implied obligation on the part of the railroad to continue its shops or to compensate those whose property may have been destroyed by the removal of the same. My contention is that the people who have established their homes in a place where railway shops have been located have adjusted themselves to the social order there existing, and that it would be unfair and unjust to destroy property rights which have been acquired depending on that order. We hear much from time to time about the sacred rights of property, but it seems to me that there can be no more sacred type of property than that which a person may have acquired as a result of weaving his life into the life of the community which has been established because of the existence and assumed continuance of business arising from the presence of railway shops and offices. We must remember, too, that a railway company has the right to condemn property on the theory that it is for the public benefit. It is fair to contend, therefore, that if they are to be allowed to destroy property values on the theory that it is for the public good, they must pay the damage caused by destroying those values.

Some people seem to think that the only thing that constitutes property is so much dirt or other material which can be seen and touched. In truth, the most valuable property is of an intangible nature. I say that people who have been induced by a railroad company to settle in a community and who have spent most of their lives there have acquired property rights, and if they should be destroyed they ought to be compensated for them.

I want to call the gentleman's attention to the President's statement during the last campaign—I think in Salt Lake, when he was discussing this subject. He spoke of the different factors involved in a railway system. He said that one factor is the physical property of the railroads, the owners of the securities constitute another, and the third is the human element required to operate the railroads, which is just as important—yes, much more important than the others.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. I should like to say to the gentleman that I do not appear here to help any class of wealth or anything, but I am here as a special representative of labor—the human element. I am interested in the people of my section. Down there they were not given any consideration when the depression came. They were put out of their work and lost their homes by judgment of the court.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not true that this bill marks a revolution in transportation, and that it disturbs a social order or social system that has been established upon the theory that these railroads were separate entities?

Mr. CROSSER. Exactly.

Mr. LOZIER. And would never be consolidated or coordinated.

Mr. CROSSER. That is the point that I was trying to make clear.

Mr. LOZIER. And is it not true that when you adopt a revolutionary system, in the period of transition it is the function and duty of the State to conserve the rights which have been established as a result of the old social order?

Mr. CROSSER. That is what I was trying to make clear.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WILSON). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOWN. I do this in order to call the attention of gentlemen in the House to the fact that the bill H.R. 5884, the amendment to the Bankruptcy Act, is available, with the report. The bill will probably be called up on Monday under suspension of the rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. Any interested party, including, among others, any carrier, shipper, or employee, or any group of carriers, shippers, or employees, or any State commission, or the Governor of any State, or the official representative or representatives of any political subdivision thereof, dissatisfied with any order of the coordinator may, at any time prior to the effective date of the order, file a petition with the Commission asking that such order be reviewed and suspended pending such review, and stating fully the reasons therefor. Such petitions shall be governed by such general rules as the Commission may establish. If the Commission, upon considering such petition and any answer or answers thereto, finds reason to believe that the order may be unjust to the petitioner or inconsistent with the public interest, the Commission is hereby authorized to grant such review and, in its discretion, the Commission may suspend the order if it finds immediate enforcement thereof would result in irreparable damage to the petitioner or work grave injury to the public interest, but if the Commission suspends an order, it shall expedite the hearing and decision on that order as much as possible. Thereupon the Commission shall, after due notice and a public hearing, review the order and take such action in accord with the purposes of this title as it finds to be just and consistent with the public interest, either confirming the order or setting it aside or reissuing it in modified form, and any order so confirmed or reissued shall thereafter remain in effect until vacated or modified by the Commission.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EDMONDS: Page 39, line 3, after the words "State commission", insert "or commercial organization."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane to this section of the bill.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment merely allows commercial organizations that have traffic committees to attend these hearings as they do at present before the Interstate Commerce Commission. I can see no reason why it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. MILLIGAN. This provides that any interested parties can attend these hearings. A commercial organization would be an interested party.

Mr. EDMONDS. Commercial organizations having these associations in this way would be able to represent one or two hundred people before the Commission instead of having 40 or 50 of them go to the expense of coming down here.

Mr. MILLIGAN. The organization itself in that case would be an interested party.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to say anything further on the subject. I hope the committee will accept the amendment, because it makes plain what I said this morning, and is included in a letter from the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, which does not understand it the way the gentleman from Missouri states.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I have no authority to accept the amendment. I really do not think it is necessary. I think it is already included, but I have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. It shall further be the duty of the coordinator, and he is hereby authorized and directed, forthwith to investigate and consider means, not provided for in this title, of improving transportation conditions throughout the country, including the ability, financial or otherwise, of the carriers to improve their properties and furnish service and charge rates which will promote the commerce and industry of the country and including, also, the stability of railroad labor employment and other improvement of railroad labor conditions; and from time to time he shall submit to the Commission such recommendations calling for further legislation to these ends as he may deem necessary or desirable in the public interest. The Commission shall promptly transmit such recommendations, together with its comments thereon, to the President and to the Congress.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MEAD: Page 42, line 17, after the word "conditions", strike out the semicolon and add the words "and relations."

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I have neither offered nor supported any amendments which might be termed "alien" to this legislation. This amendment which I seek to have adopted now was considered by the House committee. It was approved by the Senate committee and made a part of the Senate bill. In the minds of some it may not be necessary; in the minds of others it might not seem important. At any rate, its adoption should not disturb any of the Members who are interested in the bill. In my judgment the word "relations" contemplates more and is broader in its scope than the word "conditions." This contemplates the human element in the industry. President Roosevelt in his Utah speech, made during the recent campaign, explained the three important elements that go to make up this great industry. He explained that the cars, the tracks, and the locomotives, and so forth, made up the physical elements; the bondholders and stockholders made up the financial element; but that by far the most important element was the human element, which comprised both the employees and the management of the roads.

My amendment deals with this all-important element. Permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, that this legislation creating a coordinator will prove to be a study and an investigation of the entire transportation industry. Much good will result from the work that will be accomplished. The problem will be nearer solution when this legislation comes to its end. The value of this legislation to the future of this country will be improved by the addition of the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

When we enacted the industrial-control legislation, we approved a new concept in the social order. Prior to that the Government held it was its duty to safeguard property rights and to afford protection to the people. We now recognize another duty of government. That duty is to see that every worker has a job, that he not only enjoys the right to live but the right to employment as well.

This all-important human element in the transportation industry should be given every proper consideration in this measure. Their mighty contribution would, in my judgment, aid in the solution of the vexing problems confronting this industry. The adoption of the word "relations", adding it to the word "conditions", will permit of this closer relationship between management and employee. It will develop a dual responsibility and make for a higher efficiency in the operation of our transportation lines. It considers the community of interest between all the forces concerned in this great enterprise.

While I have been supporting the committee and have opposed the adoption of amendments not heretofore considered, I think the adoption of this proposal, approved as it was by the Senate committee, will strengthen the bill. Its application by the coordinator will result in much improvement in the efficiency and management of our railroads. Let the employees participate in the counsels of the roads and they will vindicate the confidence we have in them.

I hope the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the committee, after some consideration, realizing that this amendment would be in conference if we struck it from the Senate bill, felt that the word "relations" was such a broad word, indefinite in a way, that it might cover a great many things. We thought it ought to go over for further consideration and conference with the Senate committee. If a reasonable suggestion can be made as to why it is necessary, I am sure the House committee would accept it. However, the committee feels at this time, as I have just stated, that it is such a broad word and that we do not know just exactly what it means, or what was in the minds of the Senate committee and the Senate when it was passed, that it should be left for further consideration. The committee would like very much to see this amendment not put in the bill today, so that we may have the benefit of conversation with the Senate committee on it; and if it appears to be necessary, if it appears to be the just and right thing to do, I think the House committee would agree to it, but we do not know what it means, frankly, and I do not think anybody else can very well determine what it means.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Why is not the word "conditions" inclusive of the word "relations"? They are complementary in language.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is the view which the House committee took.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HILL of Alabama). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MEAD) there were ayes 42 and noes 49.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. RAYBURN and Mr. MEAD to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were ayes 66 and noes 39.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. This title shall cease to have effect at the end of 1 year after the effective date, unless extended by a proclamation of the President for 1 year or any part thereof, but orders of the coordinator or of the Commission made thereunder shall continue in effect until vacated by the Commission or set aside by other lawful authority, but notwithstanding the provisions of section 10, no such order shall operate to relieve any carrier from the effect of any State law or of any order of a State commission enacted or made after this title ceases to have effect.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EDMONDS: On page 44, line 17, after the word "by" in line 17, strike out "a proclamation of the President for 1 year or any part thereof" and insert in lieu thereof "Congress."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, we have been passing quite a large number of bills in the House, in which the President is given authority to extend the operation of certain laws by proclamation. There is, of course, in these bills always an opportunity to say that Congress will not be in session and therefore the President should have that power. With regard to this bill we cannot say 1 year from now that Congress will not be in session or that Congress cannot investigate as to whether it is advisable to continue this act. Therefore I think we should reserve to ourselves the right to consider what has happened up to that time and have it reported back to Congress for us to act upon.

I do not understand that the gentlemen here wish to give away all their rights to the President. Certainly here is an opportunity by which we can ourselves decide whether this legislation has been successful or whether it is necessary to continue it for a longer time.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. This is an administrative bill. It is not a legislative bill. We are conferring authority on the President to do certain things. If it is going to be thrown back into Congress, it means we must pass an entirely new act. If the act is good from a legislative standpoint, the President should have the power to continue it for another year.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. EDMONDS. We do not have to pass a new act at all. We simply pass an act continuing this act.

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is better still, then.

Mr. EDMONDS. But there may be some changes a year from now that we would be glad to make in this act when we find out how it is working.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read down to and including line 17 on page 52.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment. At the beginning of line 6, on page 50, insert a quotation mark.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 206. (a) All moneys which were recoverable by and payable to the Interstate Commerce Commission under paragraph (6) of section 15a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as in force prior to the enactment of this title, shall cease to be so recoverable and payable; and all proceedings pending for the recovery of any such moneys shall be terminated. The general railroad contingent fund established under such section shall be liquidated and the Secretary of the Treasury shall distribute the moneys in such fund among the carriers which have made payments under such section, so that each such carrier shall receive an amount bearing the same ratio to the total amount in such fund that the total of amounts paid under such section by such carrier bears to the total of amounts paid under such section by all carriers; except that if the total amount in such fund exceeds the total of amounts paid under such section by all carriers such excess shall be distributed among such carriers upon the basis of the average rate of earnings (as determined by the Secretary of the Treasury) on the investment of the moneys in such fund and differences in dates of payments by such carriers.

(b) The income, war-profits, and excess-profits tax liabilities for any taxable period ending after February 28, 1920, of the carriers and corporations whose income, war-profits, or excess-profits tax liabilities were affected by section 15a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as in force prior to the enactment of this act, shall be computed as if such section had never been enacted, except that, in the case of carriers or corporations which have made payments under paragraph (6) of such section, an amount equal to such payments shall be excluded from gross income for the taxable periods with respect to which they were made. All distributions made to carriers in accordance with subdivision (a) of this section shall be included in the gross income of the carriers for the taxable period in which this act is enacted. The provisions of this subdivision shall not be held to affect (1) the statutes of limitations with respect to the assessment, collection, refund, or credit of income, war-profits, or excess-profits taxes or (2) the liabilities for such taxes of any carriers or corporations if such liabilities were determined prior to the enactment of this act in accordance with section 1106 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1926 or section 606 of the Revenue Act of 1928, or in accordance with a final judgment of a court, an order of the Board of Tax Appeals which had become final, or an offer in compromise duly accepted in accordance with law.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BROWN of Kentucky: On page 54, line 24, after the word "carriers", insert "except that any railroad owing money due to or to become due to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or any other agency of the United States Government shall pay in full said indebtedness before being entitled to the distribution of the aforesaid fund."

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, section 206 is the section under which you are proposing to pay back to the railroad some $15,000,000 that has been collected under the so-called "recapture clause."

As has been stated by the chairman of the committee, it is a practical impossibility to collect all the money due by the railroads under this section of existing law, but we now have in our hands approximately $15,000,000, I understand. Some of these railroads owe to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in excess of $300,000,000. We have $15,000,000 in our hands, yet under this section we propose to pay to them that $15,000,000 before they settle their indebtedness to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

My amendment provides that any railroad that owes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or any other agency of the United States Government money due or to become due shall not share in this distribution until such railroad has paid its indebtedness.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. PARKS. I fully agree with the gentleman's statement, but that is the law now.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman show me some section which says that is the law?

Mr. RAYBURN. It comes under the scope of the general law. The general law covers that, as the Government sets off funds in the Government's hands belonging to any railroad which is in default on its debt.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Of course, I shall be glad to admit that I do not know all the statutes that have been passed by the United States Government or by the States, and if I did know them all, they might repeal all the laws I ever knew, but I wish the gentleman would tell me under what law this set-off is authorized to be made on loans that are not yet due.

Mr. RAYBURN. I cannot remember the citation at the present time.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I believe when it is investigated it will be found there will be no set-off on loans that are not yet due.

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. DOBBINS. Is it not also true that this recapture fund is held by one agency of the Government while these loans were made by another agency of the Government?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Unquestionably it is true.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. MILLIGAN. I think the gentleman will find that the recapture fund is held by the Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I grant that. All that is true, but under this law the Treasurer of the United States will be authorized to pay this $15,000,000 and pay it out to these railroads who now owe the Reconstruction Finance Corporation millions of dollars in excess of this amount. This simply safeguards the taxpayers.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Does the gentleman realize this money does not belong to the Federal Government, but belongs to the railroads themselves? It was put up to create a revolving fund. It cannot be appropriated by the Federal Government inasmuch as the Federal Government did not appropriate the money originally.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Granting that all that is true, this $350,000,000 the Reconstruction Finance Corporation loaned them last year did belong to the United States Government, and we are holding $15,000,000 of their money that we can now set off against that $357,000,000. However, if you want to give them this money, then give it. The $357,000,000 was taxpayers' money.

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is not the point; this is not taxpayers' money at all.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. The $357,000,000 we loaned them last year was taxpayers' money.

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is true.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. This is their money in our hands that we can set off against this loan if we choose to do it.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. COLE. Is it the gentleman's idea that because a few of the railroads of the country were good enough, we might say, to comply with this law and pay in $15,000,000, approximately, they should be punished now and not have their money, while other roads that did not pay in anything are in no way affected?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Are we exacting from them one penny other than what they owe? Is it punishment to have a man pay his honest debts? If it is, then we will be punishing them.

Mr. COLE. Let them pay it hereafter.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. It has been the rule until now that the Government gets its share hereafter. For once in history I would like the Government to get now a part of the money owing to it.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. It has been stated that in the matter of this set-off the general law will apply. If that be true let us adopt this amendment and then we will know what will be done.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Certainly it cannot hurt anything.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman knows the Government could not use this money as a set-off against money the railroads have borrowed from the Federal Government.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. If the Congress of the United States says it shall be used as a set-off as proposed in my amendment, it can certainly do it. If you pass this bill without this amendment we cannot do it. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. It has been stated that the Government could use this as an off-set against money the railroads owe the Government.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, as I stated yesterday in my remarks, the Interstate Commerce Commission in three reports have advocated the repeal of section 15a, the recapture clause, from the beginning.

We had long and exhaustive hearings on this matter. There was not a witness who appeared there who in any way opposed the repeal of the recapture clause in its entirety.

As I stated, the Interstate Commerce Commission three times has said it is unworkable. Mr. Chairman, the railroads advocated its repeal.

The shipper organizations unanimously recommended its repeal, and the short-line railroads especially are vitally interested in the repeal of this provision, and they are located in every section of the country.

Labor organizations appeared before the committee, both the brotherhoods and the representatives of the American Federation of Labor, and asked for the repeal of 15 (a) ab initio.

Now, I say that these little railroads are vitally interested in this $10,000,000 that has been paid in. Why? Only one so-called rich railroad paid any appreciable amount into this fund. More than $4,000,000 of this amount, with the accumulated interest, belongs to the poorer railroads. As I called to the attention of the House yesterday, one railroad, in the district of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KERR], a little railroad down there that is owned by the town, in the past has been the source of revenue to the town. Of course, it has not been during the last 7 or 8 years, but during their fat times they took money from their funds and paid it into this particular fund, and the railroad and the little town are desperately in need of money now. This is true with reference to every one of these poor, little starving short-line railroads, that are feeders to the great railroads and that serve little communities. They are as vital to the economic life of the little communities as the Pennsylvania Railroad is to the great coal fields and iron mines of the State of Pennsylvania, and when you pass this amendment you are penalizing the class of railroads in the United States that need this money above every other class of railroads in the land, and you are not applying it as far as the $357,000,000 is concerned, that has never been paid in.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. The gentleman contended just a moment ago that the law already provided for just what my amendment does.

Mr. RAYBURN. I said they "could."

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. If these railroads are bankrupt and owe the Government or the Reconstruction Finance Corporation some money——

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think there are many of them that have been able to qualify to get a loan.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. But if they are bankrupt and they do owe the Government some money, does not the gentleman think that this amount of money we now have in our hands ought to be set over against the amount they owe?

Mr. RAYBURN. I say we ought to treat all the railroads alike. Those that owe the $361,000,000 and have not paid I think should be treated exactly like the little roads that did not think they were strong enough to resist the Government and therefore paid money into this fund.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the railroads that have borrowed the large sums of money from the Federal Government through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are not the roads that have paid in one dollar of recapture funds.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is true.

Mr. TERRELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. TERRELL. If these little, poor, weak railroads have not borrowed any money from the Government, they will not be hurt, and if they have borrowed some money, why should they not pay it before we give this money back to them?

Mr. RAYBURN. Why should we not ask the big railroads to pay this $361,000,000?

Mr. TERRELL. We have not that money in our possession. Let us get what we can.

Mr. RAYBURN. I disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. BOYLEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may have 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOILEAU. Is it not a fact that the practical operation of this amendment would be to have the $15,000,000 applied to the indebtedness of the railroads——

Mr. RAYBURN. It is not $15,000,000 but $13,000,000. Ten million dollars has been captured and it has earned $3,000,000 in interest; and a further answer is that if these railroads were able to borrow money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the Government holds their securities and the money is not due.

Mr. BOILEAU. But the small railroad companies will be treated just as well as the larger railroad companies, because this amount would be applied on their debt and would reduce their indebtedness that much.

Mr. RAYBURN. It would do that; but the debt is not yet due, and they need this money between now and the time when the debt becomes due; and let me state again that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, under the law, is not supposed to lend money to a railroad that does not have adequate collateral.

Mr. BOILEAU. At the time they secured the loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation they did not anticipate getting this money, so they could not be in any way prejudiced.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCFARLANE) there were—ayes 27, noes 76.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 206.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SABATH moves to strike out section 206.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, when in 1920 the so-called "Esch-Cummins bill" was before the House this provision, which aided and made possible the great increase in the railroad rates, was inserted to make possible the passage of that bill. We were then assured that the weaker railroads would be the beneficiaries—that it would aid the smaller railroads which could not operate profitably.

The act was passed, and the railroads started immediately to increase the rates with the sanction and approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. For years they collected these increased rates that were permissible under that act. They have collected millions upon millions from the people of the United States, and the great majority of people thought it was only fair, feeling that they were aiding in that way the smaller and poorer roads.

A few of the small roads did pay in under the recapture clause about $10,000,000, but all of the big roads, on one pretext or another, refused to pay. Today they owe the Government, I think, nearly $300,000,000; and that notwithstanding all the money they have collected as the result of the increased rates during these years. Now, I think it is manifestly unfair, on the one hand, to enact legislation permitting the railroads to levy higher rates, and on the other hand, after 10 years and after the railroads have collected millions of dollars, to say that that legislation was unwise and allow them to retain all the excess profits they have collected, amounting, as I have said, to millions and millions of dollars.

How anyone will be able to justify voting for the repeal of the recapture clause is something I do not know. I think that the title of this measure ought to read: "A donation of $361,000,000 to the poor railroads controlled by the poor J. P. Morgan & Co." It is indeed remarkable how these financial magnets, who control the railroads, and who in this bill have the right and the power to merge and consolidate, can create sentiment in the Nation and in the House for legislation that they desire.

This provision made it possible for them ever since 1920 to obtain not only high freight rates but high passenger rates as well. If an honest compilation could be had as to what these increased rates amounted to during the last 12 years, I venture to say it would run into billions of dollars—I say billions, not millions. Yet, notwithstanding that fact, it is claimed that the railroads are "broke." I fully realize the condition of the railroads at present. If they were not in deplorable shape they would not have received $350,000,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. If they are "broke"—and no doubt many of them are—it is not because the rates are low but because the railroads have been grossly mismanaged and mulcted by the railroad manipulators, who not only have drawn millions of dollars in salaries, as I am reliably informed, but have made millions of dollars on the purchase of rolling stock and other contracts.

But I realize that no matter what proof I submit today this amendment will carry and that once more these destroyers will be the beneficiaries.

I sympathize with the little roads that are not owned by the big railroads. But I rather think that before long we shall hear that these little roads are owned by the rich railroads—railroads whose officials have been fleecing the people and the Government for many years, and who have been paying their officers salaries of $150,000 a year, although these worthies have squandered, through the manipulation of stocks and through various privileges and contracts they have entered into, millions of dollars of the railroads' money.

I feel that this section should be eliminated; then let us see what will happen later on. I believe that we should put an end to this kind of legislation and to such practices whereby the railroads are losing money, as they claim they are, and yet paying their presidents $120,000 to $150,000 a year as salaries.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the same arguments that applied to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] apply here.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SABATH) there were 33 ayes and 80 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

SEC. 208. Paragraphs (f) and (g) of such section 19a, as amended (U.S.C., title 49, sec. 19a (f), (g)), are amended to read as follows:

"(f) Upon completion of the original valuations herein provided for, the Commission shall thereafter keep itself informed of all new construction, extensions, improvements, retirements, or other changes in the condition, quantity, use, and classification of the property of all common carriers as to which original valuations have been made, and of the cost of all additions and betterments thereto and of all changes in the investment therein, and may keep itself informed of current changes in costs and values of railroad properties, in order that it may have available at all times the information deemed by it to be necessary to enable it to revise and correct its previous inventories, classifications, and values of the properties; and, when deemed necessary, may revise, correct, and supplement any of its inventories and valuations.

"(g) To enable the Commission to carry out the provisions of the preceding paragraph, every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall make such reports and furnish such information as the Commission may require."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Does the gentleman from Texas think that this paragraph can be carried out in view of the curtailment in the appropriation for the revaluation work of the Commission?

Mr. RAYBURN. We are curtailing the valuation work of the Commission by this bill. The act provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission after it completes its valuation shall keep the valuation up to date. That is impossible. They started out 4 years ago to bring the accounts up to current. They have not got them up yet.

Mr. GOSS. And yet we reduced the appropriation?

Mr. RAYBURN. We provide in this that they shall not apply, but that the Commission shall from time to time look after additions and betterments, and things like that that may be added, but that they shall not be forced to keep this current.

Mr. GOSS. So that in reality with a reduced appropriation the work will not be of much value.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am afraid not.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee will rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HILL of Alabama, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill S. 1580, and pursuant to House Resolution 169 he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the vote.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote upon the ground that there is no quorum present.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman's point of order comes too late.

Mr. COLLINS. I was on my feet seeking recognition.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is overruled. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-five Members present; not a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until Monday, June 5, 1933, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

RATIFICATION OF THE REPEAL OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the secretary of state of New Jersey, enclosing a certificate of the result of the vote of the convention to consider the ratification of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Trenton, June 3, 1933.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
President of the Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I am herewith enclosing a certificate of the result of the vote of the convention to consider the ratification of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The result of the convention is certified to you in accordance with chapter 73, Laws of 1933 of the State of New Jersey, and a resolution adopted by the convention on June 1, 1933.

Yours very truly,

THOMAS A. MATHIS, Secretary of State.

Whereas the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two thirds of each House concurring therein) did resolve that the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three fourths of the several States; and

Whereas the said proposed amendment reads as follows:

"SECTION 1. The eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 2. The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors in violation of the laws thereof is hereby prohibited.

"SEC. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within 7 years from the date of submission hereof to the States by the Congress"; and

Whereas there was duly transmitted to the legislature of this State the said article of amendment proposed by the Congress to the Constitution of the United States; and

Whereas the legislature of this State, pursuant to law, did enact a statute entitled "An act providing for the election of delegates to a convention and providing for the holding of a convention to consider the article of amendment proposed by the Congress to the Constitution of the United States designed to repeal the eighteenth article of amendment", which said act, having passed both houses of the legislature, was signed by the Governor of this State on March 23, 1933, and constitutes chapter 73 of the Laws of New Jersey for the year 1933; and

Whereas, pursuant to the provisions of said act of the legislature, an election for the selection of delegates to the said convention was held in this State on May 16, 1933, at which said election delegates were chosen in accordance with the provisions of said statute; and

Whereas on May 22, 1933, His Excellency A. Harry Moore, Governor of the State of New Jersey, pursuant to the provisions of said act of the legislature did issue his said proclamation for the holding of the said convention, which said proclamation reads as follows:

"Whereas, pursuant to chapter 73 of the Laws of 1933, an election was held on the 16th day of May 1933 for the election of delegates to the convention to consider the article of amendment proposed by the Congress to the Constitution of the United States designed to repeal the eighteenth article of amendment; and

"Whereas section 13 of said act requires the Governor of this State, within 20 days after the holding of said election, by proclamation, to convene the said convention:

"Therefore I, A Harry Moore, Governor of the State of New Jersey, pursuant to the power and authority vested in me by said act of the legislature, do hereby convene the said convention to meet in the Memorial Building, Stacy Park, in the city of Trenton, on Thursday, the 1st day of June next, at the hour of 11 o'clock in the forenoon of said day (eastern standard time)."

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of New Jersey this 22d day of May 1933, and in the independence of the United States the one hundred and fifty-seventh.

[SEAL] A. HARRY MOORE,
Governor.
THOMAS A. MATHIS,
Secretary of State.

Whereas pursuant to the said proclamation of His Excellency the Governor the said convention did meet at the time and place therein fixed and, having organized by the selection of a chairman and secretary and having adopted rules governing its deliberations, did proceed to consider the proposed article of amendment: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by this convention of delegates representing the people of the State of New Jersey, duly assembled pursuant to law, That we do approve and ratify the proposed article of amendment proposed by the Congress to the Constitution of the United States designed to repeal the eighteenth article of amendment, which said amendment reads as follows:

"Whereas the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two thirds of each House concurring therein) did resolve that the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three fourths of the several States; and

"Whereas the said proposed amendment reads as follows:

"'SECTION 1. The eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

"'SEC. 2. The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors in violation of the laws thereof is hereby prohibited.

"'SEC. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within 7 years from the date of submission hereof to the States by the Congress.' And, further, the action of this convention in approving and ratifying the said proposed amendment is valid to all intents and purposes as representing the people of the State of New Jersey; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chairman and secretary of this convention shall certify the result of the votes of the delegates to the secretary of state of this State; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state of this State shall certify the result of this vote to the Secretary of State of the United States and to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States."

EMERSON RICHARDS, Chairman.

Attest:

OLIVER F. VAN CAMP, Secretary.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Thomas A. Mathis, secretary of state of the State of New Jeresey, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the resolution adopted by the State convention ratifying the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

I do further certify that the chairman and secretary of the convention has certified to this office that the resolution was adopted by a vote of 202 for the adoption of the resolution and 2 against the adoption of the resolution.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal this 2d day of June A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] THOMAS A. MATHIS,
Secretary of State.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Assembly Joint Resolution 19, an act to memorialize Congress to set aside February 15 as a national holiday to commemorate the birthday of Susan B. Anthony

Whereas Susan B. Anthony was the pioneer who blazed the trail leading to women's suffrage in the United States; and

Whereas Susan B. Anthony gave her life and energy toward obtaining equal rights for women; and

Whereas Susan B. Anthony is honored and looked upon by the people of our country as a great national figure; and

Whereas February 15 is the day of the birth of this great leader: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate (jointly) of the California Legislature, That Congress be urged to set aside and apart February 15 as a national holiday in commemoration of the birthday of Susan B. Anthony.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, memoralizing Congress to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for economic planning and regulation, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. JOHNSON.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California, memorializing Congress to enact legislation providing for the suspension in payment of charges due from Federal reclamation project settlers to the United States and providing for a loan to the reclamation fund to replace the income thereto thus suspended, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. JOHNSON.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California, relative to extension of time by institutions receiving Federal aid or assistance for the payment of certain debts secured by mortgages or deeds of trust, which was ordered to lie on the table.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. JOHNSON.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on the Library:

Senate resolution 129 (by DeBerry)

Whereas the Government of the United States has contracted for the construction of a National Archives Building, to be completed not later than January 1, 1935; and

Whereas an administration headed by an archivist of the United States must soon be provided by law; and

Whereas Dr. Thomas P. Martin, a native citizen of the State of Texas, is in the opinion of many archivists and historians throughout the United States eminently qualified by education and experience to fill the position of archivist, when that position shall have been created by law: Now, therefore, be it Resolved by the Senate of Texas, now in session, That we endorse Dr. Thomas P. Martin for appointment as archivist of the United States, and that as a token of our respect, admiration, and esteem of our fellow Texan that an enrolled copy of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of the senate to the Vice President of the United States, Hon. John Garner, Senators Tom Connally, and Morris Sheppard.

EDGAR E. WITT,
President of the Senate.

I hereby certify that the above resolution was adopted by the senate May 31, 1933.

BOB BARKER,
Secretary of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, which were referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs:

Concurrent resolution

Whereas numerous persons have been found stealing their passage on commercial and Government ships arriving at ports in the Territory of Hawaii from the mainland of the United States; and

Whereas said persons, otherwise termed "stowaways", are contributing to the serious unemployment problem now confronting the Territory and increasing the number of public charges; and

Whereas among said stowaways there have been found undesirable persons of such criminal records in other jurisdictions as to present a serious menace to the preservation of law and order in the Territory; and

Whereas it is felt by officials of the Territory of Hawaii and the shipping companies concerned that a grave situation has been created endangering the safety of sea travel and unnecessarily increasing the unemployment and crime problems in the Territory of Hawaii, rendering it highly desirable for Congress to vest in a proper regulatory body, such as the United States Shipping Board, the power and duty to regulate the act of stowing away on vessels engaged in coastwise service, including the power to require the return of all stowaways to ports of departure for trial and the imposition of such punishment as may be prescribed by law: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America be, and it hereby is, urgently requested to provide by appropriate and adequate legislation for the vesting in the United States Shipping Board or some other proper regulatory body the power and duty effectively to regulate and punish the act of stowing away on commercial and Government vessels engaged in coastwise service, including the power to require the return of all stowaways to ports of departure for trial and imposition of such punishment as may be provided; and be it further

Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii, the Secretary of the Interior, the United States Shipping Board, and each of the two Houses of the Congress of the United States of America.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, May 20, 1933.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted by the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii on May 20, 1933.

GEO. P. COOKE,
President of the Senate.
ELLEN D. SMYTHE,
Clerk of the Senate.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, May 20, 1933.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii on May 20, 1933.

HERBERT N. AHUNO,
Speaker House of Representatives.
EDWARD WOODWARD,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Concurrent resolution

Whereas it has come to the attention of this legislature through items in the public press and otherwise that action is contemplated in Washington toward the amendment of the Hawaiian Organic Act removing the 3-year residence qualification for the Governor of Hawaii; and

Whereas it is well known that there are among those who have resided in this Territory during the preceding 3 years numerous men of the Democratic Party who are fully and ably qualified for this high office; and

Whereas it is also the firm conviction of this legislature that it would result most unfairly and unfortunately for the Territory should a nonresident, of necessity unfamiliar with local conditions and problems, be appointed to this office; and

Whereas the threatened procedure would be absolutely contrary to all principles of American self-government, in the fulfillment of which principles this Territory has heretofore given an excellent account of itself: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii, seventeenth regular session (the house of representatives concurring), That on behalf of the people of this Territory this legislature earnestly protests against any action by the Congress of the United States of America toward the elimination of the 3-year residence qualification for the Governor of this Territory; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States of America, to each of the two Houses of Congress, to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, May 20, 1933.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted by the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii on May 20, 1933.

GEO. P. COOKE,
President of the Senate.
ELLEN D. SMYTHE,
Clerk of the Senate.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, May 20, 1933.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii on May 20, 1933.

HERBERT N. AHUNO,
Speaker House of Representatives.
EDWARD WOODWARD,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Concurrent resolution

Whereas there appeared in the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, under date of May 23, 1933, a leading editorial under the caption "Roosevelt, the Wrecker?", condemning the President of the United States for having taken steps to suspend the Hawaiian Organic Act temporarily in order that he might be free to appoint as Governor of Hawaii a person of wide experience and vision, either from the islands themselves or from the entire United States, in order to obtain the best man available for this highly important post; and

Whereas the aforesaid editorial described the action of the President in this regard as being aimed to wreck and destroy American progress and American development of Hawaii; and

Whereas it is the sense of the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii, the House of Representatives concurring, that this editorial is both vicious and entirely unwarranted, ill-advised, in the worst of bad taste, unpatriotic under present conditions, and is lacking in that spirit of cooperation which should exist during these times of national stress, and that it does not reflect the feeling of the right-thinking people of Hawaii: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii, regular session of 1933 (the house of representatives concurring), That the editorial aforesaid be and it hereby is vehemently condemned by the two bodies of the legislature in that it throws an entirely false light on the action of the President in his attempt to obtain for Hawaii a man whom he considers to be best suited for the important position of chief executive of the Territory; and further, in that it does not express the reaction of the legislature nor the people of Hawaii to the suggestion of an emergency suspension of that portion of the Hawaiian Organic Act regarding residence qualification of the Governor of Hawaii; and be it further

Resolved, That the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii does hereby record a vote of the highest confidence in Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, in his wisdom and ability to decide upon the man best suited for the high place of honor and trust vested in the man chosen for Governor of Hawaii; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be forthwith transmitted by wire to President Roosevelt; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be transmitted by mail to Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States; to the Honorable L. L. McCandless, Delegate to Congress from Hawaii; and to both Houses of the Congress of the United States.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, May 24, 1933.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted by the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii on May 24, 1933.

GEO. P. COOKE,
President of the Senate.
ELLEN D. SMYTHE,
Clerk of the Senate.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, May 24, 1933.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii on May 24, 1933.

HERBERT N. AHUNO,
Speaker House of Representatives.
JAS. S. OCHONG,
Assistant Clerk House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the American Society of Ichthyologists and Herpetologists, favoring the making of adequate appropriations to maintain the scientific, educational, and conservational work of the Bureau of Fisheries, the National Museum, the National Zoological Park, and other Federal agencies engaged in such work, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the United Ukrainian Organizations of Cleveland, Ohio, protesting against the recognition of the Soviet Government of Russia, and favoring the passage of the so-called "Dies bill", providing for the exclusion and deportation of alien communists, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Pennsylvania State Association of Master Plumbers at Scranton, Pa., favoring the passage of the bill (S. 1592) to prohibit untrue, deceptive, or misleading advertising through the use of the mails or in interstate or foreign commerce, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from S. P. Gagnet, Sr., of New Orleans, La., endorsing Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, and condemning attacks made upon him, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of Ida W. Friend, of New Orleans, and sundry citizens of the State of Louisiana, praying for a senatorial investigation relative to alleged acts and conduct of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by a mass meeting at the Farmers Market Square, in a national youth-day demonstration, at the city of Ironwood, Mich., condemning appropriations for armaments and also the creation of military forced-labor camps among the youth, and favoring the establishment of a system of Federal unemployment insurance and immediate cash relief for the unemployed, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Democratic County Committee of the City and County of Honolulu, Hawaii, protesting against amendment of the Organic Act of Hawaii so as to permit the appointment of a nonresident governor of the Territory, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a petition of sundry citizens of the State of California, praying for amendment of the so-called "Economy Act" and regulations issued thereunder, restoring to all veterans who were actually disabled in the military or naval service their former benefits, rights, privileges, ratings, etc., which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by Bay Ridge Council, No. 16, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, of Brooklyn, N.Y., favoring the prompt passage of the so-called "Dies bill", fixing a quota pertaining to the admission of alien immigrants to the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Randall Manor Residents Association, Inc., of West New Brighton, Staten Island, N.Y., advocating a reduction in the interest rates on all first mortgages on Randall Manor homes (Staten Island) from 6 to 4½ percent, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Assembly Joint Resolution 34, relative to memorializing the President of the United States to increase the customs duties on certain fish products and to negotiate treaties concerning the conservation of fish

Whereas the customs duties fixed by the laws of the United States on the importation of fresh, frozen, and canned fish, fish meal, and fish oil do not equalize the differences existing in the costs of producing such articles in this country and the costs of producing such articles in foreign countries; and

Whereas unless such differences in the costs of production are immediately equalized the acute unemployment problem existing in the industries marketing fish and fish products cannot be solved; and

Whereas persons engaged in the fishing industry of this State are subject to strict regulations enacted in the interest of the conservation of such natural resources; and

Whereas it is necessary that the United States enter into treaties with adjoining nations in order that the supply of fresh fish in Pacific waters be conserved for future generations, and in order that the fish industries of this State, from which many thousands of the citizens of this State gain livelihood, be not placed in a disadvantageous position with similar industries existing in foreign nations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully urges the President of the United States to request an investigation by the United States Tariff Commission for the purpose of raising the customs duties on fresh, frozen, and canned fish, fish meal, and fish oil, in order that the differences existing between foreign and domestic production costs be equalized; and be it further

Resolved, That the legislature of this State respectfully urges the President of the United States to approve and proclaim an increase in the customs duties on these articles; and be it further

Resolved, That the legislature of this State respectfully urges the President of the United States to negotiate with the nations adjoining the United States treaties leading to the conservation and protection of fish and other animal life existing in the waters of the Pacific Ocean; and be it further

Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, and the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

Senate Joint Resolution 16, relative to memorializing Congress to enact legislation providing for the suspension in payment of charges due from Federal reclamation project settlers to the United States and providing for a loan to the reclamation fund to replace the income thereto thus suspended

Whereas there have been introduced into the United States Senate for passage, Senate bills 5417 and 5607, which are complementary one to the other, the first providing for a suspension in payment of charges due from the Federal reclamation project settlers to the United States and in the amount of which charges and for like period of time the principal source of income to the reclamation fund is likewise delayed, and the second providing for a loan to the reclamation fund to replace the income thereto thus suspended; and

Whereas such suspension of construction charges has become necessary on account of the extreme low prices affecting all agricultural communities; and

Whereas unless the loan above referred to is made to the reclamation fund the activities of the bureau in carrying out the long-established governmental policies relating to reclamation must stop; and

Whereas there has already been authorized by the Congress of the United States the construction of irrigation projects under the provision of the Reclamation Act; and

Whereas many of said Federal projects are now only partially completed and therefore incapable of performing the service for which they were intended, or of any substantial self-liquidation of their present costs until the same are completed; and

Whereas the settlers upon numerous privately initiated irrigation districts of the Western States are on the verge of being forced out of their homes—to swell the throng of urban unemployed—because of an inadequate water supply due to lack of storage and necessity for repair of distribution facilities, and a supplemental water supply can be made most readily available by the Federal Reclamation Bureau upon a sound engineering and economic set-up; and

Whereas delays in completion of projects already begun and the commencement of those projects designed to rehabilitate worthy existent enterprises will result in serious loss to the United States generally and to the Western States particularly in (a) direct increase in unemployment through cessation of work on projects and consequent laying off workers, and indirect increase of unemployment in all of those industries supplying materials for the projects; (b) depreciation of works already constructed in such incomplete projects, and of idle money therein invested; and (c) the crushing blow to those under said projects (with their dependent communities) having inadequate water supply and having staked all in faith upon the Federal Government's completing that which it has undertaken and in commencing needed construction to supplement the water supply of those worthy private projects; and failure to enact said bills, or similar legislation, will result in the discharge of thousands of men now employed and the consequent loss in purchasing power for consumption of both farm and industrial projects and add to the depression prevailing in all markets; and

Whereas we understand that the program of the Reclamation Bureau, if the aforementioned legislation is enacted, is to be confined strictly during the period provided for in the loan to doing those things necessary to place existent projects on a sound and workable basis, and does not contemplate initiating work on any project, either Federal or otherwise, not now developed to a material extent, and therefore does not propose the bringing under irrigation of any appreciable areas of land not now irrigated: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Congress of the United States in furtherance of established national policies of reconstruction and reclamation should enact, without delay, United States Senate bills 5417 and 5607 into laws; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate of the State of California be, and he is hereby, directed forthwith to transmit a copy of this memorial to each, the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the California delegation in Congress, with a request that they expeditiously promote the enactment into law of United States Senate bills 5417 and 5607.

Mr. JOHNSON also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Assembly Joint Resolution 26, relative to memorializing Congress to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for economic planning and regulation

Whereas modern scientific use of natural power and machinery and efficient conduct of business and commerce have brought about the production of commodities and rendition of services with a rapidly decreasing amount of human effort; and

Whereas this condition has resulted in a great surplus of human labor and of available commodities and services; and

Whereas there have ensued great unemployment, misery, suffering, and crime, with the possibility of social and political disturbances of the gravest character; and

Whereas under the present unregulated system of conducting competitively for profit the production and commerce of the Nation, there exists no natural economic principle or factor which will in times of peace counteract the destructive tendency toward overproduction, unemployment, and inadequate income to most of the employed; and

Whereas it would appear that with proper use and control of modern means of production and distribution it would be possible for practically all persons to have and enjoy a fair share of material goods in return for services rendered; and

Whereas such use and control and appropriate economic planning are not feasible except through the direction and supervision of a single centralized agency, and not fully attainable without the removal of certain constitutional limitations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly and senate, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California hereby memorializes the Congress to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States reading substantially as follows:

"The Congress and the several States, by its authority and under its control, may regulate or provide for the regulation of hours of work, compensation for work, the production of commodities, and the rendition of services in such manner as shall be necessary and proper to foster orderly production and equitable distribution, to provide remunerative work for the maximum number of persons, to promote adequate compensation for work performed, and to safeguard the economic stability and welfare of the Nation"; and be it further

Resolved, That the Legislature of California respectfully urges that, pending the submission and adoption of such an amendment, the Congress provide for such economic planning and regulation as may be necessary and proper under present economic conditions and legally possible under the existing provisions of the Constitution; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly is hereby instructed forthwith to transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, and to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and each of the Senators and Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Assembly Joint Resolution 31, relative to the use of granite in Federal construction projects

Whereas California is one of the leading granite-producing States of the Union; and

Whereas it is desirable that permanent public buildings should be constructed of dignified, durable, and beautiful materials; and

Whereas the benefits of Federal construction should not be confined to any one State or locality by the specification and general use of a material produced almost exclusively within the borders of such a State; and

Whereas granite is readily available in any of 21 States, while the production of limestone is largely confined to the State of Indiana; and

Whereas it is apparent from its general use in all sections of the country that undue favoritism has been shown Indiana limestone in Federal construction, with resulting aggravation of serious unemployment conditions in the granite-producing States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives from the State of California be, and are hereby, urged to secure proper consideration for the use of granite in Federal construction projects; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be, and he is hereby, directed to send copies of this resolution to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives from the State of California.

Mr. JOHNSON also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Senate Joint Resolution 26, relative to extension of time by institutions receiving Federal aid or assistance for the payment of certain debts secured by mortgages or deeds of trust

Whereas the activity of the United States Government in its present plan of aiding banks, insurance companies, building and loan companies, and railroad companies, as well as in aiding agriculture and industry, is viewed with appreciation and approbation by the Legislature of the State of California; and

Whereas said legislature is especially in full accord with the extension of aid to banks which have loaned money to farmers and home owners secured by mortgages or deeds of trust on home or farm properties; and

Whereas it has been brought to the attention of some members of the legislature that some of the financial institutions receiving loans or other assistance from the United States Government or its agencies do not extend and are not willing to extend reasonable time for payment of debts secured by deeds of trust or mortgages on homes and farm properties before foreclosing the mortgage or exercising powers of sale granted by the mortgage or deed of trust: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully petitions and urges the United States Government to use the strongest measures justifiable in requiring such institutions receiving such aid to cooperate with the Federal Government in its program for the restoration of prosperity to our country by extending time for payment of the debts above mentioned; and be it further

Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of this resolution be sent forthwith by the secretary of the Senate of the State of California to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the Members of Congress from the State of California.

NEW JERSEY SHIP CANAL FROM RARITAN BAY TO DELAWARE RIVER

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a joint resolution adopted by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, memorializing the President and Congress of the United States to construct a ship canal across the State of New Jersey from Raritan Bay to the Delaware River at a point near the head of navigation, and providing for the appointment of a committee to further this project.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 20, introduced March 20, 1933 (by Mr. Powell)

Joint resolution memorializing the President and Congress of the United States to construct a ship canal across the State of New Jersey from Raritan Bay to the Delaware River at a point near the head of navigation, and providing for the appointment of a committee to further this project

Whereas an inland waterways system has been provided along the entire Atlantic coast with the exception of the short distance through the State of New Jersey, for which project the State of New Jersey has heretofore appropriated considerable money for the acquisition of the right of way, and has from year to year reappropriated said moneys, and the State of New Jersey has been and still is ready and willing to furnish the right of way for such canal in accordance with the representations heretofore made to the Federal Government; and

Whereas in the interests of commerce and the national defense such ship canal is a necessary and worthy improvement and one such as is contemplated to be completed under the comprehensive program of the President of the United States; and

Whereas, pursuant to the direction of the last Congress, the United States Corps of Army Engineers is now ready to proceed with 74 percent of the work on such canal and will be ready to proceed with the balance of said work by July 1, which said Engineer Corps has unlimited experience in large scale work of this nature and can start work immediately upon this project; and

Whereas the construction of such canal would provide employment for a very large number of men near the greatest center of unemployment in this country, a large portion of the work being of such nature that it can be done by hand labor; and

Whereas the immediate construction of such canal would in large measure contribute to the early return of prosperity: Therefore be it

Resolved, by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey:

1. That the President and Congress of the United States are hereby memorialized and requested to provide a sufficient sum of money to construct a ship canal across the State of New Jersey from Raritan Bay to the Delaware River, at a point near the head of navigation, upon a right of way to be furnished by this State.

2. That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States from the State of New Jersey.

3. That a committee of 3, 1 to be appointed by the Governor, 1 to be appointed by the president of the senate, and 1 to be appointed by the speaker of the house, be constituted to further this project and to personally present the same to the President of the United States, the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States from the State of New Jersey, and to take such other steps as to such committee shall seem proper.

4. This joint resolution shall take effect immediately.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H.R. 5208) to amend the probation law, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 113) thereon.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the concurrent resolution (S.Con.Res. 2) providing for the printing, with an index, of the Constitution of the United States, as amended to April 1, 1933, together with the Declaration of Independence, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 115) thereon.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on today, June 5, 1933, that committee presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 1581) to amend the act approved July 3, 1930 (46 Stat. 1005), authorizing commissioners or members of international tribunals to administer oaths, etc.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

RETURN OF RECORDS OF FAIRMONT HOTEL

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a proposed order which it has been suggested should be entered by the Senate.

The order was read and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered (by unanimous consent), That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to return to the Hotel Fairmont, San Francisco, Calif., certain records of the hotel offered in evidence in the proceedings of the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, as follows:

Registration card of Sam Leake, dated September 21, 1929 (U.S.S. Exhibit 42);

Records of the said hotel covering room 26 from September 1929 to April 1933 (U.S.S. Exhibit 43);

Record of room 679, occupied by Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Leake, and by W. S. Leake, from January 1928 to April 1933 (U.S.S. Exhibit 44);

Original telephone sheets of daily calls from said hotel on March 11 and March 13, respectively, 1930 (U.S.S. Exhibit 45); and

A pencil memorandum of the hotel auditor covering payments for room 26 from October 1929 to April 1933 (U.S.S. Exhibit 46).

ORGANIZATIONS WITHIN THE FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION—AMENDMENT

Mr. BLACK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1766) to provide for organizations within the Farm Credit Administration to make loans for the production and marketing of agricultural products, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, to provide a market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes, which was read, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

Insert at the proper place the following:

"Nothing in this bill shall be construed or administered in such way as to abolish or impair the operation and continuation of the Regional Agricultural Corporations."

AMENDMENT TO INDUSTRIAL-CONTROL AND PUBLIC-WORKS BILL

Mr. BLACK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 5755, the so-called "industrial-control and public-works bill", which was read, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed, as follows:

Amend by adding to section 6 the following subdivision:

"(d) No trade or industrial association or group shall be eligible to receive the benefits of the provisions of this title, unless such associations or groups give an equal voting strength to the industries, trades, and groups of each State, as State units, irrespective of the magnitude of trade, or business of the trades, industries, or associations of the different States."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H.R. 5329) creating the St. Lawrence Bridge Commission and authorizing said commission and its successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near Ogdensburg, N.Y., and it was signed by the Vice President.

NEW YORK & CUBA MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.—SALARIES

Mr. BLACK. I regret that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is not present. I have had his office called, but he is not there.

On last Friday, while I was absent from the Chamber, there was placed in the RECORD by the Senator from New York a letter from Mr. Franklin D. Mooney, president of the New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co. In presenting that letter the Senator from New York made the following statement:

On the 31st of May, at page 4645 of the RECORD, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] made certain criticisms regarding the salary paid the head of one of the shipping lines. I want the truth about that matter to appear; and I ask that the letter received by me from Mr. Franklin D. Mooney, president of the New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co., may be inserted in the RECORD.

The first two paragraphs of that letter are as follows:

NEW YORK & CUBA MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.,
Washington, D.C., June 1, 1933.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: I happened to arrive in Washington this morning to keep an appointment, and while here my attention was called to certain statements made by Senator BLACK on the floor of the Senate in connection with the salary paid the president of the New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co. As I happen to be the president of that company, I naturally am quite familiar with the amount that is paid. I am sure Senator BLACK would not wish the RECORD to set forth statements which are not borne out by the facts, and with a view to enabling you to correct a wrong impression that can easily be created by what was put in the RECORD, I desire to submit the following facts.

The New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co. does not now and at no time has it paid me a sum as great as the minimum fixed in the so-called "Black amendment." At the present time, the New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co. pays me an annual salary of $12,825, and the expenses incurred by me for a period covering from 1929 to 1932 have never been in excess of $1,100 per annum, which covers from one to three trips annually to Cuba and to Mexico, railroad fares, hotels, taxis, telephone calls, etc. For the same period fees paid to me for attendance at directors' meetings have never exceeded $220 per annum.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand the report made to the special committee to investigate air and ocean mail contracts by the New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co. in answer to a questionnaire sent by that special committee to the New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co. It purports to state the truth. In answer to paragraph 6, section A, asking for a list of the officers of that particular company and their salaries where over $7,500 a year were paid appears the name of Mr. Franklin D. Mooney. It shows that he received a salary from that particular company for the year 1932 of $12,943.75. Mr. Mooney states that it was $12,825. This report shows that his salary for that year was $12,943.75, with an expense account of $1,099.

The question in paragraph 6, section C, reads as follows:

Q. State what officers, agents, or employees of yours, while your mail contract has been in force, held offices, positions, or employment with any other persons, firms, or corporations; their duties, salaries, and/or bonuses paid to them during said such time by such persons, firms, or corporations. In answering these questions it is desired that you set out specifically and clearly all directorates, offices, and positions held in other companies or corporations by any of your officers and/or directors during 1932 and 1933, with the compensation received by them from each.

In answer to that question appears the name of Mr. Franklin D. Mooney heading the list.

For the Atlantic Gulf & West Indies Line, which is the holding company for all of the subsidiaries and which has borrowed considerable money from the Government, according to the report, the salary for the year 1929 was $75,000, for the year 1930, $35,000; for the year 1931, $14,375; and for the year 1932 the salary was $12,943.75.

Under the name of the New York & Porto Rico Steamship Co., another one of the affiliates and subsidiaries, appears a salary for Mr. Mooney of $12,943.75 for the year 1932.

Under the name of the Clyde Mallory Line, for the year 1932, there appears the name of Mr. Franklin D. Mooney with an additional salary of $25,887.50.

While it is true that the report from the particular company which he mentions in his letter shows only an additional salary of $700, it will be noted that all of these are connected with each other and connected with the subsidy.

In that connection it might be of interest to call attention to the fact that on page 8 of the annual report made December 31, 1932, for the Atlantic Gulf & West Indies Line, appears this statement, it being recalled that I referred to dividends a few days ago:

Goodwill and franchise, book value, $11,806,752.37.

Also in the same report on page 6 appears this statement:

It will be noted on reference to the balance sheet there are mortgage notes in favor of the United States Government amounting to $223,233, payment of which has been postponed.

This was during the year 1932 when these salaries were paid. It will also be noted that on page 9 of the same report appears this statement:

United States Government loans under American Merchant Marine Act of 1920:

Loans not yet due, $12,234,817.12.

Loans due and unpaid, $223,233.

So that while they had plenty of money to pay these salaries the Government is still in the red on the interest due on its money.

PURPOSES OF FARM RELIEF ACT

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, every farmer in America will wish to read an article by the able Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. Henry A. Wallace, on the purposes of the recently enacted farm relief law, published in the New York Times of Sunday, June 4, 1933. I ask unanimous consent that this article may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of Sunday, June 4, 1933]

THE PURPOSES OF THE FARM ACT—THE IMMEDIATE TASK, SAYS THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE, IS TO REDUCE PRODUCTION BY MEANS OF THE EMERGENCY PROVISIONS; THE LONG-TIME TASK IS TO OPEN EXPORT MARKETS BY TARIFF AGREEMENTS

By Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture

The farm problem is peculiarly difficult, because the people of the United States during the past 12 years have resolutely refused to face certain fundamentals.

Almost overnight we changed from a debtor to a creditor nation. No nation in history ever made so tremendous a change so suddenly. Only now have we begun to appreciate its significance.

We went into the World War owing other nations $200,000,000 annually on interest account. We came out of that war with other nations owing us over $500,000,000 annually. Today other nations owe us annually more than a billion dollars.

Immediately after the war, therefore, we should have begun to alter our pioneer psychology and our national policies from those of a debtor to those of a creditor nation. Europe owed us money, which in the long run she could repay only in goods and services. If we wanted Europe to pay her debts to us, we should logically have encouraged her to ship goods here.

We did not do so. Instead we increased our tariffs and stimulated an increase in manufactured exports. And when a creditor nation increases its excess of exports over imports by such devices there is bound to come a time of most serious trouble.

TWO DIRECTIONS AT ONCE

The dilemma of a nation trying to go two different directions at the same time was successfully hidden from the American people, because from 1921 to 1929 we lent foreign nations vast sums with which to buy our exports and pay installments on their debt to us. When we stopped lending money the crash was bound to come.

Our refusal to behave as a creditor nation logically should, has been particularly disastrous to agriculture. We normally export more than half our cotton, nearly half our tobacco, a fifth of our wheat, and from a third to a half of our packing-house lard. Of all agricultural products we have exported 18 percent, on the average, during the last 20 years, whereas of our nonagricultural products we have exported only 5 percent. Thus our relationship with foreign nations is three times as important to agriculture as it is to industry. Our failure since the World War to learn to act as a creditor nation sooner or later must, has cost agriculture more than three times as much as it has cost industry.

Had the United States been properly awake to our new responsibilities as a creditor nation, particularly as they affected agriculture, we should have begun soon after the war to adjust our national policy to the changed world situation. We should preferably have permitted imports in order that we might export on a sound basis.

Or if we were determined upon a course of aggressive economic nationalism, as we evidently were, we should in all fairness have helped agriculture adjust itself to that course. In conformity with that course, all through the past decade we should have been gradually adjusting the acreage of our staple crops, of which we produce an export surplus, to the new-demand situation. At least 30,000,000 acres, perhaps as much as 50,000,000 acres, should then have been taken out of production. Actually, of course, our acreage of harvested crops changed but little, and a sudden spurt of efficiency served only to make the total situation worse.

FACTS MUST NOW BE FACED

Today, years after we should have taken action, we are faced with the absolute necessity—not merely the desirability—of adjusting our agriculture to the market that actually exists, and of doing it as rapidly as is humanly possible. We have no choice but to face bitter facts, to admit frankly that we cannot sell wheat and lard to nations that have established high tariffs and trade restrictions, and that cannot remove those restrictions until and unless they are permitted to exchange their own products for the products of other nations.

To do swiftly the thing which should have been done gradually over the past dozen years is an enormously difficult job. Yet that is the task set for the new Farm Adjustment Act. I think it can be done, but it will take the whole-hearted cooperation of everyone.

I am quite aware of the possibilities for reclaiming some of that lost export market for farm products by reciprocal tariffs, but, speaking as a realist, I also know that the consequences of such changes, as measured by definite increases in imports over exports, will become evident rather slowly. I am of the opinion that it is going to be very difficult to import into the United States, at any time within the next 3 or 4 years, a sufficient volume of goods to take care of our creditor position and at the same time furnish adequate purchasing power at a fair price for our surplus farm products. Meanwhile, it is only common sense to let our trade conform to the realities of world markets. That is a major reason for the machinery of the Farm Adjustment Act.

A TWOFOLD TASK

Our immediate task then is to accomplish this emergency adjustment of production to demand through the operation of the new act. Our long-time task is to reduce barriers and impediments to international trade so that American farmers may again, if it is possible, profit by the natural advantages which our agriculture has in the production of several important products. The two tasks are not in conflict; the machinery of the Farm Adjustment Act can serve the needs of expansion as well as it can the needs of contraction; it is only common sense to be prepared to move either way with the necessary dispatch.

The immediate reason for the new Farm Act is, of course, the wide disparity between the prices of the things the farmer sells and the things he buys, and the resultant damage that disparity has done to farm buying power and thereby to our whole economic system. In March, farm products had only one half of their pre-war exchange value for things the farmer buys, and for paying debts they were worth only a fourth to a third as much as when the bulk of the farm-mortgage debt was incurred. So far as exchange value is concerned, the chart on this page reveals the disparity that has existed ever since 1921 and that has become ruinous within the past 3 years.

FARM PURCHASING POWER

The implications of this disparity were largely ignored by our industrial and financial leaders until very recently. But when the market for industrial products dwindled, both at home and abroad, the importance of the farm market to industry was driven home. When loans on farm property began to fail, destroying the foundation of many financial institutions and threatening others hitherto thought impregnable, financiers came to see the importance of the farmer's purchasing power to other economic groups. Then it was realized that the prolonged agricultural depression really had the significance to national welfare which farm leaders had insisted upon for 12 long years, even during the years when industry prospered despite low purchasing power on the farm.

As a leading financial journal pointed out a few days ago, farmers consume, on an average, about $6,000,000,000 worth of manufactured goods a year, but they can't achieve that average when their gross income is down to $5,000,000,000, as it was in 1932. That tragically low income explained why their expenditures for farm machinery in 1932 were about 16 percent and for trucks and automobiles 15 percent of the 1929 buying.

There is at present, therefore, a genuine disposition to work toward a balance between our major producing groups. There is a realization, I believe, that the very basis of national prosperity lies in the ability of all our people to exchange their goods and services at prices sufficient to maintain a decent standard of living for all.

The Farm Adjustment Act uses the pre-war years of 1909–14 as the base period or the period of fair exchange value. That period was chosen because it represents the most satisfactory exchange relationship between major producing groups that this country has achieved within the past hundred years. It is important to note that price relationships, rather than absolute prices, are the measure. If wheat at $1 a bushel and shoes at $3 a pair be considered a satisfactory exchange relationship for both wheat grower and shoe manufacturer, it is obvious that wheat at 50 cents, with shoes down only to $2.50 a pair, is immediately unfair to the wheat grower and in the long run disastrous to the shoe manufacturer; on the other hand, wheat at $2 and shoes at $3 might be unfair to the shoe manufacturer and ultimately disastrous to the wheat grower. What we seek is even-handed justice.

To remove the disparity between farm and industrial prices, the act states that it is the policy of Congress to establish, as rapidly as is feasible, but having due regard to the interests of consumers, such balance between the production and consumption of agricultural commodities, and such marketing conditions, as will restore the purchasing power of farm products to the base period.

POWERS CONFERRED BY CONGRESS

The administrators of the act have the power to provide for reductions of acreage or production of the basic agricultural commodities by means of voluntary agreements with producers and to provide for rental or benefit payments in such amounts as may be necessary. The basic commodities named in the act are wheat, cotton, corn, hogs, milk and its products, tobacco, and rice.

The second group of powers delegated by Congress enables the Farm Adjustment Administration to enter into marketing agreements with processors and distributors of any agricultural commodity or product thereof, provided it is in the current of interstate or foreign commerce.

And the third grant of power, closely allied to the second, provides that the Farm Adjustment Administration may issue licenses permitting the above-mentioned processors and distributors to engage in the handling, in the current of interstate or foreign commerce, of any agricultural commodity or product thereof or any competing commodity or product thereof. Such licenses shall be subject to whatever terms and conditions are necessary to eliminate unfair practices and to effect the restoration of normal economic conditions.

Revenue for benefit payments to farmers and for administrative expenses will be obtained from processing taxes. The tax may be at a rate sufficient to yield the difference between the current average farm prices of the commodity and the price necessary to raise farm purchasing power to the base level. But if such a rate would cause a decline in domestic consumption or a fall in the farm price of the commodity, the rate of tax may be fixed at a point that will prevent these results.

FLEXIBILITY PROVIDED

These are broad powers, granted to meet an emergency, and to be used with the greatest discretion. They permit flexibility, an obvious necessity in a measure dealing with so diverse an industry as agriculture and with such variable matters as price relationships and supply and demand situations. Rigidity is just as unwise in legislation affecting economic interests as it is impossible in the economic system itself.

The intent of these powers has been aptly described by the President as a partnership between government on the one hand and agriculture and industry on the other. If farmers and processors and distributors wish to adjust production and distribution to the market that actually exists, if they desire to get rid of cutthroat competition, they have an opportunity within the terms of this act.

They are asked to relinquish that part of their traditional freedom of action which has violated the rights of others, and only that part; in return, they receive the assistance of the Government in bringing order out of chaos, and they build a foundation for economic stability in a new economic situation. Both producer and processor are enabled to do a thing they have long known ought to be done, but which has been impossible without Government assistance. They have, in this new measure, as in the pending industrial recovery bill, a method of self-government by which they can bring competition under collective control.

ADMINISTRATIVE CHIEFS

Obviously the administration of this new piece of social machinery is all-important. Accordingly, the first job has been to select the best men available to operate it, and to shape the policies and procedure which will guide it. In George N. Peek as administrator, Charles J. Brand as coadministrator, and Chester C. Davis as production administrator, I believe we have men uncommonly well qualified for the task. They bring the necessary understanding of farming and of the processing and distributing trades; they have proved their administrative skill in many important capacities, and through many years they have demonstrated their devotion to the cause of agriculture. These men are representative of that valiant group which has zealously and consistently sought to realize, in legislation and in other ways, the very genuine interdependence of agricultural and national welfare.

The ink was hardly dry on the President's signature on the Farm Adjustment Act before producers and handlers of dairy products were reaching a tentative marketing agreement on prices, margins, and production in the Chicago area. Representatives of Cincinnati and Boston milk sheds have since been conferring with us, and others are on their way. When the producers and distributors in a given area come to an agreement on what should be done to prevent ruinous competition, to raise the price to the producer, and at the same time to protect the consumer's interest, we shall be prompt to submit that agreement to a public hearing and, if it is proven legal and wise, become a party to it.

The extent to which marketing agreements will be employed and on what commodities cannot, of course, be foretold. They offer distinct possibilities—in dealing with dairy products, for instance. Marketing agreements may be used on other commodities to supplement a program of acreage reduction.

ACREAGE REDUCTION

I do not see how we can avoid some reduction in acreage or production. It will be difficult; but in the face of the existing supply-and-demand situation, there is no alternative. The recent sensational rise in the prices of wheat and cotton and corn is comforting, but its stimulating effect on planting is not so comforting. Furthermore, we still have that 13,000,000-bale carryover of American cotton and a 360,000,000-bushel carryover of wheat.

We have been blessed with some extraordinarily bad weather in the winter-wheat belt, and the outlook for that crop is the worst it has been in 20 years. Prospects are for a winter-wheat crop of 337,000,000 bushels, as compared with a normal crop of about 580,000,000 bushels. Probably the total wheat crop in the United States this year will not exceed 600,000,000 bushels, as compared with an average of about 850,000,000 bushels.

That might let us breathe much easier, and relieve us of the necessity for reducing acreage next fall, were it not for the carryover of 360,000,000 bushels and the stimulus of the recent rise in price to increased planting. The probabilities are that the total wheat supplies next August will be about average. Unfortunately, because we are a creditor Nation, and because our wheat prices are now more than 20 cents above world parity, our export market for wheat is practically nonexistent. Unless we engage in a program of acreage reduction next fall, the summer of 1934 will again find the wheat grower in serious trouble.

DECREASE IN THE USE OF CORN

The corn-and-hog situation is in some ways even more troublesome. There are about 20,000,000 surplus acres of corn in the United States. We have today about 11,000,000 fewer horses and mules on the farms and in the cities than we had 20 years ago. These vanished horses and mules ate the product of about 15,000,000 acres of corn land. The people of the United States today eat about 100,000,000 bushels less corn than they did 20 years ago; thus we have lost the market for another 3,000,000 acres of corn land. Hogs today consume about 200,000,000 bushels less than they did in the past because farmers have been taught by the State experiment stations and the United States Department of Agriculture to utilize more efficient methods of feeding.

All in all, there has been lost, during the past 20 years, the market for more than 20,000,000 acres of corn. The corn-products companies which make corn sirup, corn sugar, corn oil, etc., and certain industries which use corn products for lacquering automobiles, use the product of only one or two million more acres than they formerly did. Probably the corn surplus would have brought matters to a head before this had it not been that the 1930 corn crop was the shortest in 29 years, and the 1931 crop was much below normal.

I can see trouble of the most desperate kind ahead for the corn, wheat, and cotton farmers, therefore, unless they are willing, with the centralizing help of the Government, to accept their fair share of the responsibility for helping the United States to act as a creditor Nation sooner or later must act.

To take enough acres out of production will take a considerable sum of money. This money must be obtained, under the act, from a processing tax. Some of this tax must necessarily be paid by the consumer. It is worth noting, however, that a tax of 40 cents a bushel on wheat (in the form of flour), which might serve to increase the income of the wheat farmer nearly 100 percent, would only increase the price of a loaf of bread by about 15 percent, or a cent a pound.

PROTECTING THE CONSUMER

Definite safeguards for the consumer are written into the bill. It is provided that no higher percentage of the consumer's dollar shall go to the farmer than was the case before the war. It is furthermore provided that whenever any tax is levied the Secretary of Agriculture shall make public such information as he deems necessary concerning the relationship between the processing tax and the price paid to the producers. That, coupled with the licensing provisions of the act, should prevent any serious pyramiding of the tax.

Nevertheless, it is recognized that if the farm bill is to be a complete success, there must be an increase in consumer purchasing power. Consumers, though at the present time they are paying farmers for food only about 60 percent as much as they normally should, probably feel that they are completely unable to pay more. It is important, therefore, that the measures now pending for a public-works program and a revival of private industry accompany the Farm Act in attacking the depression. The increased farm buying power brought about by the Farm Adjustment Act should, after a few months, decrease city unemployment materially, but nothing less than the whole administration program will suffice to meet the emergency.

In the solution of the farm problem it is important that we restore farm purchasing power by every means at our command. But it is also important that, in our desire to see prices go up we do not deceive ourselves concerning the true nature of the market. In the long run inflation will not increase the purchasing power of Europe for our surplus farm products. Reciprocal tariffs will not by themselves be sufficient. Agreements with the processors, no matter how skillfully they may be supervised, will help only a little if we disregard the fundamental problem of cutting our acreage to fit the fact that we are now a creditor nation.

PROTECTION OF GOVERNMENT RECORDS—APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREE

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, because of the necessary absence of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] on Government business, the conference committee on H.R. 4220, pertaining to Government records, has not met. As the absence of the Senator from Nevada will be prolonged, it is suggested that some member of the Committee on Foreign Relations be appointed in his stead.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] served on the subcommittee which collaborated in the preparation of the Senate substitute or draft; and while I have not had an opportunity to confer with the other members of the committee, I suggest his appointment as a member of the conference committee instead of the Senator from Nevada.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Texas will be appointed a conferee in place of the Senator from Nevada. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not want to object to the appointment at all. I think it a most appropriate one. I think it appropriate, too—and of this I shall have more to say perhaps during the day, at any rate on some conference report—that it ought always to be the case when a matter of importance goes to conference that those who sit in the conference are friends of the particular measure or friends of the particular amendment that may be in question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I say in reply to what the Senator from California has just stated that as the committee is now constituted it is composed of members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee who drafted the Senate substitute for the House bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is exactly why I think the appointments are most appropriate. For instance, it would be, I think, wholly inappropriate were I asked to serve, because I was not in sympathy particularly with the measure. That is a question that ultimately I intend to present to the Senate, perhaps not today or in this special session; but some time, if I continue in the body, and if I live long enough, I expect to present an amendment to the rules which will provide that no Senator shall sit upon a conference committee on any bill, any amendment, or any measure who is not friendly to the bill, the amendment, or the measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Chair may be permitted to make a statement in this connection, the general rule is for the Chair to appoint conferees; but the custom has been, so the Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian, that the Chair appoints the conferees named by the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Chair has been quite right in that practice. Not only that, but our custom has been—and no one can complain of it, because it has grown into a set rule—that the Senators appointed upon a conference committee are appointed by reason of their precedence and their rank in the membership of the committee having charge of the bill.

ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by former Representative Cleveland A. Newton, of Missouri, at the chamber of commerce meeting, St. Louis, Mo., May 23, 1933, on the subject of the St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

If the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Treaty is ratified in its present form, it will provide a 27-foot channel for seagoing vessels from all the Great Lakes cities direct to the world markets, while it will make impossible a commercially useful waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. The Panama Canal imposed a heavy burden upon commerce and industry in the Mississippi Valley, and to provide a seagoing canal for Canada and the Great Lakes cities without providing a commercially useful waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf will tremendously increase that burden.

Fort Williams and Port Arthur on the north shore of Lake Superior constitute the largest wheat port in the world. The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway will make low-cost water transportation available direct from the great wheat fields of Canada to the world market at Liverpool. Without a commercially useful waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf the wheat farmers of Iowa, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, and other States in the Mississippi Valley will be unable to compete in world markets.

This treaty proposes to surrender to Canada and to Great Britain sovereignty over Lake Michigan. Lake Michigan is an American lake. It is entirely within the American watershed. At the nearest point it is more than 70 miles from the Canadian border, and this is the first time since our Government was founded that any responsible official in Washington has ever indicated a willingness to surrender sovereignty over this all-American lake.

For more than 80 years water from Lake Michigan has flowed down the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers to the Gulf. For more than 20 years we have diverted approximately 10,000 cubic feet per second. Canada has recognized this diversion, and during the negotiations leading up to the treaty of 1910 the Canadians recommended that the United States limit the diversion at Chicago to 10,000 second-feet. They urged that such a limit be written into the treaty of 1910, but Elihu Root, then Secretary of State, refused to permit any reference in the treaty to this all-American lake. Mr. Root insisted that our sovereignty be preserved. The Senate sustained him. The proposed treaty should not be ratified unless our continued sovereignty over Lake Michigan is assured.

We have had years of propaganda telling the public that diversion at Chicago was draining the Lakes. Hydraulic engineers universally agree that a diversion of 10,000 cubic feet per second lowered the levels of the Lakes less than 6 inches; that the lowering was complete within 3 years after the diversion began and that if the diversion is continued for a thousand years there will be no further lowering. Lake levels rise and fall in cycles of approximately 10 years, governed by the rainfall and melting snow. The levels of the Lakes 3 years ago were higher than they had been in 70 years, showing conclusively that the diversion at Chicago is not draining the Lakes.

Congress has authorized an expenditure of $3,700,000 for the construction of compensating works in the Lakes. These works will retard the flow of the water from each lake with the result that the levels of the Lakes will be raised 18 inches. At our own expense, we will not only restore the 6 inches resulting from a 10,000 second-feet diversion at Chicago but we will add 12 inches more. General Pillsbury, Assistant Chief of Engineers of the War Department, while testifying before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, stated that a diversion of 30,000 feet per second could be compensated for without injury to navigation.

An adequate diversion for an all-American waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf will in no way injure navigation either upon the Lakes or down the St. Lawrence. The channels of the Great Lakes were originally 7 feet. The channels and harbors of the Great Lakes, at the expense of the United States, have been deepened to 21 feet. It is now proposed to increase the depth of the channels and harbors of the Great Lakes to 27 feet and all at the expense of the United States. The channel down the St. Lawrence is now 14 feet. It is proposed by the treaty, largely at the expense of the United States, to increase that channel to 27 feet. Now, while we are increasing the depth of the Lakes and the St. Lawrence by approximately 20 feet, the proponents of this treaty are endeavoring to make a commercially useful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway impossible on the pretext that the diversion necessary for such waterway has lowered the levels of the Lakes 5½ inches.

We can have a 27-foot waterway in the Great Lakes and down the St. Lawrence, and a commercially useful 9-foot waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf, without injury to navigation anywhere. The only damage which cannot be repaired is this: The water which is necessary to insure a commercially useful waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf cannot be used to turn the turbines of the power companies down the St. Lawrence. I cannot understand why any good American should not be more interested in creating low-cost water transportation through the great interior of this country than in producing power down the St. Lawrence in Canada.

There are certain glaring inequities in this treaty which should be corrected before the treaty is ratified. The new work required to build the seaway provided for in the treaty calls for an estimated expenditure of $105,274,000 by Canada and $225,061,000 by the United States. The actual cost may be much greater. This will create 5,000,000 horsepower of electricity, 1,000,000 of which will belong to the United States and 4,000,000 to Canada. This inequity should be corrected before the treaty is ratified.

Under the treaty of 1910 the Canadians were allowed to take 36,000 cubic feet of water per second out of the Lakes upon the Canadian side while we were limited to 28,000 second-feet on the American side. If the new treaty goes into effect Canada will be authorized to take 41,000 second feet from the Lakes upon the Canadian side while we will be limited to 22,000 second-feet on the American side. This is another inequity which ought to be corrected before the treaty is ratified.

Under the terms of the treaty the American money which is to be expended in Canadian territory must be used to employ Canadian labor, Canadian engineers, and to supply Canadian material. This means that during these times of unemployment $55,000,000 of American money will be expended in Canada for Canadian labor and material. This is another inequity which should be removed from the treaty before it is ratified.

For more than 80 years we have been diverting water from Lake Michigan. For more than 20 years we have been diverting approximately 10,000 cubic feet per second. If the treaty is ratified in its present form this diversion will be reduced to 1,500 cubic feet per second annual average, which means that during the flood season large quantities of lake water will be diverted to prevent the pollution of the Chicago River from flowing into the lake. During the navigation season of June, July, August, September, October, and November the diversion will be reduced to approximately 400 second-feet.

Chief Justice Hughes, as special master in the Chicago Diversion case, found from the testimony that the most modern sewerage treatment would not eliminate more than 85 percent of the impurities of the Chicago sewage. This means that with the installation of the latest purification equipment known to science there will be turned into this Illinois waterway, from Chicago alone, pollution equal to the raw sewage of 680,000 people. In addition to this the raw sewage of cities along the canal and down the Illinois River, such as Joliet, Utica, Ottawa, LaSalle, Peoria, Beardstown, and many other municipalities will be pouring into this Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway.

If the proposed treaty goes into effect the Illinois waterway will comprise a series of stagnant pools containing pollution equal to the raw sewage of more than a million people. Imagine the health of the people who live adjacent to that river. Imagine the pollution of the air through which the navigator must pass with his cargo during the hot months of July, August, and September, and all because of inadequate water from Lake Michigan to provide a commercially useful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway.

Scientists tell us that if the diversion at Chicago is limited to 1,500 second-feet this poisonous pollution will saturate the entire Illinois River and will soon be pouring into the Mississippi only a few miles above the waterworks at St. Louis, and all because the diversion will have been shut down at Chicago in order to provide more water to turn the turbines of the power companies down the St. Lawrence.

The Rivers and Harbors Act of July 3, 1930, provided for a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway. In that act Congress directed that after such waterway is in operation the Secretary of War shall study its needs, determine the amount of diversion necessary to make it commercially useful and report his conclusions back to Congress on or before July 31, 1938. This treaty nullifies a solemn provision of an act of Congress and should not be ratified in its present form.

This treaty should not be ratified until its inequities have been corrected, until American rights have been protected, until this menace to American health has been removed, until the markets of the American farmer have been safeguarded, until a commercially useful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway has been provided, until provision is made whereby American money goes to American labor, and American sovereignty over Lake Michigan is preserved.

ARMS EMBARGO—VIEWS OF WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, pending on the Senate Calendar is House Joint Resolution 93, entitled "A joint resolution to prohibit the exportation of arms or munitions of war from the United States under certain conditions." When the joint resolution in its original form was in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee it was amended by the unanimous action of the committee to require a general quarantine of any war area rather than the identification of the aggressor by the United States and an embargo being applied by the United States against the aggressor alone. The amendment was made with the approval of the President of the United States at the time.

I have in my hand an amazingly lucid analysis of the entire American embargo problem from the pen of Mr. Walter Lippmann, eminent publicist. I want to read just one sentence before I ask to have the entire exhibit printed in the RECORD. Referring to the possibility of the identification of an aggressor by our Government and then the application of an embargo upon our responsibility against that aggressor, as was the original concept in the House resolution, Mr. Lippmann said:

> But even if the responsibility were not too great a one for the United States to assume, it is certainly too great a one for any President alone to assume.

I think Mr. Lippmann completely expresses the majority viewpoint of the American people in this aspect. Certainly he bespeaks American tradition. Because of Mr. Lippmann's own standing and because he frequently favors internationalistic thought and is often an administration oracle, and particularly because of the cogent fashion in which he has submitted the matter, I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD. We want peace partnerships, Mr. President, but we do not want war partnerships.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For some time there has been a resolution before Congress that would have authorized the President to join with other powers in prohibiting the export of arms and munitions to any nation he considered a menace to world peace. The offer recently made at Geneva by the administration through Mr. Davis does not literally depend upon this resolution. But practically it does.

The peoples of Europe would regard the offer as of little value if all that it meant was that Congress would in each case have to make the decision whether the United States would or would not assist the blockade against the "aggressor."

The Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate has now reported the resolution with an amendment that provides that the President may lay an embargo only against all the parties in the conflict. He may not single out the aggressor nation, lay an embargo against it, and continue to let arms and munitions be shipped to its opponents.

Thus the Senate committee has, in effect, refused to give the President power to join in the so-called "sanctions" of peace, has refused to let him be the judge whether the United States should be neutral. For all practical purposes the amended resolution vetoes the offer recently made at Geneva.

ALL POTENCY WRUNG FROM OFFER

The offer to consult would still remain, but the offer to do something after the consultation is virtually nullified. For under the resolution as it now reads the American offer could be carried into effect only by act of Congress in each particular case.

To my mind it seems clear that to give the President the power to judge which is the aggressor nation and to join in punishing it is almost indistinguishable from giving him power to declare war. How true this is was borne in upon me last winter when I happened to be at Geneva in the critical days of the Manchurian affair. The sentiment of the smaller powers in the League was strongly in favor of declaring Japan the aggressor and of proceeding to act under article XVI of the League Covenant. What prevented this action was that Great Britain would have had to use her Navy to apply the blockade, and Great Britain had no appetite for war with Japan.

Now, if at that time the United States had been under obligation to identify the aggressor in that dispute and then to lay an embargo against Japan, the whole responsibility in the Orient would inevitably have been concentrated on us. The last and the decisive word would have been ours.

WE WOULD HAVE BEEN PRINCIPAL FOE

If we refused to declare Japan the aggressor the other great powers would have said, as in fact they did say, that they could not act under the Covenant. If, on the other hand, we did declare Japan the aggressor, it would have been the United States which had in reality set the blockade in motion, and from the Japanese point of view we should have become the principal enemy.

This practical demonstration convinced me of something I had previously only dimly suspected; namely, that to stand outside the League and yet to accept the final responsibility as to whether the League should apply force was the most dangerous way possible of attempting to organize international peace. We should be creating a situation in which responsibility would not be distributed, as President Wilson originally conceived it, among the members of the League, but where the whole responsibility for what the League should do or fail to do was placed upon the United States. In any actual crisis the President would have to decide what should be done at Geneva.

TOO BIG A LOAD FOR UNITED STATES TO SHOULDER

The responsibility is too great a one for the United States to assume. As regards the Far East, it would, as I have already indicated, isolate us as the principal enemy. As regards the Continent of Europe, we should, if we persuaded nations to disarm because they expected our help, be driven into a position where any injury they would suffer because they were insufficiently armed would be chargeable to us. It is not a sound foreign policy, as I see it, to attempt to buy the specific disarmament of any nation with a vague and uncertain commitment as to what we might do in the future.

But even if the responsibility were not too great a one for the United States to assume, it is certainly too great a one for any President alone to assume. Te abrogration of neutrality is so near to being an act of war, and in great conflicts so certainly leads to war, that the decision should be fully and openly shared with Congress. If the reasons for intervening are not clear enough to convince Congress, they are not clear enough to justify the President; and if, with the issues unclarified, the American people not understanding their interest in the quarrel, the United States were drawn into war, the President might easily find himself with his own people divided.

HERE'S NUB OF WHOLE PROBLEM

The trouble with the American attempt for the last 12 months to force some measure of land disarmament in Europe has been that, until the underlying political conflicts are mitigated, the armed powers will reduce only if they receive equivalent guaranties. The recent offer at Geneva has been an attempt to provide them such guaranties and yet to keep a free hand for the United States. It cannot be done. A guaranty which would mean anything in Europe would mean the abandoning of complete liberty of action by the United States. A really free hand is no guaranty and no substitute therefore for armaments.

This dilemma cannot be resolved by a diplomatic formula which might mean one thing in Europe and another in the United States.

It is far better to be precise in these matters, to define exactly what we will do and what we will not do, and to raise no false hopes as to what commitments the American people in their present state of mind are really prepared to make and maintain.

ROBERT W. BINGHAM, AMBASSADOR TO GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, yesterday there appeared in the Washington Herald an editorial with reference to our official representation at the Court of St. James's. In the comments in the Herald editorial mention was made of some of the distinguished Americans who have occupied the high post of Ambassador to Great Britain from this country. In that connection I read the following:

Of America's representatives, many names of treasured memory are still familiar to us.

None stands higher than that of Lincoln's war minister, Charles Francis Adams. In more recent times we think of James Russell Lowell, who was spoken of in London as "the ambassador of American letters to the court of English literature."

Then came the Cleveland appointees, two noteworthy men, Phelps and Bayard, the admirable John Hay, and under President McKinley, the incomparable Joseph H. Choate. Truly a long and lustrous line.

But it looks as if the present incumbent, Robert W. Bingham, was destined to mark a violent let-down from this high standard.

There was no expectation when the Nation was surprised by his appointment that he would take his place as a natural successor of such men as we have named.

Yet the country was willing to accept him as one of the secondary figures who have occupied the office—men who have added no distinction to it, but who have not brought discredit upon it.

Even this modest claim, we fear, cannot be made for our present Ambassador.

The editorial proceeds at length strictly in point and ultimately demands the recall of this envoy who the great majority of Americans feel misrepresents the United States at the Court of St. James's.

The editorial is entitled "Who Put the Ass in Amb-ass-ador?" I ask that the entire editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Herald, Sunday, June 4, 1933]

WHO PUT THE ASS IN AMB-ASS-ADOR?

The ambassadorship to the Court of St. James's is one of the highest dignities that can come to an American, and one of the greatest offices in the President's power to bestow.

By long tradition and common consent it is deemed a recognition to be reserved for our foremost men who are qualified by training, eminent achievements in life, and loyalty to American institutions to voice our point of view in matters of mutual concern with Great Britain, in a way that is ingratiating and persuasive, to be sure, but also in terms that are truly representative of this country and its best public opinion.

England has long attached the same importance to its representation in Washington. The result has been a continuing exchange of ambassadors in which both nations took a just pride.

Of America's representatives, many names of treasured memory are still familiar to us.

None stands higher than that of Lincoln's war minister, Charles Francis Adams. In more recent times we think of James Russell Lowell, who was spoken of in London as "the ambassador of American letters to the court of English literature."

Then came the Cleveland appointees, two noteworthy men, Phelps and Bayard, the admirable John Hay, and under President McKinley, the incomparable Joseph H. Choate. Truly a long and lustrous line.

But it looks as if the present incumbent, Robert W. Bingham, was destined to mark a violent let-down from this high standard.

There was no expectation when the Nation was surprised by his appointment that he would take his place as a natural successor of such men as we have named.

Yet the country was willing to accept him as one of the secondary figures who have occupied the office—men who have added no distinction to it but who have not brought discredit upon it.

Even this modest claim, we fear, cannot be made for our present Ambassador.

In his first public utterance on assuming office he has said enough to forfeit confidence not only in this country but in England as well. He has put the question of his immediate recall high up on the list of duties pressing upon the President's attention.

To refer to the Geneva declaration of Norman H. Davis, already repudiated from one end of the country to the other, as marking a reversal of the traditional policy of the United States to keep itself free from European entanglements is about the worst break that could have been made.

The actual words used by Ambassador Bingham in associating himself with the egregious faux pas of our Geneva spokesman were: "It marked the definite deparature from principles maintained by the United States since the Nation was founded."

Not content with this statement—so fatuous as hardly to deceive for a moment even his English hearers—this blundering Ambassador proceeded to express himself on the troubled question of designating the aggressor in the event of a European conflict.

With a nonchalance that is unlooked for in a grown man, not to say one who occupies the responsible position of an Ambassador, he made the following sapient observation:

"I do not believe there is a 10-year-old child of average intelligence anywhere in the world who could fail, in the event of war, to select instantly the aggressor."

This should be interesting to the representatives of the 54 nations at Geneva who have been toiling for many weary months to evolve a practicable definition to embrace this intricate and explosive subject.

Now, what shall be done with an Ambassador who so misrepresents his country?

Not what shall be said—because a fool should never be answered according to his folly—but what shall be done?

Of course, he must be got out of the position he occupies.

He is a danger to the peace and good understanding which all Americans desire with the people of England. The latter should not be misled. As to the trend of American thought and the direction of American policy they should be protected against deception by words issuing from the mouth of a person officially clothed with the status of our Ambassador.

If there is one thing certain, it is that the United States will not directly or indirectly suffer itself to be involved in the disputes of Europe or in the diplomatic and political casuistry of its statesmen.

To promise that we will is to make a promise that has neither background in our purposes nor foundation in fact.

Its only result is to sow misunderstanding and exasperation which it is an Ambassador's primary duty to prevent and delay.

This country has already had enough of Bingham. We imagine that England has, too.

He should be recalled, and without delay.

(Editor's note)

Ass (according to Webster's dictionary), a quadruped of the genus Equus, having long ears and a shorter mane than the horse. The domestic ass is patient and slow and has become the type of obstinacy and stupidity.

2. A dull, stupid fellow; a dolt, especially one who is stubborn or stolid.

3. "A perverse fool"—Oxford English Dictionary.

REDUCTION OF VETERANS' COMPENSATION

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, there appeared in the papers a day or two ago a dispatch from Dyer, Ind., dated June 2, reading as follows:

FIRST SQUARE MEAL PROVES FATAL TO STARVING WAR VET

DYER, IND., June 2.—A substantial meal eaten after days of starvation caused the death of A. C. Faulkner, 38, Joliet, Ill., World War veteran, here today.

Faulkner was given shelter and a meal at the town jail last night. He ate ravenously.

This morning Marshal Haltman found Faulkner's body on the jail floor.

Coroner Andrew Hoffman said he died from a heart attack caused by overtaxing his stomach.

I understand the President now makes the statement that additional taxes will have to be raised to take care of the increase voted here last week for veterans' allowances. Of course, I think this statement is not altogether frank. It was said on the floor, as I remember, by the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] that a 25-percent limitation on the President's authority to cut and slash veterans' allowances would be entirely agreeable to the administration, because he did not intend to slash more than 18 to 20 percent, anyway.

If the Senator from South Carolina was correctly representing the President in that statement, then it is not necessary to raise additional revenue by taxation to meet the requirements of the legislation, which permits the President to go as high as 25 percent, if he really never meant to cut more than 18 to 20 percent.

If the President's statement made now is correct and properly represents him, namely, that we must raise more taxes to pay the additional benefits, then it means that the President from the beginning meant to be ruthless and to cut and slash and slash and cut, without regard to justice. Senators may take their choice. Either what was said by the Senator from South Carolina did not represent the President, or what the President is now quoted as having said does not correctly state his views. What the President should state frankly is that he must raise additional revenue by taxation in order to meet the enormous additional expenses he himself is creating and has asked to be provided for during the past 3 months.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to what seems to me a grave breach of the proprieties on the part of the White House secretariat.

I see on the second page of the New York Times of today two headlines in parallel columns. One is headed:

Howe to explain part in kit deal.

With that I do not care to concern myself at the present moment.

In the adjacent column there is an article reading in part as follows:

HOWE DEPLORES VETERAN-CUT LIMIT—$150,000,000 RESTORED BY THE SENATE, HE SAYS ON RADIO, WILL COST $1.25 PER CAPITA—CALLS IT BLOW TO BUDGET—PRESIDENT'S SECRETARY HOLDS THAT BALANCING HELPED STIMULATE TREND TOWARD PROSPERITY

WASHINGTON, June 4.—Every person in the United States will have to pay $1.25 more in taxes, directly or indirectly, as a result of the action of the Senate in reducing by more than $150,000,000 the proposed cuts in veterans' allowances, Col. Louis M. Howe, secretary to the President, said tonight in a radio interview.

Mr. Howe, who was heard over a National Broadcasting Co. network, declared that "you can be assured that eventually you will have to dig down and give Uncle Sam $1.25 for yourself, your Mrs., and all the kiddies, if you happen to be the head of a family, because in the long run any deficiency in the Budget has to be paid for by the people."

"Had the Budget Director's office actually struck a balance?" Mr. Howe was asked by his interviewer, Walter Trumbull.

"Yes; the Budget was really balanced", Mr. Howe replied.

I do not intend to take much time to discuss this speech by the secretary to the President. The office of Presidential secretary is one unknown to the Constitution. The President's secretary is not responsible directly to anybody in the United States except the President himself. His office is a purely ministerial one.

I do not remember any analogy to the present case. I do not remember any instance in which a secretary to the President has used his position to appeal to the people of the country on a matter of major controversy on which Congress had reached a decision contrary to that maintained by the secretary to the President. I think it is a very unfortunate example to hand down to posterity.

It is a grave question as to whether coordinate branches of the Government should appeal to the people of the United States against each other. That, however, is rather a broader question than the one with which I am immediately concerned. Certainly if there is such a controversy it is not the duty of a secretary, clerk, or stenographer to present it to the people of the United States.

And think for a moment, Mr. President, of the nature of this appeal! Here are 200,000, perhaps 250,000, men who served their country in time of need, who have been discriminated against, who have been persecuted, by regulations handed down by an administrative bureau. On Friday last the Senate of the United States decided that this thing had gone too far, resumed into its own hands to some extent the authority which it had previously delegated, and decided that these men ought not to be treated in the way in which the Veterans' Administration had decided to treat them. What the Senate did was either just or unjust. If it was unjust, let us be shown the nature of that injustice. If it was just, is it fair to appeal to the people of the United States on the mere ground that such a measure of justice will cost each one of them $1.25?

If anybody at the time of the World War had suggested that justice to the men whom we were then sending into the service would depend on whether or not the taxpayer cared to spend an extra dollar and a quarter, he would have been hooted from one end of the country to the other, and would have been fortunate to escape lynching.

I do not believe the taxpayers are going to be bound by any such considerations as that. Is there anybody who will frankly maintain that he is not willing to pay $1.25 in order to take care of the wounded and the disabled who served this country in the hour of its need?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have in my office a letter from the mayor of Minneapolis in which he states that as a result of the administration of the recent rule regarding veterans' compensation, 2,000 veterans' families in Minneapolis will be placed upon the public charity rolls, to be taken care of by the local taxpayers.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, that is exactly the situation we are facing all over the country. Even if these cases were unjustly on the rolls, somebody will have to take care of them. We are not improving the financial situation of the United States by allowing these men to be taken care of by local charity, which comes out of the property tax, rather than allowing them to be paid for by the Federal taxpayers through their income tax and other methods of Federal taxation.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It is a Federal debt.

Mr. CUTTING. The Senator from Minnesota reminds me that this is a Federal debt, and of course it is. It was the United States that drafted these men into the service, and it is the United States which is bound to take care of them.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is the Senator referring to the first of the radio broadcasts which the President's secretary is making in the hour previously occupied by Mr. David Lawrence?

Mr. CUTTING. I cannot tell the Senator who previously occupied the hour; but the President's secretary took it last night, and, I understand, is going to continue to make speeches in that hour.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Very good. If the Senator is justified in raising a question respecting the ethics of this type of broadcast, it will be particularly interesting to know what the nature of Mr. Howe's own contract with the radio broadcasting company is, and whether or not he is compensated for doing the thing against which the Senator complains; because, if he is, and in any such amount as is commonly understood, the situation becomes doubly aggravated.

Mr. CUTTING. I quite agree with the Senator. I think the point he has raised is very pertinent. I am unable, of course, to answer the Senator's question; but I think it is something that ought to be gone into.

If the President's secretary is to make money on the outside by giving personal reminiscences or accounts of the routine work at the White House or other matters with which he is acquainted, that is something with which we have no particular concern; but when he attempts to discuss public affairs, I think it is a matter which very directly concerns us and everyone else in the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I make one further inquiry?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have not seen the full text of the radio address, and I did not hear it. If Mr. Howe was pleading for economy, I am wondering if in the course of his observations he made any reference to the conservation-kit contract, which apparently was not in the nature of economy and which apparently cost the taxpayers at least a few cents each, and a contract with which he seems to be rather intimately related.

Mr. CUTTING. I said previously that he explains that contract in a parallel column on the same page of the New York Times, but not in the same connection.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico if he knows what compensation Mr. Howe receives for these broadcasts?

Mr. CUTTING. I have not the slightest idea. I am sorry I cannot satisfy the Senator.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. CUTTING. I do.

Mr. LONG. Inasmuch as the Senator has been interrupted, as I take the article, without being offended by it, it is in the nature of an instruction coming directly from one of the President's secretaries. That is rather a high order of instruction. We are rather fortunate to get the instruction of a secretary at this stage of the matter.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUTTING. I do.

Mr. SCHALL. Apropos of the Senator's remark, I am informed that the Legislature of the State of Minnesota recently appropriated $75,000 to take up the cuts recently made by the President.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I do not know as to that; but I can assure the Senator that if the Legislature of Minnesota does not do something of that sort the only salvation for those men will be the kind of legislation which we passed last Friday.

Mr. SCHALL. They appropriated $750,000.

Mr. CUTTING. I am glad to hear that they did it; but there are a great many States which are totally unable to do anything of the sort. Furthermore, as the Senator's colleague just said, this is a Federal obligation and not a State obligation.

Mr. President, we are informed that the office of the Director of the Budget has actually struck a balance, and that that balance is going to be completely done away with by the action of the Congress the other day. As the Senator from Michigan suggested just now, perhaps some of this money which has been added to the pay rolls of the Government might have been saved by greater economy in organizing and equipping the conservation camps. At any rate, the fact remains that the President's Secretary is not appealing to the country against the conservation-camp bill on the ground that that will add $1.25 or $1.50 to the tax roll of every citizen of the United States. The only time when any such appeals are made is when the money is taken out of the veterans or Government employees. That is when we hear so much about balancing the Budget.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CAREY. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from New Mexico to the fact that it was testified at the hearings the other day, when we were investigating the purchase of these kits, that the director of these conservation camps—who, I understand, never drew a very large salary before—has a salary of $12,000 a year; that he is furnished with a Cadillac car and a chauffeur; and that he has three assistants, each drawing $7,000 a year, which I consider a very fair salary, considering these cuts.

Also, I have heard that the widows of these men, if they are killed in the camps, will receive as much as the widow of an Army officer who has served in the Army all his life, or who has been killed in war.

Mr. CUTTING. I thank the Senator for that information. I had not meant to go into any question other than the one which I originally took up; but I do want to say just a word about this question, which we have been hearing about for so many years, of balancing the Budget.

Whenever the Budget is balanced at the expense of the purchasing power of the people, the Budget unbalances itself within the next week or so.

Mr. BLACK. If the argument is sound that the fact that each man theoretically would be saved $1.25 by the failure of the enactment of this measure, of course, it would necessarily follow that probably each citizen would be saved $2.50 if we do away with all compensation whatever to every soldier and put them all out of the hospitals.

Mr. CUTTING. Yes, Mr. President; and may I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that we could go farther and cut out all governmental activities whatever and have no taxation at all?

Mr. BLACK. Of course, we might go still farther and repeal the $500,000,000 appropriation. If the imposition of $170,000,000 additional in taxes would save them $1.25 apiece, repealing the $500,000,000 appropriation would save them nearly $3 apiece.

Mr. CUTTING. It is very easy to balance the Budget by having income nil and expenditures nil. That is the way about 13,000,000 people in the United States are balancing their own personal budgets today. I do not think that is the kind of budget balancing the Congress of the United States should be advised to carry out for the benefit of this Nation.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, did we not have the assurance of the Senator in charge of the independent offices bill that the President himself intended to do the very things which the Senate, by its vote, has provided shall be done in relation to the treatment of veterans, and is it not true that no mention was made at that time about unbalancing the Budget?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes, Mr. President; that is quite true, and that is the point which really is vital in this whole matter.

The question is whether it is fair or unfair. The question is not whether it temporarily unbalances the Budget, because the Budget is going to continue to be unbalanced until we can find some way of building up purchasing power in this country. The kind of balance we need is a balance between the productive capacity of the country and the purchasing power of its citizenship, and that is not going to be brought about by making unjustifiable cuts at the expense of the poorest members of the community.

Mr. President, I have in my hand an article from the Philadelphia Record, which I ask to have read at the desk, because it puts this point more clearly than I can put it at the moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

ONLY ONE WAY

There is only one way to increase mass purchasing power, and that is to place more money in the hands of the people.

Mass purchasing power will not be increased by balancing the Budget at the expense of veterans and Government employees.

It will not be increased by levying new taxes.

For the Government to launch a program of public works and credit expansion while imposing new taxes and balancing the Budget at the expense of the masses, is economic folly.

The Record is glad that Senator McADOO has recognized this fallacy, and that he calls for financing the public-works program by inflation.

"I do not see any reason", he declares, "why the American people should not use their credit for their own benefit instead of for the benefit of bankers and investors in tax-exempt securities.

"The proposed bond issue (for public works) will be exempt from all taxes—national, State, and local."

Senator McADOO joins the Record in calling for direct discounting of Treasury notes by the Federal Reserve banks to finance the public-works program.

This would be creation of new credit to fill the gap left by the 21-billion shrinkage of bank deposits since 1929.

The present plan, flotation of Government bonds by public sale, merely diverts existing credit to Government use. It creates no new credit except as such Government bonds may later be used as collateral for rediscounting with the Federal Reserve banks.

The Senator, as President Wilson's war-time Secretary of the Treasury, is better qualified than any other man in the country to discuss the kind of financing needed to fight the depression as we fought the war.

Close to $200,000,000 a year would be saved on interest by this method.

New deflationary and business-curbing taxes would be avoided.

The inflationary action would sustain the present rise prices, industrial activity, and the markets.

If the Roosevelt administration really wants to inflate, here is its chance.

It cannot continue to deflate while attempting to inflate.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I entirely agree with what the Philadelphia Record has to say on the subject, and I entirely agree with the program announced here the other day by the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO]. My object, however, in bringing this matter up in the first place was merely to call attention to the method of procedure.

I think that the White House secretariat ought to feel itself under peculiar restraint in the way in which it communicates with the public. It will be remembered that at one time a President of the United States used the device of a "White House spokesman", which was the subject of a good deal of comment and some ridicule at the time. I do not believe we want to go back to that system of transacting the public business.

In addition to the instance which I have already called to the attention of the Senate, I should like to mention one other matter, although it may be a less serious one.

Yesterday a number of Members of the House of Representatives were called to the White House to consult with the President on the legislation passed by the Senate last Friday. The names of those Members of the House were published in every paper in the United States; I will not repeat them here.

It is well known that those who have interviews with the President are bound by an obligation of courtesy not to give the results of any interview to the public. As a consequence these Members of Congress, of course, have had no chance to state their own point of view. The article which has been published all over the country represents the point of view of the White House. I quote one paragraph:

> When the conference broke up, shortly before midnight, the members of the congressional delegation were tight-lipped about what had taken place, and indicated that they would take a day or so to think the situation over. An outline of the talk was furnished by Stephen T. Early, one of the President's secretaries.

In other words, Mr. President, a purely ministerial clerk, a man unknown to the Constitution, not responsible to the voters, gives out his version of an interview which concerns the public interest, and the Members of Congress, responsible to the people, coming before the people next year to give an account of their stewardship, are unable to present their views on this same public matter.

I feel that that is an unfortunate way of transacting business. Either what went on is public, or it is private. If it is private, then none of it should have been published in the press. If it is public, both parties to the interview have the same right, I think, to give it to the people of the United States. That, of course, is to some extent a matter of opinion.

I feel that what Mr. Howe did rather transcends any question of opinion or dispute, and that no one can believe that the President's secretary ought to be discussing directly with the people of the United States an action taken by the Congress of the United States. If the President himself feels it his duty to oppose the measures which have been passed by Congress, of course he has that constitutional privilege and that constitutional duty. But whatever action the President may decide to take, he should take it on his own responsibility and in his own name. The White House secretariat might well be relegated to the same obscurity which has already come upon the White House spokesman.

Mr. NYE obtained the floor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me for just one supplemental observation?

Mr. NYE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the observations submitted by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] are highly pertinent. I want to emphasize, however, one phase which was not, it seems to me, given its proper importance.

Mr. David Lawrence has been on the air for 7 years broadcasting, without compensation, a nonpartisan, uncolored survey of the week's political news events in the Capital. He announced a week ago Sunday that his adventure was at an end, an adventure for which he deserves high praise because of its extreme accuracy and its great unselfishness. If he is now——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I only want to interrupt the Senator long enough to say that Mr. Lawrence's addresses over the radio in my judgment cannot be characterized as the Senator has characterized them. I do not want it to appear as though no one disagrees with the Senator when he says they were always fair.

Mr. VANDENBERG. At any rate, Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska will not disagree with my statement that they were rendered in a sense of public service by Mr. Lawrence——

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And were without compensation. That is the point I want to urge.

Mr. NORRIS. I take the Senator's word for that. I am not finding fault with the Senator for his view, but I do not want it to appear as though the statement made that they were unbiased was of general belief. There is at least one Senator who does not believe they were unbiased.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in my view, they were unbiased, and in everybody's view they were unpaid for. Therefore the bias, at least, if there was any, was not the result of compensation.

I think it is a rather serious contemplation when that radio hour is now delivered to the Presidential secretariat, if it is true that that is a matter of a dollars and cents compensation contract. The thing I am interrupting the Senator from North Dakota to suggest, with his permission, is that when Mr. Howe appears next as a witness in the conservation-kit controversy before the Committee on Military Affairs, he be requested, for his own sake and for our information, frankly to disclose the nature of his radio relationship with the National Broadcasting Co.

ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep Waterway Treaty can be ratified and should be ratified before this session of the Senate adjourns.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I do not yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator declines to yield for that purpose.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the great project embodied in this treaty not only has the support of States bordering on the Great Lakes, including Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, because of the great benefits it will insure in reduced transportation costs to the producers of this country, but it also has the enthusiastic backing of the great Northwestern and the Prairie and Mountain States reaching from the upper Mississippi River to the Pacific coast.

The immediate completion of this project has been pledged to the American people by both the Republican and Democratic Parties. The Republican Party, in its convention at Chicago in 1932, adopted the following plank by a unanimous vote:

> The Republican Party stands committed to the development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PATTERSON. That plank was adopted by the Republican Party prior to the time when this treaty was negotiated, was it not?

Mr. NYE. I understand it was, but has there been anything to indicate that the treaty that has been negotiated is repugnant to the Republican Party?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, indeed; there have been a number of things that have transpired since that time. Among other things, we surrendered by the treaty our sovereignty over Lake Michigan, something that we have insisted upon for more than a hundred years.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from North Dakota asks whether there is any difference between the project as the Republican Party endorsed it and the treaty now pending. I think there is one difference, and there is only one that I know of. There has been an amendment to the treaty that takes away from Mr. Mellon and his associates the perpetual right that they otherwise would have had.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. So far as the people of my State are concerned, they are not influenced in their position upon this treaty by the position of either Mr. Mellon or Mr. Morgan or anybody else. They are influenced principally by the fact that, under the terms of the treaty, we shall not have a sufficient diversion of water from Lake Michigan to establish a commercially successful waterway from Lake Michigan to the Gulf, which is of more importance to the section of country which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] represents and the section of the country which I represent and the section of the country which the Senator from North Dakota represents than is the seaway through the St. Lawrence route.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I cannot agree for a moment that the development of the Mississippi River would mean as much to my State as would the development of the St. Lawrence waterway.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Since the State of Nebraska has been mentioned, and since that State is a part of the great Mississippi Valley, if the Senator from North Dakota will permit me, I should like to say that when the Republican platform was adopted and when in two national campaigns the argument was made that a certain individual had to be elected President in order to get the St. Lawrence Canal dug, and the Republican Party endorsed it, there was not any limitation suggested in regard to the taking of water from the Great Lakes to supply a canal to the Mississippi River, but everybody believed, in those two campaigns, that the promise was made in good faith, and that we were going to have the St. Lawrence waterway. Now we are confronted with the situation that, because of a filibuster or because of some other arrangement, we are not going to get it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. At the time the plank in the Republican platform was drafted it was never even dreamed by the people of the country that our representatives were going to surrender a right that we have always claimed, of sovereignty over Lake Michigan, a purely American lake, supplied by an American watershed, and therefore there was not any reservation made in regard to it. If it had been suggested that there was a possibility of our representatives surrendering their dominion and their sovereignty over that lake, which they had asserted for more than a hundred years, then there would have been at least a fight to have had that kind of reservation made.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose if it had been known that the question was going to arise, the people of Maryland would have risen up in arms against the proposal to take water out of Lake Michigan in order to increase the navigability of the Mississippi River.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. As the Senator from Nebraska will recall, the two conventions were held before this treaty was negotiated; and in the Democratic convention—and I see the Senator from Arkansas looking through the document, and if he finds the Democratic plank in time, I will appreciate him handing it to me in order that I may quote just what we did say—we did not have any objection to letting them take pickaxes and shovels and digging a canal up there, but when it comes to negotiating a treaty under which the American people will be taxed several hundred million dollars for building a canal in Canada and at the same time internationalizing a lake which is ours and which we need in order to get water into the Mississippi River so as to afford navigation to the Gulf, that is another matter.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose at the time the Democratic platform was adopted, the Democrats did not know that the St. Lawrence River went through Canada, and that if it were developed at all, it would be necessary to go into Canada to do it.

Mr. LONG. That was perfectly all right, Mr. President; we did not object to Canada developing the St. Lawrence waterway, but we did object to the St. Lawrence waterway in Canada with Canadian labor and Canadian materials being constructed with American money, and we further did not approve of the boasted plan that they were going to take the American Lake Michigan, supplied, as the Senator from Missouri states, from American watersheds, away from us, after we had spent hundreds of millions of dollars and billions of dollars and committed ourselves to the expenditures of more hundreds of millions of dollars; that they were going to take this lake, which is necessary if we are to have a navigable river the year round, divert its waters to the St. Lawrence, make it an international lake, and in the words of the Toronto newspaper, "forever kill the hope of there being such a thing as an all-the-year-round waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf." Now, that was not contemplated; none of those things were contemplated by the Democratic platform or by the Republican platform, and Mr. Hoover would have been the interpreter of both platforms after the two were made if we should stand for this kind of a proposition.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to finish reading the Republican platform, I shall refer to the pronouncement of the Democratic convention with respect to the waterway matter. I repeat the Republican platform:

> The Republican Party stands committed to the development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway. Under the direction of President Hoover, negotiation of a treaty with Canada for this development is now at a favorable point. Recognizing the inestimable benefits which will accrue to the Nation from placing the ports of the Great Lakes on an ocean base, the party reaffirms allegiance to this great project and pledges its best efforts to secure its early completion.

At the convention of the Democratic Party the committee which drafted the platform reported a plank strongly endorsing the St. Lawrence project. That plank had been submitted with the approval of Governor Roosevelt himself, prior to his nomination for the Presidency. Through some influence, that plank was eliminated without a word of discussion on the convention floor; but, as his first act as the nominee of his party for the Presidency, Governor Roosevelt specifically pledged the immediate completion of the project embodied in the pending treaty.

On July 9, 1932, he said:

> I am deeply interested in the immediate construction of the deep waterway as well as in the development of abundant and cheap power * * *. With * * * an agreement between the Federal administration and the State of New York, it would be my hope that it would be possible to submit a treaty to the Senate for immediate and, I hope, favorable action as soon as signed * * *. Early and final action on this great public work * * * would be greatly to the public interest. It has already been too long delayed.

On July 30 Governor Roosevelt addressed the people of the entire Nation over the radio from the executive residence at Albany. In that speech he interpreted the Democratic platform, stating that it was a contract with the people and that every pledge would be faithfully carried out as written. In this address he said:

> We advocate * * * expansion of the Federal program of necessary and useful construction affected with the public interest, such as flood control and waterways, including the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes deep waterway * * *.

Thus the present administration and the Republican Party are unequivocally pledged to this great project, embodied in a treaty which has twice been favorably reported by the Foreign Relations Committee with only two dissenting votes.

For a number of years I had the honor to serve on the Committee on Public Lands with the late Senator from Montana, Thomas J. Walsh. More than any other Member of this body, he had studied the project of opening the Great Lakes to the sea, and was its leading advocate on this floor. He had studied exhaustively the effect of this project on the entire country, and had become convinced that it would be of inestimable benefit in the development not only of the States bordering on the Great Lakes but of the immense interior section lying between the Lakes and the Pacific coast. The last official act of our late colleague's life was to appear at a session of the Foreign Relations Committee to sum up the evidence presented at the hearings of that committee and to secure a favorable report on the pending treaty by an overwhelming vote.

I venture to say that this treaty has been debated at more length and has had more careful consideration in committee and in the executive departments of the Government which have dealt with it than any measure which has been considered at this session of Congress. It is a nonpartisan measure; it has been pledged by both parties.

I have made some investigation, and I am able to state on the floor today that at least two thirds of the Republican Membership in this body is ready to vote on this treaty before adjournment and to carry out the solemn pledge which was made at Chicago by the Republican Party at its convention.

If this treaty shall now fail and its consideration shall be put off for another year, it will only be because of the obstructive tactics of a very small group which seems determined to thwart the fulfillment of the pledge made by President Roosevelt. This same group offered no opposition to the railroad bill, canceling the debt of $350,000,000 owed by the railroads to the Federal Treasury. That bill was debated and passed in a single afternoon. The $350,000,000 debt of the railroads to the Public Treasury, which is canceled by that bill, would, if paid into the Treasury, pay the entire Federal cost of the St. Lawrence project, officially estimated at $168,000,000, and leave a surplus of $182,000,000, which might be expended on the development of the Missouri, the Ohio, the Mississippi, and other waterways.

The combination which has been formed to block this treaty by a filibuster is one of the strangest in the history of legislation in this body. The leader of the opposition to the treaty is the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. The defeat of the St. Lawrence project and the continued bottling up of the Middle and North West, dependent for access to the sea upon its completion, will inevitably doom the further development of the lower Mississippi River. Once we begin to legislate here on sectional grounds, we are certain to imperil flood-control measures, waterway projects, and other useful developments which have heretofore had the support of the representatives of the Middle and North West.

It is well understood from whence the opposition to this treaty comes. The Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York has been leading the fight against the St. Lawrence project for more than 10 years. It bitterly opposed the Muscle Shoals development on the Tennessee River. It has repeatedly condemned the development of the Mississippi River and the utilization of that stream for navigation purposes.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has shown that out of 1,538 members of this chamber, only 142 give an address outside of the city of New York, and not more than 10 can in any sense be considered as representing the business interests of the State of New York at large.

It has been shown that 13 of the partners of J. P. Morgan & Co. are also members of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. Junius S. Morgan, Jr., the son of J. P. Morgan, is the treasurer of the organization.

The investigation by the Banking and Currency Committee shows that on the preferred lists which have been made public, J. P. Morgan & Co. has generously distributed over 500,000 shares of stock among the membership of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York.

We of the Northwest well understand why J. P. Morgan & Co. and allied interests are opposed to the St. Lawrence project. The direct interest of Morgan in the power and public utility industry has been revealed. The completion of the St. Lawrence project means the development of 1,100,000 horsepower on the St. Lawrence River in the State of New York, to be owned and operated by the people of the State through the power authority. Morgan and associated bankers who control the Niagara-Hudson Corporation, the leading private utility of New York State, fear this public competition and are determined to block it, just as they opposed the completion of the Muscle Shoals project.

We of the Northwest also well understand the direct interest of J. P. Morgan & Co. in blocking the development of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River for navigation purposes. The leading trunk lines from New York City to Chicago are Morgan-controlled. Although this project will benefit the railroads of the entire West and South, the Morgan roads are determined to block any waterway development which will provide competition against their monopoly of transportation between Chicago and New York.

My State has for years looked forward to such advantages as would flow to it in an economic way through an outlet to the sea by way of the Great Lakes. Such an outlet would mean millions of dollars saved to North Dakota annually. One thousand five hundred miles from the Pacific, 1,500 miles from the Atlantic seaboard, 1,500 miles from the Gulf of Mexico, I think my State can be said to be farther than any other from the seaboard. When it is considered that a large part of the products of the State enter into export, it must be agreed that North Dakota would be exceedingly interested in any proposal which would lessen the transportation costs involved in the moving of our wheat, barley, and rye. Our average marketable surplus of these grains is approximately 125,000,000 bushels. The low estimate of a 3-cent saving possible through transportation through the projected St. Lawrence waterway would mean nearly $4,000,000 to my State annually on grain alone. A higher, yet conservative, estimate of savings of 6 cents per bushel possible through the completed waterway would add well over $7,000,000 to the buying power of the people of North Dakota. Alva H. Benton, of the North Dakota Agricultural College, has declared that the waterway would add sufficient millions to the people of North Dakota to equal the interest on the total United States investment in the seaway project so far as navigation outlays are concerned.

In addition to savings to be enjoyed in our production of grains, our large and increasing production of livestock, poultry, and dairy products would be in line for benefits through the waterway. Then, too, we have every right to expect that savings can be enjoyed in the matter of goods brought into the State under waterway means, aiding in the reduction of living costs within the State.

It is not difficult to understand the New York City attitude which is so adverse to ratification of the St. Lawrence treaty. That city would naturally be adverse to any proposal that would place interior points nearer to the foreign ports with which America trades. The distance from the port of New York to Liverpool is the same as the distance from Cleveland, Ohio, to Liverpool through the St. Lawrence. When that is considered, it is not difficult to understand the growth that would come to cities like Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, and Duluth with the advent of oceanic transportation into the Great Lakes. The growth of these cities would revert at once to the advantage of the great territory about them. The farmer in the Northwest would enjoy a greatly improved domestic market while improving his chances in the foreign market.

The treaty, which is on our calendar and awaiting our action, ought to be straightway acted upon and ratified. As for myself, I will gladly share any part of the responsibility which would fall upon those who might engage in uncompromising effort to keep Congress in session until the treaty is ratified. The waterway project offers too great an opportunity in our present battle to effect economic recovery to permit of continued delay in its consideration and ratification.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5012) to amend existing law in order to obviate the payment of 1 year's sea pay to surplus graduates of the Naval Academy.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 510. An act to provide for the establishment of a national employment system and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such system, and for other purposes; and

H.J.Res. 192. Joint resolution to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States.

RELIEF OF HOME OWNERS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5240) to provide emergency relief with respect to home-mortgage indebtedness, to refinance home mortgages, to extend relief to the owners of homes occupied by them and who are unable to amortize their debt elsewhere, to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, to increase the market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the home owners' loan bill (H.R. 5240) passed the House of Representatives somewhat more than a month ago, was favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, and has been on the Senate Calendar for about 2 weeks.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to enable me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague for that purpose?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FESS. I think we ought to have a quorum. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.
Ashurst	Costigan	Keyes	Russell
Austin	Cutting	King	Schall
Bachman	Dale	La Follette	Sheppard
Bailey	Dickinson	Lewis	Shipstead
Bankhead	Dieterich	Logan	Steiwer

Caraway	Hatfield	Patterson	Wheeler
Carey	Hayden	Pope	White
Clark	Hebert	Reed
Connally	Johnson	Reynolds
Coolidge	Kean	Robinson, Ark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, as the home owners' loan bill has been favorably reported and on the Senate Calendar for about 2 weeks, I assume that a very brief explanation of the structure and provisions of the bill will be sufficient.

For direct relief to home owners, the bill provides for the organization of a home owners' loan corporation to deal directly with owners occupying their homes or holding the same as their homestead, although temporarily residing elsewhere, provided the home is built for not more than four families and has a value of not more than $25,000.

The corporation is to function for a period of 3 years, after which it will begin to wind up its affairs. During that 3-year period it is directed to exchange its bonds for mortgages on such homes and to pay any accrued taxes, assessments, necessary maintenance and repairs, and incidental costs in cash, provided the mortgagee will consent to take the bonds for the mortgage, and may make such exchanges and pay such cash up to a total of 80 percent of the value of the property. Thereupon the corporation will carry the home-owner's indebtedness in the form of a first lien on the home for a period of 15 years, amortized monthly, or, in case the necessity of the home owner requires it, amortized quarterly, semiannually, or annually; and the interest to be charged is not exceeding 5 percent.

The corporation is also directed to make advances in cash to pay taxes, assessments, necessary maintenance, and repairs on property otherwise unencumbered up to the same percentage and amortized in the same manner and at the same rate of interest. It is authorized, in its discretion, to take up mortgages in cash up to 50 percent of the value of the property where the mortgagee will not take the bonds. Such loans would be amortized over a 15-year period and carried at the same rate borne by the mortgage taken up.

The corporation is directed to make rules for the appraisal of the property to accomplish the purposes and intent of the act.

Provision is made for the corporation to extend the payments in case the necessity of the home owner requires extension and the condition of the security permits.

The bill provides for the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe $200,000,000 of capital in the corporation, to be paid from funds procured from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and authorizes the corporation to issue $2,000,000,000 of bonds, bearing interest at the rate of 4 percent per annum and maturing in not exceeding 18 years, the interest only on which is guaranteed by the United States.

The bill also provides for the Home Loan Board to charter Federal savings-and-loan associations in communities not now served by any institution or other lender on homes, so that provision may be made for the financing of homes in about one half of the counties in the United States now having no such facilities. These associations are intended to be permanent associations to promote the thrift of the people in a cooperative manner, to finance their homes and the homes of their neighbors.

To enable the Board to promote and develop these associations in areas not now served, an appropriation of $250,000 is authorized. To encourage the people to save their funds in these associations, and to provide funds for lending on homes, provision is made for the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe not exceeding $100,000 of preferred stock in any one of such associations, provided the local population have actually subscribed and paid in cash for stock therein as much as the Secretary of the Treasury subscribes and pays; and an appropriation of $100,000,000 is authorized to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to take this stock. This provision is intended to promote cooperative home financing and to raise substantial sums of money from private savers, which will be used, together with the funds subscribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, to make loans on homes; and these associations are made members of the Federal home-loan banks so that they may borrow on these mortgages additional sums to lend on homes. The result of this process is, as these associations are developed, to produce two or three dollars of funds for home loans for each dollar advanced by the Treasury.

The Committee on Banking and Currency has reported a single amendment in the nature of a substitute. I shall take but a moment to outline the principal changes that have been suggested as compared to the bill which passed the House.

The House bill contained a limitation on homes on which bonds may be exchanged to dwellings for not more than three families. The Senate committee amendment proposes to increase that limit to four families.

The House bill contained a limitation of $10,000 upon any one loan that might be made by the home owners' loan corporation. That $10,000 limit is struck out in the Senate bill, and the limit is 80 percent of the value of the home.

The value of a home on which a loan may be made has been increased in the Senate bill to $25,000, having been $15,000 in the House bill.

The House bill provided that cash advances might be made to take up mortgages in cases where the value of the premises was such that the loan would not be more than 30 percent of that value. The Senate committee recommends that that limit be raised to 50 percent.

In the section of the bill providing for the Federal savings-and-loan associations the amount which they may lend on any one property has been increased from $15,000, as carried in the House bill, to $20,000, as recommended by the Senate committee.

The amendments recommended by the Senate committee are, therefore, all in the direction of liberalizing the measure.

One item of policy has been added by the Senate committee. That is, it requires the central board at Washington to make uniform rules for the appraisal of homes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURPHY in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. What is the estimated total amount of the home mortgages in the United States at the present time?

Mr. BULKLEY. It is understood that there are about twenty-one billions of home mortgages in the United States at the present time. Of that amount somewhat more than half would be eligible for loans by exchange of bonds of this proposed corporation. Those that are not eligible are second mortgages, or mortgages on homes which exceed the limit of value provided by the bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. But the amount of the bonds authorized under this bill, as I understood the Senator, is $2,000,000,000.

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. And the amount of eligible loans is some ten or eleven billions.

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; and that is a very important point. The bill has been so devised as not to attempt to take over the entire home-loan mortgage indebtedness of the United States. It is not thought that that is a proper function of the United States Government. The bill is devised to take over those mortgages which are in distress. It is regarded as an emergency matter, to relieve those who are unable to carry on with their payments on their home mortgages.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BRATTON. On page 19, beginning at line 9, section 3 of the bill repeals subsection (d) of section 4 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, providing for direct loans to home owners.

Will the Senator tell us why the committee thought it advisable to repeal that provision of the original act?

Mr. BULKLEY. That was on recommendation of the Home Loan Board. That section of the Home Loan Act has been but very little used, and has not been satisfactory. The difficulty has been that the Home Loan Board has not had the machinery to make individual loans. Loan associations have been organized more or less throughout the country, and have the facilities for examination and negotiation of loans, and have handled the business much more satisfactorily than the Home Loan Board has felt that it was possible for the home-loan banks to handle it.

Mr. BRATTON. Let me say to the Senator that the original act has not operated satisfactorily at all in my section of the country, for this reason:

The home-loan bank would make a loan to a building-and-loan association at a reasonable rate of interest, say 5 or 6 percent. The building-and-loan association, in turn, would lend that money to distressed home owners at 10 and 12 percent, and in that way would enjoy the spread between 5 and 6 percent on the one hand and 10 and 12 percent on the other. At the same time, these distressed home owners would write to the home-loan bank at Little Rock, Ark., making application for a direct individual loan; and they would receive back, without exception, a stereotyped form of letter, merely saying in substance that the Home Loan Act was drawn very conservatively, and therefore that the application was rejected.

Does the Senator think it is feasible or practicable to continue a system under which the home-loan bank turns a deaf ear to a distressed owner in that language, and at the same time lends its funds to these building-and-loan associations at 5 or 6 percent, and permits them to lend them in turn to the individual home owner at 10 or 12 percent?

Mr. BULKLEY. I should say that that is a very distressing situation. It has seemed to the committee, as it has seemed to the Home Loan Board, obvious—to take the example just instanced by the Senator—that the bank situated at Little Rock cannot well deal directly with the individual home owner out in New Mexico.

The pending bill proposes to relieve that situation in two ways: In the first place, in all cases where there is immediate distress, where a home owner is unable to make the payments on his existing mortgage, the home owners' loan corporation provided by the pending bill is prepared to offer its bonds, with interest guaranteed by the Government, carrying 4-percent interest, and to make those bonds available for exchange for the mortgage up to 80 percent of the value of the premises mortgaged. In addition to that, the bill provides for the organization of local Federal savings-and-loan associations, which will be cooperative institutions in the several communities, so that in communities that have been inadequately served—and I should say the example given by the Senator from New Mexico is a clear example of inadequate service—these new savings-and-loan associations may be organized with the help of subscriptions from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BRATTON. But the point I raise with the Senator is that the provision in the original act which authorized the Federal home-loan bank to make a direct loan to the owner should not be repealed. On the contrary, it should be continued in force, and the bank encouraged to make the loan to the individual home owner.

The Senator says that these home-loan banks have not had the facilities with which to inspect property, and appraise property, and to make the necessary investigation. Perhaps that is a handicap, and it may be difficult to overcome it. Assuming that to be true, however, instead of repealing the provision in the existing law it seems to me we should continue it, and then endeavor to overcome the handicap; because I suspect that every Member of this body has had case after case come under his personal observation where a home owner is on the verge of losing his property, and he applies to the home-loan bank for relief, and he receives a short letter telling him that under the terms of the act a loan of that kind cannot be made.

A loan of that kind can be made; indeed, a loan of that kind could have been made at any time since the act was passed. Despite that fact, the home-loan bank at Little Rock, Ark., has written repeatedly, over and over again, a 2- or 3-line letter, saying, in substance, "This act is conservatively drawn, and therefore you are not eligible."

I do not doubt for a moment that the system has the difficulties and the handicaps which the able Senator from Ohio suggests, but instead of abandoning the system because it is burdened with those handicaps, we should attack the problem from that point and undertake to solve the difficulty.

We should make it not only possible, but practicable, for a home owner to go immediately and directly to his home-loan bank and, if it has the money and he has the security, to borrow the money, instead of relegating him to a building-and-loan association which requires 10 or 12 percent for the money it borrows from the home-loan bank at 5 or 6 percent. I have no complaint against building-and-loan associations as such. They are entitled to exist, they are entitled to make a fair return, but I protest against them using the act we passed a few months ago to obtain money at 5 or 6 percent and then lending it to distressed home owners, persons on the very verge of losing the accumulations of their lifetime, at 5- or 6-percent profit. Instead of repealing that provision, it should be continued, and, if possible, made more feasible and more workable.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. In just a moment. In my opinion, there is no justification for a building-and-loan association charging 10 or 12 percent; I do not want to be understood as condoning that at all.

Mr. BRATTON. I was sure the Senator would not.

Mr. BULKLEY. It seems to me that the bank making those loans might well be required to take some steps to insure that the borrowers are more reasonably and fairly treated. But I wish the Senator would consider this, that if we provide that the home-loan bank should itself make loans directly to home owners, it would go into direct competition with the local associations. How could such competition go on? Must not the home-loan bank, if it gives satisfactory service, ultimately drive out all of the local associations and monopolize the business?

Mr. BRATTON. It would not be in competition any more than a Federal land bank is in direct competition with mortgage companies which lend money to farmers. A farmer may go to a Federal land bank and obtain a loan.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is not quite accurate. The farmer goes to the local farm association, and the association takes the mortgage to the Federal land bank.

Mr. BRATTON. But the association is just a group of farmers in the community; and while the farmer goes through the association, the association is one without capital, it is composed of a number of farmers; and, after all, the individual farmer obtains the money direct from the Federal land bank. So I should say that the suggestion of the Senator that the home-loan bank would be in direct competition with the building-and-loan association is no truer than it is to say that a Federal land bank is in direct competition with private corporations lending money to farmers.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Senator is slightly in error in saying that the farm-loan associations have no capital. They do have a capital, and their organization very closely parallels the organization we here propose of Federal savings-and-loan associations. It is not exactly the same, because people may buy stock in Federal savnigs-and-loan associations without being borrowers, and they may borrow without owning stock, whereas the organization of the farm-loan associations is one exclusively of borrowers; so the parallel is very close.

Mr. BRATTON. The parallel is very close. The Senator says that the local associations under the Federal Land Bank Act have capital. Perhaps in a technical sense that is true, but in actual operation the farmer borrows direct from the Federal land bank of his district. It is not an answer to the objection that a home-loan bank cannot lend money direct to a distressed home owner, but it is possible for a building-and-loan association to borrow money from the home-loan bank and to enjoy a substantial profit when it lends to the home owner.

Mr. BULKLEY. So far as the distress of the home owner is concerned, I hope the Senator is not overlooking the very important provision in this bill which sets up the home owners' loan corporation expressly to deal with cases of distress and offers the exchange of the bonds directly to the individual mortgagor in all cases where the mortgagor is in distress.

Mr. BRATTON. Let there be no mistake about my position. I favor the bill; I am not opposing it; and if it cannot be amended in certain respects, I shall vote for it as it is now written. It seems to me, however, that the provision to which I have called attention should be stricken out. We should allow the home-loan banks to continue to have authority to make direct loans, whether they exercise it or not.

It may be that the bank at Little Rock, to which I have already directed attention, will continue the policy which I have already reviewed. I do not agree with that policy. It should be changed; a different attitude should be assumed toward these home owners. But certainly we should not repeal the law which gives the home-loan bank the power to make loans direct to home owners.

Suppose we find a home owner in a town or a village which has no building-and-loan association. His home constitutes adequate security for the amount of money desired, but he cannot get it through a building-and-loan association. He turns to the home-loan bank, say, the one at Little Rock; he tenders his home as security for a loan; he is told that the act is drawn conservatively and that he is not eligible. The only thing which remains for that home owner to do is to surrender his home to the mortgagee and start anew.

Mr. BULKLEY. That will not be true if this bill is enacted.

Mr. BRATTON. This bill is an improvement. I concede that. I commend the committee for the work it has done on the subject matter. It is one phase of the situation to which I call attention.

Mr. BULKLEY. Let me say this further to the Senator. I want to be very frank about it; it is easy to think of ways in which the home owners can be benefited more than they will be benefited by this bill.

Mr. BRATTON. I appreciate that.

Mr. BULKLEY. The effort of the committee has been to give the maximum amount of help we can justify with reasonable outlay of Government funds.

Mr. BRATTON. I appreciate that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The provision of the Home Loan Act authorizing direct loans under certain conditions has not operated successfully. The banks are not equipped to make direct loans. They have not been able to apply that provision with any special degree of effectiveness.

The pending bill is intended to take care of direct loans, and it segregates them from the home-loan banks which make loans to the institutions which are concerned with financing home owners.

After having studied the subject from every standpoint I can conceive of, I think it would be a mistake to continue in the home-loan bank the authority to make direct loans, because they do not make those loans. It results only in complaints. It results in confusion and disappointment. But if this bill shall be enacted, many direct loans will be made, and there will not be a duplicate system of making those loans.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for that suggestion, and I want to call attention to this further point. Not only would any liberalization we made in this bill cost the Treasury large additional sums but, by the same token, it would tend to dry up the investment of private capital in home loans. We have endeavored to interfere as little as possible with the situation, so that private funds may continue to be available to make loans on homes.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas was not present when I reviewed the manner in which the bank at Little Rock, Ark., has conducted its business in my State. I appreciate fully the suggestion of the Senator that those banks have not been equipped to establish district-wide facilities to operate in every town. Of course, that would be expensive, and perhaps they have not been able to do it.

So far as my State is concerned, the bank at Little Rock has lent money to building-and-loan associations at a reasonable rate of interest, say, 5 or 6 percent, and those building-and-loan associations in turn have lent that money to distressed home owners at 10 to 12 percent, and I have been told that, by direct and indirect methods, they have exacted as high as 14 percent from distressed home owners. To my mind, that is indefensible; if a home-loan bank has a certain amount of money to lend, and it must do one or the other of two things, either lend it to home owners, a smaller number, and bear the added expense of inspecting the property, on the one hand, or lend it in large quantities to building-and-loan associations, to be used in the manner I have indicated.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator's suggestion would require a complete revision and reorganization of the home-loan system.

Mr. BULKLEY. It would; it would be an entirely different principle of lending the money.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The home-loan bank was not organized primarily to make direct loans. As a matter of fact, as I remember it, the provision in the bill permitting direct loans was incorporated at the instance of some Senators, including myself, on the very theory which the Senator from New Mexico advances, that there would be cases where home owners would not have access to building-and-loan associations, would not be able to avail themselves of advances through building-and-loan associations, and where hardships would result. But, according to the best information I have, none of these banks have made any material number of direct loans, and the system is not constructed with that in mind. The pending bill, however, is purely a direct-loan bill, and, of course, there would be no necessity for two systems if both were to operate alike. The object of this bill is to supplement the home-loan bank system and provide direct loans in certain cases.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is exactly correct. The judgment of the Home Loan Board and of the Banking and Currency Committees of both Houses is that the method provided by this bill is the practical one by which to meet the situation. Now I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I well remember that it was the consensus of opinion here that under the home-loan bank bill it was not intended there should be any direct loans except in extreme cases where a building-and-loan association was not available to the borrower, or something of that kind. The provision was put there to take care of those extreme cases only, and, I take it, that the Home Loan Bank Board was never organized in a way to enable it to make such direct loans, though it is a regrettable fact, and many cases have been brought to my attention, where real service could have been rendered to a home owner had it been possible for him to get such a loan.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] referred to the borrowings of building-and-loan associations and the reloaning of such funds at a high rate of interest. I wonder if he has taken into account that in that 10-percent interest rate probably a part of it is used for amortization of the mortgage?

Mr. BRATTON. Oh, yes.

Mr. HEBERT. Probably 4 percent is used for amortization of a mortgage; so that. in the final analysis, the borrower only pays 6 percent real interest. That is the case in my section of the country, and I very much question if building-and-loan associations have really charged a 10-percent flat rate of interest for money which they have loaned to home owners.

Mr. BRATTON. My information is that they have. The Senator has stated that the provision authorizing direct loans was inserted in the act only to meet extreme cases. So far as my information goes, the several home-loan banks throughout the country have never found what they regarded to be an "extreme case"; at least, they have never made a direct loan.

Mr. HEBERT. I can agree with the Senator as to that. I am quite familiar with the practice of the Home Loan Bank Board, and I know of no instance where it has made a direct loan; and yet I have had cases brought to my attention which indicated, to me at least, that they were extreme cases, and that consideration should have been given to them.

Mr. BRATTON. May I have just one word further with the Senator from Ohio, and then I shall not trespass further upon his time?

Mr. BULKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BRATTON. Some home owners throughout the country understand that this bill requires that the owner actually occupy the building or premises as a home; that is, that he must occupy it physically in order to be eligible for a loan.

Mr. BULKLEY. There is an exception to that—if it is held as his homestead.

Mr. BRATTON. As his homestead; so that, although he and his family may be elsewhere, if the premises constitute his homestead, he is eligible for a loan?

Mr. BULKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. BRATTON. Now, let me ask the Senator what relief a home owner could reasonably expect under this bill if his premises were situated in a town not having building-and-loan-association facilities? How would he proceed to obtain a loan under the bill?

Mr. BULKLEY. If it is a distress loan, one of the character of loans which come under the first part of the bill, eligible for exchange of bonds with the home owners' loan corporation, there is no intermediary in the shape of a local association, so that it would make no difference where the borrower is situated, other than the physical difference of such travel as might be necessary to the nearest agent of the corporation.

With respect to new financing, this bill provides for the incorporation of Federal savings and loan associations, the very purpose being to have such associations organized in every county in the country. There are about half the counties in the country now that do not have any local savings and loan associations at all, and the purpose of this is to bring the benefits of the proposed legislation home to everybody, with the assistance of subscription by the Federal Treasury.

Mr. BRATTON. How long does the Senator think it will require to create these agencies throughout the country? I have in mind literally thousands of home owners who are in distress and threatened with immediate foreclosure, and they are looking forward to this legislation to save their homes. If it will require several months to establish the organization machinery——

Mr. BULKLEY. In distress cases the home owner may deal directly with the home owners' loan corporation without any intermediary at all. The board expects to have the corporation set up within a few days after the enactment of the law.

Mr. BRATTON. The home owners loan corporation is to be conducted by the Home Loan Bank Board?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; the Home Loan Bank Board by this measure is made the board of directors of the home owners' loan corporation.

Mr. BRATTON. If they shall not expedite the administration of this proposed law and get relief to the people more quickly and more efficiently than they have done under the original act, there will be little hope for the distressed owners throughout the country.

Mr. BULKLEY. There is this difference: The original Home Loan Board had to set up districts for the whole United States and organize home-loan banks in each of the districts before operations could begin at all. The Home Loan Board now has its own organization and by this measure itself becomes the body corporate that is here provided, so that it is ready to act at once, and it is the very home owners' loan corporation itself which deals with everyone and not through the intermediary even of the home-loan bank.

Mr. BRATTON. It makes direct loans?

Mr. BULKLEY. It makes loans directly.

Mr. BRATTON. The Senator thinks that because the machinery has already been set up, the districts have been formed, and the personnel has been selected——

Mr. BULKLEY. The districts have nothing to do with this; the central body deals directly.

Mr. BRATTON. Where will the central body be located?

Mr. BULKLEY. In Washington, but it will have its agents throughout the country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will pardon me for asking some of the questions I am about to ask, but I myself am not familiar with the bill sufficiently to answer them. What I am interested in is the subject which the Senator from New Mexico has been discussing; that is, how speedily and how effectively, under this bill, may the individual who has a home upon which he wants a loan, obtain relief?

Mr. BULKLEY. There is no legal complication whatever. The board will become a corporation immediately; it will have funds immediately; and it will have the capacity to issue bonds immediately. Of course, there is the physical question of having the bonds engraved, and putting its agents out into the field to find places where loans are needed, but there is no reason for delay on account of the legal problem at all.

Mr. BORAH. With whom will the individual owner deal? Will he deal with the Board of which the Senator speaks?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; the Board will have its local agents throughout the country. It will establish offices undoubtedly at the home-loan banks which are already in existence; but it will have, of course, subsidiary offices in many more cities. There are only 12 home-loan banks, but they will have many more than 12 offices.

Mr. BORAH. The old Home Loan Act, so far as the individual owner was concerned, was a total failure; it might just as well never have been passed so far as he was concerned.

Mr. BULKLEY. I do not want to argue that with any great vigor.

Mr. BORAH. No; I imagine none of us do.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Ohio means he does not wish to contest that fact?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but what I want to know is in what respect does this bill improve the law so far as the individual home owner is concerned?

Mr. BULKLEY. So far as the distressed owner is concerned, it gives him an immediate means of getting out by the exchange of the bonds of this corporation and by direct negotiation.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says "the distressed owner." Who is to pass upon the question of distress?

Mr. BULKLEY. It will largely work itself out. If a mortgagor is making his payments to the satisfaction of the mortgagee, there will be no occasion for anybody to apply for this relief, and the exchange of bonds is not sufficiently attractive to induce mortgagors or mortgagees to apply unless there is a case of distress.

Mr. BORAH. The committee has undertaken to reach the individual owner in distress?

Mr. BULKLEY. Indeed, it has.

Mr. BORAH. That has been one of the great objectives of the committee, and the Senator feels that this has done so, insofar as it is practicable to do so?

Mr. BULKLEY. I certainly do.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Supplementing that inquiry, is not the situation always in control of the owner of the mortgage?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; without the consent of the owner of the mortgage there is nothing to be done, because nobody can compel him to accept an exchange of bonds.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Exactly.

Mr. BULKLEY. But, of course, the owner of the mortgage does not ordinarily want to take the premises; it is usually an embarrassment to the owner of the mortgage to have to take the premises. What he wants is his money, but if the mortgagor is in distress the chances are that it will be a great benefit to the mortgagee to take these bonds and have the trouble off his hands.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But suppose the mortgagor has paid on his mortgage to the point where the remaining equity obviously is less than the value of the property, then the owner of the mortgage is not going to be interested in the exchange; and how is the distressed owner of the property going to get any relief?

Mr. BULKLEY. In the case the Senator suggests, there is an exception in this bill that the corporation may provide cash to take up a mortgage if the mortgagee will not accept bonds, if the mortgagor cannot secure funds from a local association, and if the amount of the mortgage is not more than 50 percent of the value of the premises. I say 50 percent. The House limited that to 30 percent, but by recommendation of the Senate committee it would be made 50 percent.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Again, of course, the situation is entirely in the final control of the owner of the mortgage.

Mr. BULKLEY. Not in that case, no; because the owner of the mortgage would be obliged to accept cash.

Mr. VANDENBERG. He is required to do so?

Mr. BULKLEY. I think we passed such a bill on Saturday, to the effect that he must take legal-tender money.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, right on that point, I was not able to be present in the subcommittee when that particular phase of the measure was considered, and I wondered why in case of displacing a mortgage, represented by 50 percent of the value of the property, it is provided that the interest that the mortgagor must pay will be the same rate of interest for which the original mortgage provided. Why should he not be entitled to the 5-percent rate, as in the other cases?

Mr. BULKLEY. That is the same question that we have had to be careful of in another aspect. We do not want to make this an invitation for people to come in and unload mortgages on the Government just so that they may obtain a better rate of interest; we want to help the cases that are definitely in distress; but if we should provide a lower rate of interest than the mortgagors are now paying, we would find that applications would come to the governmental organization merely so that they might get an advantage in the interest rate, and that we wanted to avoid.

Mr. WAGNER. What advantage does the home owner get in that particular case?

Mr. BULKLEY. The supposition was that he was in distress and unable to make his payments and in danger of being foreclosed.

Mr. WAGNER. There is no provision in this bill under which the home owner is entitled to a moratorium of any period of time?

Mr. BULKLEY. He is not entitled to it in the sense that the corporation is obliged to give it, but the corporation is authorized to give it; and there is no doubt about what the intent is.

Mr. WAGNER. When we passed the bill to aid the farmers, we provided in the Farm Mortgage Act that the holder of the mortgage should have a moratorium, a definite moratorium, as a matter of right for a period of 5 years. Does not the Senator think, in the case of home owners, while perhaps not so long a period should be permitted, yet he is entitled to a moratorium, as a matter of right, for a period of time?

Mr. BULKLEY. I am sure the Senator will recall that that was gone over in the committee, and we thought it was much more practicable to leave it more flexible. He is not even limited to 5 years by this bill; the limit is only what the man can show he really needs. The corporation has unlimited discretion to defer payment.

Mr. WAGNER. But in the case of the farm mortgages we dealt with them diffierently and we provided that the owner of a farm, at least the farmer in every case where he was the mortgagor, beginning with a certain time after the act became effective, on all outstanding mortgages was entitled to a moratorium for a period of 5 years.

Mr. BULKLEY. I do not think any such general condition appears in the home-mortgage situation to make such a provision necessary.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator does not think there is the same distress existing among home owners of the country?

Mr. BULKLEY. Not in such a universal manner. I think many of the mortgages are being carried all right, the mortgagors are making payments all right; we did not want to put out a general invitation to them to fall down on their payments; and, as I have said, the discretion is with the corporation, without any limit whatever, except the showing of necessity on the part of the mortgagor.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I am very anxious to establish one thing clearly. I think the question has been asked. There can be no doubt that the bill provides for a direct approach of home owners to the Government. The loan is being made practically by the Government. That is vital in view of the situation, it seems to me.

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; in the sense that the home owners' loan corporation is a Government corporation, there is a direct approach to the Government itself.

Mr. BONE. At the bottom of page 18 the bill makes this help available to the owner who is using the building as a home or where it is held by him as his homestead. The Senator is aware that there are two kinds of homesteads. For instance, in the western coast States—and I think it is true in New Mexico and other Western States—there is what is known as a "homestead" under the State law. There is also a Federal homestead. I am not certain that it is necessary that any distinction should be made by using the words "under State or Federal statute."

Mr. BULKLEY. I am afraid that would be restrictive. I think it is more flexible the way it is.

Mr. BONE. I am rather inclined to think it would be given very liberal interpretation. It is very vital that we get a very liberal measure.

Mr. BULKLEY. I want to take a moment to call attention to the Home Loan Bank Act which throws some light on the situation mentioned by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] a few moments ago, in which he instanced that several borrowers in his State were being charged as much as 10 or 12 percent by interests which in turn were getting their money from the home-loan bank at Little Rock. That is not in accord with the terms of the law. I want to read section 5 of that act:

SEC. 5. No institution shall be admitted to or retained in membership or granted the privileges of nonmember borrowers, if the combined total of the amounts paid to it for interest, commission, bonus, discount, premium, and other similar charges, less a proper deduction for all dividends, refunds, and cash credits of all kinds, creates an actual net cost to the home owner in excess of the maximum legal rate of interest or, in case there is a lawful contract rate of interest applicable to such transactions, in excess of such rate (regardless of any exemption from usury laws), or, in case there is no legal rate of interest or lawful contract rate of interest applicable to such transactions, in excess of 8 percent per annum in the State where such property is located. This section applies only to home-mortgage loans made after the enactment of this act.

That is the provision of law, and the loan associations that are carrying on the practice referred to would, as I read the law, be subject to expulsion from membership in the home-loan bank.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, is the Senator seeking a vote on the measure at once?

Mr. BULKLEY. I hope to get a vote very soon. I am going to suggest an amendment. The amendment has been called to my attention since the last meeting of our committee, but it has the approval of such members of the committee as I have been able to communicate with, and I am sure that the policy of it will commend itself to the Senate. I am proposing an amendment to prevent the payment of commissions on the negotiation of exchange of bonds with the home loan owners' corporation. I send the amendment to the desk and ask that it may be read.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question before the amendment is read? There is a conference report on the electric-energy tax provision in the tax bill. I am anxious to get it out of the way before the Committee on Finance makes its report on the public construction program. The Committee on Finance meets again at 4 o'clock. I do not know how much discussion there will be on the conference report. If we can get it through by 4 o'clock, would the Senator yield to enable me to call it up at this time?

Mr. BULKLEY. I will ask the Senator to withhold the request for a few moments. I think we are nearly through with the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that I am very much interested in the conference report and I do not believe it will be possible to conclude its consideration by 4 o'clock even if we were to take it up at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. With that statement of the Senator from California before me, I shall not ask for consideration of the conference report at this moment. In view of the fact that the Senator from Ohio believes the bill now before the Senate will be concluded very shortly, I shall wait and call up the conference report after the bill has been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has offered an amendment to the committee amendment, which the clerk will read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 35, after line 10, it is proposed to insert:

(e) In order to prevent imposition upon home owners dealing with home owners' loan corporation, commissions or other charges by individuals, corporations, or others are prohibited, except salaries of regular employees, ordinary charges for services actually rendered for examination and perfecting of title, appraisal and like necessary services in connection with the making of the loan. Such necessary charges for services actually rendered shall not exceed the charges for like services prevailing in the territory and shall include only those authorized and required by the corporation. No person, firm, corporation, or association shall make any charge for taking any application to said Corporation for a loan or make any charge in connection with the negotiation for a loan with the corporation except as above provided, and no such person, firm, corporation, or association shall for any private benefit whatsoever represent that they have any special advantage in securing relief from said corporation for home owners. This section shall not be construed to prohibit individuals or others from assisting home owners or the Corporation in rendering relief as contemplated under this act without making any charge therefor or deriving any special private benefit therefrom, nor shall it be construed to prevent mortgagees from assisting their home owner borrowers without charge in their negotiations with the corporation.

It shall be the duty of the corporation to see to it that the provisions of this subsection are enforced. Any person, firm, or corporation violating the provisions of this subsection shall be punished by fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have offered heretofore, or gave notice that I would offer an amendment to the pending bill. It has been printed and is on the desks of Senators. I desire to offer it at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the amendment of the committee, on page 15, after line 4, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. —. The President is authorized to establish a national board of rehabilitation and conciliation with respect to farm- and home-mortgage indebtedness, which board shall consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of Agriculture, a member of the Federal Reserve Board, to be designated by the President for that purpose, and such other officers or agents of the Government as may be especially charged with the administration of any law or laws relating to rural credit or farm-mortgage indebtedness and home-mortgage indebtedness.

The President is authorized to appoint in each State a board of State rehabilitation and conciliation consisting of not more than five members, who shall serve without pay, one of whom shall be a director of the district Federal farm bank in the area affected, and a second of whom shall be a director of the district home-loan bank in the area affected.

It shall be the duty of said State board of rehabilitation and conciliation to appoint or designate a suitable number of local boards of rehabilitation and conciliation in their respective States and to supervise their activities.

It shall be the duty of such State and local boards of rehabilitation and conciliation to bring about between farm and home mortgagors and mortgagees an adjustment of farm- and home-mortgage indebtedness wherever it may be found practical to do so, either by reduction of the principal of said mortgage indebtedness or in the rate of interest thereon, and/or by the conversion of short-term loans into long-term loans with a provision of amortization payments and/or through an agreement between the mortgagor and mortgagee under which payment could be made in staple farm products or the proceeds thereof at an agreed price or value more nearly related to the price or proceeds of a like quantity of such farm products at the date of the execution of such mortgage. It shall be their further duty to give aid to prospective borrowers through public information regarding all public loan services and legal advice. They shall also make confidential reports of appraisal for the information of officials of Federal farm banks and home-loan banks, and shall give information and advice to said officials. Members of such boards shall serve without pay.

The national board of conciliation, with the approval of the President, is authorized to prescribe suitable rules and regulations to effectuate the purposes and objects of this section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the committee amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the committee has not had a chance to consider the amendment just offered by the Senator from Oklahoma, but it seems to me to have some merit, and I have no objection to accepting it and taking it to conference so that it may be further weighed.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Ohio takes that view, because it has been represented to me that the boards of conciliation would be extremely valuable in functioning as proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma. I have had an amendment which I intended to offer relating to the same subject, but it seems to me this is better than mine. I am very glad indeed that the Senator from Ohio is willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to express my appreciation also to the Senator from Ohio for accepting the amendment. In substantially this form it was adopted as an amendment to the farm relief bill. It went out in conference. I understand, however, now that the administrator of that service would be glad to see it adopted and thinks it might accomplish a great deal of good. I think it is one of the best means proposed for solving the problem of debt in this country as between the farmers and their creditors and the home owners and their creditors. It certainly can do no harm and may do a great deal of good. The members serve without compensation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to propose an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Florida proposes, in the committee amendment, on page 25, line 14, to add after the word "section" the following:

That direct loans in cash to home owners shall be made for the purpose of paying or settling an existing mortgage or other obligation upon the home, and this provision for loans direct to home owners shall be administered as one of the primary purposes of this act.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I think it very essential to make it definite and certain that it is the intention of Congress that the individual home owner shall have an opportunity to obtain a loan for refinancing any mortgage or other obligation that may be upon his home without having to seek that privilege through some intermediary.

It is my opinion that the very first object of legislation of this character should be to assist the home owner.

I have read this bill; and, so far as my power and capacity for interpretation exist, I find that the purpose of the bill is not centered around the home owner, but its aim and purpose are centered around providing relief and assistance for building-and-loan associations, insurance companies, mortgage-credit institutions, and others who may hold obligations upon another's home which they desire to sell or turn over to the corporation established in the bill.

When we deal with the feature of the bill authorizing loans of that character, we do not say that the corporation may, within its discretion, make loans and carry on negotiations of that character; but the bill specifically provides that the corporation is "authorized" to make such loans and that policy is made plain. When, however, we come to the section dealing with the home owner directly, we find that under paragraph (f) the bill provides that—

The corporation is further authorized, in its discretion—

That is what I object to. We, who are friends of the home owners, have been shockingly disappointed in the past. When we had up the original bill for the establishment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, as I recall, in January 1932 I realized that the home owner himself had been totally ignored in that measure as it came from the committee to the Senate. I saw that the aid was provided for insurance companies, mortgage companies, banks, and those holding mortgages upon private homes. There was not one word in the original bill in regard to the individual home owner's having any right to obtain a loan.

I offered an amendment to the bill for home owners, which I thought covered the situation reasonably well. I got no sympathy for my proposal from the Committee on Banking and Currency. I am speaking now of the original bill establishing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation—and the same applies to the Federal home loan bank bill. The committee brought in the measure with no character of relief or direct assistance to home owners.

I discussed the matter with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], who was a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, and expressed my disappointment that the measure contained nothing for the direct assistance of home owners. The Senator from Michigan, sympathetic as I have always found him in the interest of the poor and helpless of the country, assured me that he would do the best he could to try to get some provision on the subject put into the bill, and asked for my amendment.

I gave him my amendment. He canvassed the situation, being a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, and came back and said to me, "I think this is about all we can get into the bill." So he offered an amendment, not over 10 words in length, which said that in the discretion of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans might be made to private individuals. His suggestion was adopted as a part of the original Reconstruction Finance bill, as I recall.

I thought that was better than nothing, yet I had my doubts as to whether or not that discretionary power would ever be exercised in the interest of the home owner. I felt that way because the general policy of the bill and the sentiment of those who were fostering the measure—its proponents—seemed, if possible, to restrict the relief to building and loan associations, to insurance companies, to banks, and to all other corporations that might, forsooth, have some mortgages that they wished to dispose of to the Government.

At any rate, this provision was embraced in the bill following the proposal on my part of an amendment which went to the committee, and, as I have related, was not inserted by the committee.

All over the country people were cheered to some degree of hope that they might obtain a loan. It was a vain hope, however. It was only 2 or 3 weeks until I began to see signs of the interest of the home owners were being ignored. It was then I began to advise people who corresponded with me that I was afraid the cards were stacked against them, and that that provision was not going to give them the privilege which I had hoped it would, and which my original amendment, if adopted, unquestionably would have given them.

Without going into any lengthy details, the result was that I appealed on behalf of hundreds of home owners in distress, with pending foreclosures hanging over them, with ample security; but my appeals and their applications were of no avail. I am informed—and the information given was by someone who was connected with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or the home loan bank system—that not one dollar of loans had ever been made under that provision of the measure providing for direct loans to home owners. On the other hand, not dollars but millions upon millions, and in fact approximately $2,000,000,000 were loaned to railroad corporations, insurance companies, banks, and mortgage companies.

The poor little home owner, in his distress and in his despair, received no aid and no assistance, except in a few instances where he may have obtained some through a building and loan association. The greater part of the funds was secured by these corporations, for which the act was originally intended, no doubt, and around which its beneficent purposes are centered, and not by the home owners, generally speaking; and a few of them probably extended a mortgage for some occasional home owner.

The result is that since the enactment of that law—now almost a year and a half old—the home owner himself has waited in his distress and in his eagerness to receive some relief from some source, and the Government has ignored him completely. I am seeking to relieve that situation. You talk about "the forgotten man." He has been and is still "the forgotten man."

Later, I am going to make a motion to strike out the words authorizing these loans to be made in the discretion of this corporation. If we leave the provision as it is, in all probability the fate of the individual home owner will be similar to his fate under the previous law. I want the authority to be mandatory. First, however, I desire to define the intent and the purpose of Congress. That intent and purpose of Congress, as defined in my amendment, are that direct home loans in cash are one of the primary purposes and objects of the enactment. That is why I have proposed this amendment to clearly define the intent of Congress.

Some 2 years ago, during a previous administration, it was heralded throughout the press of the country that the President at that time was going to recommend the enactment of legislation which would provide assistance and relief for the home owners of the country who were embarrassed by obligations upon their homes with no channel through which they could obtain relief. As we all know, even 2 years ago all the ordinary channels through which anyone might have negotiated loans upon property or otherwise were absolutely paralyzed, and there was no opportunity existing for him to obtain any assistance through the private channels which had previously operated reasonably well. When this message went forth and was heralded through the press of the country, our people were inspired and cheered, and editorial commendation after editorial commendation went forth praising our then President for his beneficent spirit and the suggestion which he had made.

Then a bill was introduced in Congress which carried a headline that would mislead and deceive anyone; and our people, generally speaking—and there are thousands and millions of them—who were suffering under mortgages, with no avenue of escape from foreclosure unless the Government provided some assistance, thought, "Well, now, Congress will soon act on this subject, and I shall be able to go directly to the Government through its agencies and obtain some assistance in relieving myself of the pressing obligations, in the nature of foreclosure or otherwise, upon my home."

Congress acted, but nothing was given to the home owner. He soon found himself absolutely helpless. Home owners began to make application to the proper agency, located for my section of the country at Winston-Salem, N.C. They would receive in answer probably a form letter, not intimating that the directors of the Board did not think loans of that character should be made, or that they had declared a policy of not making them. They would put the home owners to the trouble of furnishing all kinds of data and information, and I think probably, in a good many instances, abstracts; one of the significant conditions precedent was that the home owners had to send on $25 with their applications to cover the expense of a survey or investigation and title examination.

When that request was made, many of those poor and all but hopeless people, appealing to their Government for aid, were unable to send the $25. Therefore their applications were pigeonholed. It has turned out, however, that they were very fortunate in not being able to send the money requested. Many of them, however, remitted the $25, resulting after a few weeks in a notification from the agencies representing the home-loan banks that they had investigated the matter, and giving this or that or the other excuse why they could not make them a loan; but the officials did not have the frankness, honesty, or integrity in dealing with American citizens in distress—as those were who applied for loans—to advise them that it was the policy, agreed upon by the directors, that they would make them no direct loans.

So the situation just rocked along in that chaotic stage. In desperate straits, as they were, many of the people had some hope that possibly their applications would be approved until this Congress convened. About that time I was advised that the home-loan bank authorities had adopted a policy against making any individual loans.

I notice that by this bill the original provision is repealed, which is all right, because there are some other provisions here that are probably somewhat better, if, in its discretion, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation does not say that it will not make individual loans.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation does not declare now that under the pending bill it will not make individual loans. It is left, under the provisions of the measure we are considering, within the discretion of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and whether or not they will perform, I can best judge the future by the past. That organization is unsympathetic with any direct aid to the home owner and, on the other hand, is sympathetic, as has been shown, with the big financial institutions of this country and the money barons of the Nation. The Corporation has made loans to the extent of even billions of dollars to the money barons of the country and not one penny directly to the poor home owner. If it is within my power and within my influence, I want to make it plain and specific in this bill that the home owner shall have an opportunity, a right which should be given him just the same as it is given to the insurance companies and the building-and-loan associations or to any other financial interests holding mortgages, to go direct and ask for a loan upon his home in order that he may stay foreclosure.

I do not know of any way to make that an assured fact or a certainty except to say in plain language which any man can understand that a home owner shall have the right to a loan upon his property for the purpose of taking up a mortgage or other obligation, and that these lines and these words mean that this shall be one of the primary purposes of this act.

I very much hope that the amendment will be adopted. I regard it as extremely essential, and I urge it upon those who are sympathetic with the home owners of the United States, and who have not their sympathies all warped in favor of the big financial institutions of the country.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will not the Senator read his amendment?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will read the amendment if the clerk will send it to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 25, line 14, to add after the word "section" the following:

That direct loans in cash to home owners shall be made for the purpose of paying or settling an existing mortgage or other obligation upon the home, and this provision for loans direct to home owners shall be administered as one of the primary purposes of this act.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Florida, but he does not specify any rate of interest, and in line 8, on page 25, subdivision (f), it is provided:

Each such loan shall be secured by a duly recorded home mortgage and shall bear interest at the same rate as the mortgage or other obligation taken up.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I had contemplated striking that out and prescribing the rate of interest which would be legal as set forth in the pending bill for a building and loan association or a mortgage company or a bank or insurance company. This specifically provides, as the Senator states—and I have it marked and had intended to offer an amendment—that if they make a loan direct to a home owner, "the interest shall be the same as on the mortgage or obligation taken up." For instance, in my State the average rate upon a mortgage is 8 percent, and the law provides that under contract it may be 10 percent. Therefore in a great many instances what I would rather term "heartless people" take advantage, in lending money, of that provision of the law which allows them up to 10-percent interest.

Therefore, if a home owner in that situation in Florida seeks a loan, the interest will be the same as upon the obligation which is liquidated by virtue of that loan. I think the Senator is correct—that we should change that paragraph so that the interest should not be in excess of what is required of others to whom the Government may lend upon mortgages. That is 5 percent.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not think the Senator was here a moment ago when I made the suggestion, when the Senator from Ohio had the floor, that there does seem to be an injustice in that provision of the measure.

Mr. TRAMMELL. There is, absolutely, in my opinion.

Mr. WAGNER. I have an amendment here which provides that the rate of interest shall be the same rate as is charged in the other case; namely, 5 percent. As a matter of fact, if we made it on a parity with the farm mortgage law, it ought to be 4½ percent; but, as the Senator has said, there may be instances where the mortgagor is paying 7 or 8 or 9 percent, and he is not getting all the relief under this provision he should get.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Simply an extension.

Mr. WAGNER. He does not get that unless the lender is willing to grant it to him.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly he does not get that.

Mr. WAGNER. I have another amendment I intend to offer, which provides for a 3-year moratorium.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I cannot believe that the committee having this legislation in charge could ever have intended that the Government should require a home owner, because he happened to borrow from the Government, to pay a penalty, that he should have to pay 8 or 9 or 10 percent for his money, when, if the Government were dealing with an insurance company, or some of the other organizations which handle mortgages, it would let them have the money for 5 percent.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I followed very hastily the reading of the Senator's amendment, and, as I understand it generally, it is to enable individual home owners to obtain loans under this measure. Assuming that an individual home owner has upon the property upon which he desires to obtain a loan an existing encumbrance, is it for the purpose of enabling him to pay off that encumbrance?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It is for the purpose of enabling him to pay it off, and, of course, under the new loan that he would get from the corporation set up by the provisions of this bill, he is naturally better off for a certain period of time; and it gives him opportunity then, under the amortization system, to have years to pay back the loan to the corporation set up under this particular measure.

Mr. JOHNSON. He would be under the same obligations and restrictions that are provided in the bill concerning the appraisement of property and the like?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly; it does not interfere at all with that. It merely specifically provides that it shall be certain that he has a right, and that that is one of the primary objects of the bill. I do not know whether the Senator was in the Chamber when I explained about the disappointments and the heartaches that come to many home owners in this country under the provisions of the measures of 1932.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am very sympathetic; but I was wondering whether, as a business proposition—although I do not like that expression, because there is no such thing now—I was wondering whether it were not something under which, if an existing encumbrance subsisted, loss was certain to occur to the Government. That is not correct, as I understand it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Of course, this does not contemplate any extension of the opportunity for loss. In fact, I think the opportunity for loss is far less than it will be upon these obligations which the Government will acquire from the mortgage companies, the banks, the insurance companies, and the building-and-loan associations.

Mr. JOHNSON. The reason why I was so interested in the amendment presented by the Senator is that from a hasty reading of the bill—and I will ask the sponsor of the bill to correct me if I am in error—it seemed to me that the mortgagee was the individual who was going to profit under the bill, rather than the mortgagor, whom we sought to aid, and I thought that perhaps the amendment of the Senator might remedy that particular situation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I want to put the mortgage of the individual home owner on the same basis with other mortgages which are acquired by purchase by the corporation set up for that purpose in the bill. I have another amendment which I am going to offer, but I am firmly of the opinion that we should declare ourselves if we feel this way. I am going to offer an amendment providing that the corporation may not operate "in its discretion." That is what destroyed us under the other measure, the words "in its discretion."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I am thoroughly in sympathy with the Senator's idea of taking care of the individual mortgagor. It was for that reason that I voted against the home loan bill as originally offered. But there is a feature of this bill which, in my judgment, is very salutary and which would be stricken out by the Senator's amendment, and it is this: The bill very properly provides a limitation above which no loan shall be made. It is my own judgment that that is too high. I do not believe we can find any case today where the property is worth 80 percent of the mortgage.

As the Senator's amendment is written, as I understand from what he says, that is not what it contemplates. As the Senator's amendment is written, it is my judgment that, if agreed to, it would not only authorize but require the lending of 100 percent of the value of a property in order to pay off a mortgage, where it could not be hoped now to get that amount on the present value of the property.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I do not think anything is written into the amendment which could, except under the most strained construction of the language which I have offered, result in wiping out the other provisions which precede it. Of course, I could have provided that this amendment should not conflict with the provision that the property shall be of a certain value, or that the interest shall be thus and so. I could have repeated all that, but in construing a law, in which I have had a little experience, I did not know I had to repeat all those other features. It is just a part of the paragraph (f) and in nowise alters the other provisions of the paragraph.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to state to the Senator again that I am in thorough sympathy with the objective he has in offering his amendment, but knowing the Senator's ability I am sure he will find there is no incorporation in the amendment of the limitations which appear in the bill. I should like to vote for the Senator's amendment, and it is for that reason that I make the suggestion.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I rather think the Senator's observations are very critical and technical. It is written as a part of subsection (f) and follows the last word in the last paragraph of that provision as part of that subsection. That subsection sets up all of the conditions and restrictions upon which loans may be made and refers to individuals. This makes it a direct mandatory proposition that loans should be made direct to home owners. That is the only purpose and object I have in view, and I do not believe it upsets the other details or will bear any other construction.

I want to make it quite plain, Mr. President, because I want home owners to have the benefits of this measure. I do not want the board of directors of any organization defeating what I consider the righteous and the deserved privileges to which home owners of this country are entitled, especially in view of what precedes my amendment in this particular bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator, it is contended that all that is protected in this bill, if I properly understand the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the objective sought, as stated by the Senator from Florida, is already fully provided for in the bill. His explanation is that he does not intend to change it at all. The amendment which he has proposed is merely repetitious, except as to one thing which I submit would not be a candid statement of the purposes of the bill. He says in his amendment:

Direct loans in cash to home owners shall be made for the purpose of paying or settling an existing mortgage or other obligation upon the home—

That is already provided in this section—

in any case in which the holder of a home mortgage or other obligation or lien eligible for exchange under subsection (d) of this section does not accept the bonds of the Corporation in exchange as provided in such subsection and in which the Corporation finds that the home owner cannot obtain a loan from ordinary lending agencies, to make cash advances to such home owner in an amount not to exceed 50 percent of the value of the property for the purposes specified in such subsection (d).

That is exactly the same thing.

Mr. COPELAND. From what was the Senator reading?

Mr. BULKLEY. I was reading from the bill as reported, pages 24 and 25.

He adds in his amendment—and this provision for loans direct to home owners shall be administered as one of the primary purposes of this act.

I do not know what he means by "administered as a primary purpose", but, of course, it is not the primary purpose of the act when we make $200,000,000 in cash available to this corporation and provide bonds to the amount of $2,000,000,000.

It cannot be the primary purpose to advance cash when the total amount of the mortgages of the country is over $21,000,000,000; and we are providing $200,000,000 here to swing that situation. Of course, if it is "the primary purpose", we had better appropriate $10,000,000,000 to do it. So it is simply a declaration that is not frank; that is not a fair statement of the object of the bill. The rest of it is, as I say, merely a repetition; it is already provided for.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator talks about $200,000,000 in cash for this purpose, which $200,000,000 is spread out all over creation in the benefits provided in this bill. The bill itself provides for the making of loans to corporations handling mortgages and securities; and that provision is not permissive, but that is a direct obligation required of the board. Then when it is sought to deal with the home owner direct it is said that they may in their discretion do it. Why was that provision put in the bill?

Mr. BULKLEY. The mistake of the Senator is that we do not provide any loans to corporations at all; the loans are only to the home owners; we do not loan anybody but home owners.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The bill covers all mortgages held by all kinds of corporations?

Mr. BULKLEY. But the loans are to home owners.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Our experience and past history tell a different story from that. Millions and millions of dollars have been acquired by building-and-loan associations and other mortgage credit companies that have never reached practically 1 percent of the home owners of the country. Under the plain terms of this bill we could have a repetition of that unjust course by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course, the Senator is talking about the home loan bank bill, which was framed on an entirely different theory from this bill, and was not even of the same structure.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Florida to the fact that the amendment will not help to cure the situation of which he complains, namely, that under the provision which authorizes the board to take over a mortgage, where the mortgage represents 50 percent or less of the value of the property as it is written, a mortgage calling for a rate of interest of 10 or 11 percent will be transferred, and the Government will be getting from the home owner an interest rate of 11 percent upon the loan which he made. The Senator wanted to correct that particular provision, but his amendment does not do it, because it will not touch the provision of the bill in which that feature appears.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If I had covered all that in one amendment, as well as one or two others I have in mind, I dare say that a dozen Senators would have wanted the question divided, so that they could vote on the different proposals. I intend to prepare such an amendment as suggested—and am glad that the Senator has one on that subject—to apply at the proper place, but if I had attempted to have written it all in this amendment, then it would not have appeared in an appropriate place in the bill.

Mr. WAGNER. If I may make the suggestion again, the amendment the Senator has offered does not change the bill as it is presented to us at all.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I disagree with the Senator. I am going by the language contained in the bill, and not by representations made about it. My amendment changes the policy of the bill most decidedy regarding direct loans to home owners. It imposes a mandatory duty upon the corporation instead of leaving it with them in their discretion. If the Senator will pardon me, I have read this bill, and I have studied this particular provision. On page 24, paragraph (f), which is the paragraph or subsection we are dealing with, if I may be pardoned—and I will take but a second of the Senate's time—reads:

The Corporation is further authorized, in its discretion—

If the corporation decides that not one dollar shall be loaned to the individual home owners, not one dollar will be loaned; and the past policy of the Government, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Home Loan Bank Board, has been that they did not loan so much as one dollar direct to a home owner. That is what I am trying to correct.

Mr. WAGNER. What I am suggesting is that the Senator has not changed that feature; but I am in sympathy with his efforts and have an amendment which I propose to offer along that line.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If the Senator will pardon me, I will show the Senator how I propose to change the provision. On page 24, line 22, I propose to strike out the words "in its discretion." I cannot move all my amendments at one time, if the Senator will excuse me for saying so.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, of course we are all in sympathy with the legitimate purpose that is actuating the Senator from Florida. The Senator, however, is in error in presuming that the home owners' loan corporation will make loans to anybody in the world except home owners. They are the only ones to whom it will make loans, whether by exchange of bonds or by advancement of cash. The advancement of cash, of course, must be limited within the amount that we are here appropriating. If the Senator wants to amend the bill and, instead of appropriating $200,000,000 for this purpose, go to the extent of taking over all the subsisting mortgage obligations on homes in the United States, and appropriate $20,000,000,000 for the purpose, then he might fairly say that that is the primary purpose of this measure. I do not so conceive it.

The committee has reported a bill which will give the maximum amount of relief to the home owners, and directly to the home owners, within a reasonable cost to the Government. The amendment, as I have said, is repetitious of what is already in the bill, except as to the declaration of the primary purpose of the bill. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, if I may be pardoned, I feel very earnest about this matter. The Senator talks as though this bill is framed with a home owner directly in view and for the purpose of aiding the home owner, and that all of the benefits will go to the home owner. Now, let us see whether it will all go to the home owners or not.

Paragraph (d), on page 22, provides:

(d) The Corporation is authorized, for a period of 3 years after the date of enactment of this act, (1) to acquire in exchange for bonds issued by it, home mortgages and other obligations and liens secured by real estate (including the interest of a vendor under a purchase-money mortgage or contract).

As I read that paragraph, considering the methods employed in this country in the past in dealing with mortgage securities, I would construe that to mean that the machinery set up in that paragraph is for the purpose of the corporation acquiring mortgages and securities constituting liens upon homes from those who are holding them, not from the home owner but from building-and-loan associations, mortgage companies, and every other character of corporation that deals in the purchasing and holding of mortgages. That machinery, indeed, would be very awkward for a private home owner who desires to obtain a loan. The only way he could obtain such a loan would be to take his mortgage and then go out, without any facilities and without any experience in dealing with bonds and securities, and raise the money upon bonds or other securities in order to relieve the mortgage upon his home. So I take it that that provision was never intended to affect very materially the home owner directly.

He would not know how to sell a mortgage; he would know nothing about a mortgage transaction of this character; he would have no agency for handling it. The only way he could get any money would be through the bonds of these large security institutions that have acquired many mortgages. Of course such institutions could apply to this corporation. They could say, "We have a hundred thousand dollars' worth of mortgages that we want to dispose of to you." The corporation could say, "We will pay you in bonds, and we will give you a small amount of cash, if necessary, to pay the taxes on the mortgaged property." Those people, skilled as they are always in business affairs, could arrange for a hundred thousand dollars' worth of bonds—the chances are they would have them all sold beforehand—and then they would take the bonds over through this Government agency and in that way the company would be assisted.

I have no objection to assistance being extended to financial companies if we extend equal generosity to the home owners directly, but I have become sick and tired of much of the legislation that we have been enacting here, most of the beneficent features of which centered around capital, around the big corporation interests of the country, to the exclusion of the general interest and welfare of the poor, helpless people of this country who need assistance and need it sorely. This bill, in my opinion, may well be characterized as similar to a number of others which we have passed here more in the interest of capital than for the ordinary, everyday citizen—home owner. I want to make it sure that these people will get the assistance. I want to eliminate the discrimination in favor of building and loan organizations. I am going to offer such an amendment on this question. The Senator keeps challenging me because I did not cover everything in one amendment. I am going to tell him of another amendment I am going to offer.

This bill specifically provides that a company that may hold—it does not use the word "company", but that is what it means—a mortgagee or a number of mortgagees may apply for assistance to the corporation, and then the corporation may take over their mortgages to the extent of 80 percent of the value of the real estate covered by the mortgages.

But if a loan is sought by a home owner direct—and the provision in the bill has not been made plain, according to my view—then his property is only considered worth 50 cents on the dollar for the purpose of getting a loan. All in the world that one has to do in order to increase the value of his property for loan purposes is to transfer the mortgage upon it from the home owner himself over to a building-and-loan association or some mortgage credit company, and then it is entitled to a loan of 80 percent of its value, a transaction which could be brought about within 10 minutes by people skilled in the preparation of legal papers.

I do not understand why there should be such a discrimination as that, and I am going to offer an amendment—I have it on the desk—to strike out the limitation of 50 percent, if the home owner is asking directly for a loan, and insert "80 percent", and allow him the same privilege which we allow the purchaser of a mortgage or the holder of a mortgage upon probably the property of his next-door neighbor. I cannot understand why that discrimination should be made in the bill.

Mr. President, whenever we get a vote on this amendment, then I am going to propose another one.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that, perhaps inadvertently, he is arguing for the benefit of the mortgagee rather than of the mortgagor. The bill provides for an exchange of bonds up to 80 percent of the fair value of the property to be accepted by the mortgagee for the release of the mortgage. The bond is possibly not worth par; but, if the Senator's amendment should be adopted and the Government should be obliged to pay cash up to 80 percent of the value of the mortgage, then the mortgagee will never accept the bonds, we will never have any case where the bonds will be accepted as contemplated by the terms of this bill, and the Government will be in the position of advancing cash in every case. Nobody could have made a better speech for the benefit of the mortgagee getting his full 100 percent in cash than the Senator from Florida has here made.

I repeat to the Senator that there is no provision under which the home-owners' loan corporation may make loans to a building-and-loan association or to a corporation of any kind. The Senator says that when the mortgages are paid off in the interest of the mortgagor, the holder of the mortgage would get the bonds. Of course, he will. If the loan is made under the Senator's amendment to pay off and take up a mortgage, who does he think will get the cash? It will be the mortgagee. His argument is that the mortgagee should get the cash instead of being obliged to take his part of the sacrifice and carry some of it in bonds of the corporation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am not one of those who always seek the last word, but when my position has not been correctly stated, I feel that I am entitled to have another word to say.

This particular paragraph deals with loans and mortgages on the individual home or with the application that might be made by the individual owner. There is a paragraph in the bill, and I challenge the Senator from Ohio to deny it, which by its terms provides that this corporation can acquire and purchase mortgages held by mortgage credit companies, insurance companies, and building-and-loan associations. They are not specifically mentioned by name, but the provisions of the bill authorize that to be done and say it is one of the primary purposes of the bill. Is not that correct?

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course, the mortgage must be acquired from whoever holds it. If the mortgagee does not get paid, how can the mortgagor save his home? The loan is to the mortgagor and the benefit is to the mortgagor. The mortgagee must get some sort of payment to satisfy his obligation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator's admission makes it very clear that I have not stated a position not provided for in the bill.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Senator stated that he wants them paid in cash rather than bonds.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is, the individual owner.

Mr. BULKLEY. The individual owner has to apply in every case.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I make the point of order that both the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Florida have spoken more than twice on the pending amendment. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names.

Adams	Copeland	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.
Ashurst	Costigan	Keyes	Russell
Austin	Cutting	King	Schall
Bachman	Dale	La Follette	Sheppard
Bailey	Dickinson	Lewis	Shipstead
Bankhead	Dieterich	Logan	Steiwer
Barbour	Dill	Lonergan	Stephens
Barkley	Duffy	Long	Thomas, Okla.
Black	Erickson	McAdoo	Thomas, Utah
Bone	Fess	McCarran	Thompson
Borah	Fletcher	McGill	Townsend
Bratton	Frazier	McNary	Trammell
Brown	George	Metcalf	Tydings
Bulkley	Glass	Murphy	Vandenberg
Bulow	Goldsborough	Neely	Van Nuys
Byrd	Gore	Norris	Wagner
Byrnes	Hale	Nye	Walcott
Capper	Harrison	Overton	Walsh
Caraway	Hatfield	Patterson	Wheeler
Carey	Hayden	Pope	White
Clark	Hebert	Reed
Connally	Johnson	Reynolds
Coolidge	Kean	Robinson, Ark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TYDINGS in the chair). Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for the information of Senators.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Florida proposes, in the committee amendment, on page 25, line 14, after the word "section", to add the following:

That direct loans in cash to home owners shall be made for the purpose of paying or settling an existing mortgage or other obligation upon the home, and this provision for loans direct to home owners shall be administered as one of the primary purposes of this act.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

On a division, the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question. I am in receipt of the following telegram:

The difficulty in enacting a law to assist home owners is apparent. Many of your constituents purchased old houses in Rockland County and spent one thousand or more dollars modernizing them, thereby increasing the mortgage security. However, this was no part of original sale contract. No retroactive feature of the law is involved in an amendment to the proposed relief measure providing that mortgagors shall be credited with all expenditures upon improvements and betterments if the property goes to foreclosure.

I assume there will be a revaluation and all these matters will be given consideration?

Mr. BULKLEY. All these loans and adjustments are to be based upon new appraisals, and unquestionably the appraisal will take into consideration any value that may have been added to the property in the manner suggested by the Senator's correspondent.

Mr. COPELAND. So that no advantage would be gained by an amendment covering such cases?

Mr. BULKLEY. I cannot think what the amendment would be. It seems to me the appraisal would take into consideration the matters which the Senator's correspondent has in mind.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to offer the following amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Florida proposes, on page 24, in line 22, after the word "authorized", to strike out "in its discretion", so as to read:

(f) The Corporation is further authorized, for a period of 3 years from the date of enactment of this act, in any case in which the holder of a home mortgage or other obligation or lien eligible for exchange under subsection (d) of this section does not accept the bonds of the Corporation in exchange as provided in such subsection and in which the Corporation finds that the home owner cannot obtain a loan from ordinary lending agencies, to make cash advances to such home owner in an amount not to exceed 50 percent of the value of the property for the purposes specified in such subsection (d).

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If it is satisfactory, I have nothing further to say. I have discussed the necessity for it more or less, and am glad to have the Senator accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the committee is agreed to.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I wish to invite the attention of the Senator from Ohio to a peculiar condition that exists in the provisions of paragraph (e), on page 24, as compared with the provisions of paragraph (f), on page 25.

In paragraph (e) it is provided that where a home is not encumbered the corporation may loan up to 80 percent of its value, whereas in paragraph (f), where a home is encumbered and the mortgagee refuses to accept bonds, the mortgagor may not secure a loan in excess of 50 percent of the value of the property.

It seems to me there is a discrepancy there, though perhaps the Senator had something else in mind and I have not read it in the same light the Senator does.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course, the purposes for which loans may be made in subsection (e) are so circumscribed that there probably never would be a case where as much as 80 percent would be loaned. Quite frankly, I will say to the Senator that I think 80 percent is a very high limit in that subsection.

Mr. HEBERT. I think so.

Mr. BULKLEY. But I do not think the criticism is serious, because the purposes for which the loans may be made are such that it would very seldom be reached.

Mr. HEBERT. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the purposes are the same in both paragraphs. They both refer to the purposes enumerated in subsection (d), and they have reference to the same subject; and that is what directed my attention to the difference. The purposes are the same in both instances; and it occurred to me that one should be reduced to the level of the other or the other should be raised to the maximum of 80 percent.

I could see no reason why a loan to the extent of 80 percent of the value should be made to the owner of real estate who has no mortgage outstanding on his property and a loan refused in excess of 50 percent of the value to one who has an obligation against his property.

Mr. BULKLEY. I desire to make clear to the Senator that I am quite ready to concede that the 80 percent in subsection (e) is an unduly high percentage. I do not, however, understand, as he does, that the purposes are the same.

The purpose of subsection (e) is to authorize advances for the same purposes for which cash advances may be made under subsection (d). Those are taxes, assessments, and necessary repairs. I submit that those purposes would hardly ever bring a loan up to 80 percent of the value of the property, whereas section (f) is for the purpose of permitting a home owner to pay off in cash a balance due on a mortgage.

Mr. HEBERT. That is the very point, and the limit is 50 percent there.

Mr. BULKLEY. The limit is 50 percent.

Mr. HEBERT. It seems to me it ought to be reversed, and that 80 percent should be provided the man who wishes to pay off in cash the balance due on a mortgage.

Mr. BULKLEY. The difficulty we find is that if we should make the limit for which we are willing to advance cash as high as the limit for which we are willing to trade bonds, we never would trade any bonds. It would all be cash.

Mr. HEBERT. I understand that.

Mr. BULKLEY. If the Senator wants to let this run into a cost of billions of dollars, then it would be possible to make those cash advances. Within a limit of $200,000,000, which we have set for ourselves in this bill, we do not think it possible to take over all of the home-loan mortgages that it might be wished to convert.

If the Senator desires to propose an amendment to reduce the limit in subsection (e) I shall have no objection, although, for the reasons stated, I do not think it is important.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I do not think the owner of property which is not at all encumbered should be privileged to borrow 80 percent of the value, whereas the owner of property that is encumbered should be limited to 50 percent. I think the same limitation should be placed upon the former that is placed upon the latter.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am obliged to make the same answer that I made the last time the Senator said that. The 80 percent in subsection (e) is unduly high; there is no question about that; but on account of the limitation of purpose it is not important to change it, although I am perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. HEBERT. No, Mr. President; but the purposes are the same, and refer to the same subsection in both instances.

In order to bring the matter before the Senate I move to change the figure "80", in line 14, on page 24, to "50."

Mr. BULKLEY. I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the committee?

Mr. WAGNER. One moment, Mr. President. What is the purpose of that—that where property is unencumbered the owner can borrow only 50 percent of the value of the property?

Mr. HEBERT. For that specific purpose.

Mr. WAGNER. What specific purpose?

Mr. BULKLEY. Cash advances for the purpose of paying taxes, assessments, and necessary repairs. It is not an important amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. Perhaps it is not, but I should like to know a little more about it.

What does the Senator propose to do? As I understand, there is now a provision in the bill which permits an owner whose property is unencumbered to borrow money up to 80 percent of the value of that property, and give in return therefor a mortgage lien upon the property. Is the Senator now proposing to reduce the amount that may be borrowed from 80 percent of the value of the property to 50 percent?

Mr. HEBERT. No, Mr. President; if the Senator will read subsection (d)——

Mr. WAGNER. I will take the Senator's explanation.

Mr. HEBERT. If the Senator will read subsection (d) he will see that it provides for the advance of money to take care of the unpaid taxes, assessments, insurance premiums, overdue interest, and things like that, that the home owner may be owing. This provision would permit him to borrow up to 80 percent of the value of his property. In paragraph (f), where there is an outstanding mortgage, and the owner of the mortgage refuses to accept bonds in payment of it, then he may not borrow in excess of 50 percent of the value of the property for the same purposes. It seemed to me that the man who has a mortgage outstanding on his property should be the one to receive the more liberal consideration. If any more liberal consideration is to be given to one than to the other, it should be to the one who has a mortgage outstanding on his property; but both are for specific purposes.

Mr. WAGNER. Is the Senator changing the measure so that the particular mortgagor whose mortgage is exchanged, representing only 50 percent of the value of the property, may now borrow an additional sum above that 50 percent to pay taxes?

Mr. HEBERT. Oh, no; there is no such intention.

Mr. WAGNER. I think that ought to be done, as a matter of fact. That would be the fair way of dealing with the subject.

Mr. HEBERT. If they are going to be brought up to a parity, that might be done; but, as the Senator from Ohio has explained, these will probably be rare cases, and in no case will there be a necessity to loan anywhere near 50 percent to take care of the exigencies for which provision is being made here.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. WAGNER. I think that is correct, too.

Mr. HEBERT. Now, Mr. President, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, was the amendment that has been under discussion accepted?

Mr. BULKLEY. I should like to know whether the last amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island was agreed to or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the case of the last amendment, the Chair asked if there was objection; and at that point the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] rose. So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. What has been done with it?

Mr. HEBERT. I had supposed that the Senator from Ohio had no objection to the amendment, and that it would be accepted.

Mr. BULKLEY. To make sure what we are talking about, I will state that the amendment was, on page 24, line 14, to change "80" to "50." I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the committee is to strike out "80" and to substitute "50" in the percentage on line 14 of page 24.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island offers a further amendment to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On line 16, page 19, after the word "States", it is proposed to insert the words—which shall have authority to sue and be sued in any court of competent jurisdiction, Federal or State——

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, the purpose of that amendment, of course, must be obvious. There is no provision in the bill now authorizing this corporation to sue in any court where there is failure to meet the conditions of a mortgage obligation, nor is there any provision authorizing anyone who has a claim against the corporation to bring suit against it. The amendment is to correct that oversight.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I am not sure as to the necessity for this amendment; but it certainly is not objectionable. I shall be glad to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 29 it is proposed to strike out, in lines 10, 11, and 12, the words—nor unless the same can be established without undue injury to properly conducted existing local thrift and home-financing institutions.

And to insert—

nor if one or more properly conducted local thrift and home-financing institutions is then in existence.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, paragraph (e), on page 29, places a limitation upon the authority of the corporation to issue charters to these building and loan and home-financing institutions. They may not grant a charter to such institutions unless the persons seeking charters are—of good character and responsibility, nor unless in the judgment of the Board a necessity exists for such an institution in the community to be served, nor unless there is a reasonable probability of its usefulness and success, nor unless the same can be established without undue injury to properly conducted existing local thrift and home-financing institutions.

There is no change in this paragraph except as to the last condition, namely—nor unless the same can be established without undue injury to properly conducted existing local thrift and home-financing institutions.

It need not be stated, for it must be obvious, that this corporation, with the amount available to it under this bill, cannot organize home-financing institutions in all of the communities of the country; and it seems to me that the provision of the bill as it now stands might involve some duplication of effort in many cases where certain interests in a given community might want, for their own purposes, to establish such an institution where one already is in existence.

I do not mean to prevent such an institution from being established in a community where one is already there if the one in existence is not functioning properly, if it is not serving the needs of the community as it should, or if it is not a worth-while institution in every respect; but where one is established, where one is transacting business, where one meets all the requirements of a community, then clearly no good purpose could be served by having the competition of a Federal corporation in that community.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEBERT. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator please state the language he employs in eliminating the condition contained in the bill?

Mr. HEBERT. Yes, Mr. President:

If one or more properly conducted local thrift and home-financing institutions is then in existence.

That is, at the time an effort is made to secure a charter for the organization of a Federal institution of that type in a community.

Then, again, it must be apparent to any one of us that the establishment of a Federal institution of this kind side by side with a local one, perhaps limited in finances, though serving the needs of the community, probably would drive the local institution out of existence.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me if I inquire why the language that is employed in the bill does not accomplish the purpose suggested by the Senator better than the language he suggests?

Mr. HEBERT. For the reason, Mr. President, that the language of the bill leaves it to the discretion of the Home Loan Bank Board whether or not the establishment of another institution of this kind will work an injury. It is left to the discretion of the Board.

Mr. BULKLEY. Does it not also leave it to the discretion of the Home Loan Bank Board, under the amendment as proposed by the Senator, to determine whether a local home-financing institution is or is not properly conducted?

Mr. HEBERT. That may be.

Mr. BULKLEY. It is about as broad as it is long. The Board must have some discretion anyway; and surely the Board could not establish an institution which, as the Senator suggests, would drive somebody else out of existence without a gross violation of the act, because we are proposing here that they must be "established without undue injury to properly conducted existing local thrift and home-financing institutions."

Mr. HEBERT. That does not limit it very much, because whether or not the establishment of a new institution is going to work undue injury is a question of opinion, and in this case it would be much easier to ascertain, because the facts are already in existence, whether a local institution is serving the public, and much more difficult to ascertain whether or not the establishment of another institution is going to be injurious.

Mr. BULKLEY. The difficulty is that some communities are very large. Take Chicago, for instance; would the Senator say that if one or two institutions existed in Chicago it would be an undue hardship to have another one established alongside of them? The power we propose to give here is quite similar to the discretion given to the Comptroller of the Currency with respect to chartering national banks. On the whole, that power has not been abused. Of course, it is a question of judgment, and there may be errors of judgment, but it seems to me that the language in the bill as it is written is sufficiently protective of existing institutions.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I do not think so. The city of Chicago, of course, is not one single locality within the purview of this legislation. These local institutions serve small communities within the large communities, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is probably true, but that is all within the judgment of the Home Loan Board. It must be left to the discretion of the Home Loan Board as to what constitutes a community.

Mr. HEBERT. I cannot agree to that. But it seems to me that this language which I have suggested would still leave it to the determination of the Board. It will not be so difficult of ascertainment as would the language in the bill. That is the reason why I have suggested the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the committee.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I offer an amendment. On page 19, strike out lines 7 to 11, inclusive, as follows:

REPEAL OF DIRECT-LOAN PROVISION OF FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK ACT

SEC. 3. Subsection (d) of section 4 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act (providing for direct loans to home owners) is hereby repealed.

This is a matter to which we addressed ourselves earlier in the day. The original Home Loan Act authorized home-loan banks to make loans direct to individual home owners. The banks have not exercised that power. For reasons known to themselves, they have declined to do so. They have contented themselves with lending money to building and loan associations, to be loaned, in turn, to the borrowers from those associations.

As stated, the original act empowered home-loan banks to make loans direct to home owners. Now it is proposed to repeal that provision and to take away from the home-loan banks even the power to make such loans.

Mr. President, extraordinary circumstances are easily conceivable where a home-loan bank might exercise the power in the interest of a distressed home owner who, with adequate security, is unable to obtain relief elsewhere. I see no reason for arguing that the provision should be repealed simply because another system is created under this measure. If the banks continue to decline to exercise the power, it will remain a dead letter, just as it is today. But why should we take it away? Why should we repeal the provision? I think we are traveling in the wrong direction. It should be continued, and, if possible, the banks should make loans of that character.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio, in charge of the bill, says that it would be expensive and difficult to create the machinery throughout the country to apprize property, to inspect property, and to take the other steps necessary to make individual loans. We can understand that perfectly. Perhaps a general system of that kind would never be created under the act. But why not leave the law in force, so that if, through changed circumstances or otherwise, these several home-loan banks can lend or will lend money direct to home owners, if they have the money and are willing to lend it, they may be permitted to do so? Why should we repeal the law and take from these banks the power to make loans direct to home owners?

The Senator from Ohio says that it places the home-loan bank in direct competition with building and loan associations existing throughout the country. No more so than the Federal land bank is in direct competition with mortgage companies making loans direct to farmers throughout the country. The mortgage companies could make the same argument against continuing the Federal land bank system, namely, that it comes in direct competition with them.

Mr. President, we all know that the building and loan associations are not meeting the demands; they are not meeting the legitimate demands; they are not meeting the urgent demands; they are not meeting demands coming from distressed home owners. I do not say that in a spirit of criticism. They are not able to do so. Economic conditions make it so. They are unable to meet these demands. They are not seeking loans; they are not looking vainly for places to lend money on adequate security. They are not endangered by competition. There are many times more demands for loans than the building and loan associations can supply.

During these unfortunate and stressful days we may well leave this original provision in force. If it is exercised, if loans are made, much the better. If they are not made, it remains a dead letter, inoperative, no good, no harm.

I therefore urge upon the Senator from Ohio that he accept the amendment, and leave the original provision of law in force for whatever good it may accomplish. It certainly can do no harm.

I hope very much that the Senator will accept the amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, in view of the consideration that was given to this subject in the committee I do not feel at liberty to accept the amendment. We talked some time ago about this subject, and I expressed to the able Senator from New Mexico my views that the parallel with the Federal land bank is not quite sound, because, after all, the Federal land banks do lend their money not to the individual borrower but to the local association. The local farm associations are organizations of borrowers who have subscribed to capital stock, and have some liability, local liability, behind the advances which are made by the Federal land banks. That local liability, the dealing with the borrower by somebody who knows the borrower, is worth something to the security of the land banks and of the home-loan banks.

The Senator suggests that if the home-loan banks continue as they have in the past, and refuse to make any of these direct loans, then no harm will have been done by the amendment. Unfortunately, I do not think that is true. The effort we are making is to get loans to home owners at the lowest possible rate of interest. Unless we are to make this a subsidized proposition out and out, the cost of the money to the home owner must depend upon the cost of the money to the home-loan bank, must depend upon the rates at which it can sell its bonds.

The obligation of the home-loan bank which directly deals with individual borrowers cannot possibly be regarded as an investment on a parity with bonds of a bank of rediscount, or a bank which takes only endorsed paper on which there is the responsibility of a local association, as well as the responsibility of the borrower.

The direct-loan plan has been tried—it is not satisfactory, it is not successful. The home-loan banks cannot extend their facilities for dealing with home owners directly without a large and unnecessary cost, which will increase the cost which every home owner must pay; nor can they sell their bonds as advantageously as will be possible if we keep them strictly as banks of rediscount.

Therefore, with much sympathy in the purpose by which the Senator from New Mexico is actuated, I respectfully have to differ from him and hope that his amendment will be defeated.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long. The Senator from Ohio points out that in a technical sense, perhaps a supertechnical sense, a borrower from a Federal land bank does go through a local association; but in a practical sense he borrows the money direct from the Federal land bank. Therefore, I see no distinction, in a practical sense, in the degree of competition between a Government agency here and in the case I have instanced.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio says the system has been tried out and found impracticable. According to my understanding, not a single loan has been made under that provision of the law. My information is that not a single loan has been made direct from a home-loan bank to an individual borrower. It seems to me, therefore, that it cannot be said with justification that the system has been tried and found to be unsatisfactory.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I want to be fair to the Senator about that. It is perfectly true that no such loans have been made, and it is impracticable, under the existing law. There is a provision of law with which no doubt the Senator is familiar, that such loans are limited to 40 percent of the value of the collateral, and most of these borrowers have borrowed more than that, so that there is that additional reason why it has proven a handicap.

Mr. BRATTON. It is a handicap. Every one familiar with the situation concedes that. But why not continue the facility for whatever it may accomplish to home owners in this period of distress?

I shall not detain the Senate longer. I submit the amendment, and I hope it will prevail, and that the law authorizing these banks to make direct loans will be continued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BRATTON. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Committee on Finance will meet at 4 o'clock this afternoon, and the Senate might adjourn a little earlier than we thought. The committee expects to make its report this afternoon, and I am asking unanimous consent, rather than keep the Senate unnecessarily in session, that the Committee on Finance may submit its report on the public construction bill by handing the report to the Secretary of the Senate, so that it may be printed and be ready for consideration tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] wished to be present when that request was made. So, reserving the right to object, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to have a call of the Senate. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will withdraw his point of no quorum, and then when the Senator from Oregon shall return to the Chamber, I shall come out of the committee and make the request.

Mr. REED. Very well; I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. WAGNER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 23, line 23, it is proposed to strike out the period and to insert a semicolon and the following:

And no payment of any installment of principal shall be required during the period of 3 years from the date this act takes effect, if the home owner shall not be in default with respect to any other condition or covenant of his mortgage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I think that a mere statement of the situation will persuade the Senate that this amendment ought to be adopted. I have used the language in the amendment which now appears in the Farm Mortgage Loan Act which the Senate passed some time ago. In that act we provided a 5-year moratorium, that is, a deferment of payment of the principal of a mortgage. The idea was, the farmer being in distress and threatened with foreclosure, to give him definitely a period in which to readjust his affairs, and not make him rely upon some board in some particular locality in whose discretion and upon whose judgment depended the decision as to whether or not the farmer should get a moratorium. Since the home owners are in a similar distressed condition—I need not paint that picture; I am sure everybody here knows that they are distressed or else this proposed legislation would not be here—I am simply pleading with the Senate that those home owners receive treatment similar to that which we have accorded to the farmer, except that I do not propose that the period shall be so long as is provided in the Farm Loan Mortgage Act. In that act it was 5 years; in this amendment I am limiting it to 3 years.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator did not bring this matter up in the committee rather than on the floor of the Senate, but, as he has stated, there is some parallel between the condition of the home owners and the condition affecting the farmers which resulted in the formulation of the legislation which we recently enacted. I shall not object to the amendment being taken to conference, although, as it has not been considered by the committee, I do not want to make further commitment regarding it.

Mr. WAGNER. May I just make an observation as a sort of excuse for not offering the amendment before the committee? The bill as originally introduced contained a provision for a 3-year moratorium, and I assumed that that provision remained throughout the consideration of the proposed legislation in both Houses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the committee amendment.

Mr. HATFIELD and Mr. HEBERT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield first to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. Does the amendment offered by the Senator from New York authorize a direct loan to the home owner?

Mr. WAGNER. No; the amendment has nothing at all to do with loans. It applies after the loan shall have been made or where an exchange has taken place and the mortgage is taken over by the corporation created under this proposed act, and provides that then the home owner shall have a period of 3 years, during which he shall not be required to pay anything upon the principal of the mortgage, not the interest; I am not dealing with the interest at all.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, does the Senator's amendment make it obligatory upon the corporation to permit the mortgagor to cease payments?

Mr. WAGNER. It gives the mortgagor a moratorium of 3 years——

Mr. HEBERT. Absolutely?

Mr. WAGNER. Absolutely upon the principal of the mortgage, not upon the interest. I have stated to the Senate that when we had up for consideration the farm mortgage bill, of which on behalf of the committee I had charge, we gave the farmer—and I think it was just treatment of him—a period of 5 years during which he did not have to pay any installment upon the principal of his mortgage, and I am asking that the home owner be accorded the same privilege, except that I am limiting the period to 3 years instead of 5 years.

Without such a provision I may say that this bill will do very little to help the home owner who is in a distressed condition because this legislation is proposed by reason of the fact that he is unable to meet the principal, and, therefore, the Government is coming to his assistance.

Mr. HEBERT. I assume the Senator is familiar with the provision beginning in line 18, on page 23 of the bill?

Mr. WAGNER. Does the Senator mean the provision giving the Board discretionary power?

Mr. HEBERT. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. Under that provision it would be possible to have various boards exercising their judgment in a different way; there would be opportunities for favoritism in all these administrative matters to which, during these distressing days, I do not think the home owner ought to be subjected to. We thought so in the case of the farmer and we ought to apply the same rule to the home owner.

Mr. HERBERT. I am quite in accord with the Senator's view that if we extended that privilege to the farmer we ought to extend it to other home owners equally.

Mr. WAGNER. We did extend it to the farmers.

Mr. HEBERT. I wish to ask the Senator another question. Will that absolve the mortgagor from paying interest on his loan during that time?

Mr. WAGNER. No; the moratorium has nothing to do with interest.

Mr. HEBERT. It merely applies to the payment of the installments on the principal?

Mr. WAGNER. It applies to the installments upon the principal, to the liquidation of the principal of the mortgage.

Mr. HEBERT. The amortization of the mortgage?

Mr. WAGNER. The amortization of the mortgage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, in subsection (f), on page 25, in the provision for direct loans to individuals, it is set forth that interest shall be paid at the same rate as provided in the mortgage or other obligation taken up. It seems to me that that is absolutely unfair and would be practically of no benefit to the individual home borrower. In my State many of the loans now bear a rate of interest of 8 or 9 or 10 percent, and the rate under this provision should be lower. So I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the amendment of the committee, on page 25, lines 10 and 11, it is proposed to strike out the words "at the same rate as the mortgage or other obligation taken up" and insert "at the rate of 5 percent per annum."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the amendment, if adopted, would simply make the provision read as follows:

Each such loan shall be secured by a duly recorded home mortgage and shall bear interest at the rate of 5 percent per annum.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, that will cost hundreds of millions of dollars more than the bill as it now stands.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the bill is pretended to be for the benefit of the home owner, and if it is going to be for the benefit of the home owner it seems to me the rate of interest should be reduced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment reported by the committee. [Putting the question.]

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask for a division.

Mr. LONG. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.
Ashurst	Costigan	Keyes	Russell
Austin	Cutting	King	Schall
Bachman	Dale	La Follette	Sheppard
Bailey	Dickinson	Lewis	Shipstead
Bankhead	Dieterich	Logan	Steiwer
Barbour	Dill	Lonergan	Stephens
Barkley	Duffy	Long	Thomas, Okla.
Black	Erickson	McAdoo	Thomas, Utah
Bone	Fess	McCarran	Thompson
Borah	Fletcher	McGill	Townsend
Bratton	Frazier	McNary	Trammell
Brown	George	Metcalf	Tydings
Bulkley	Glass	Murphy	Vandenberg

Caraway	Hatfield	Patterson	Wheeler
Carey	Hayden	Pope	White
Clark	Hebert	Reed
Connally	Johnson	Reynolds
Coolidge	Kean	Robinson, Ark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, this amendment simply is to make the interest rate uniform. As provided by the Senate committee amendment, the mortgage loan is to be taken up, and the Government board is to charge the same rate of interest that is being charged on the particular mortgage. That means 5 percent in New Jersey, 8 percent in Louisiana, and perhaps 12 percent in some other State. The amendment of the Senator from North Dakota simply makes it a uniform rate so that when the Government takes up a mortgage it shall not charge more thereafter than 5 percent. There will be some States that will be getting the benefit of a 5-percent rate. Some will be getting the benefit of an 8-percent rate. The money does not cost the Government more than 5 percent—indeed, not that much—and we ask that there be a uniform interest rate of 5 percent per annum, which many of the States will get anyway, and which some of us will be denied without the amendment.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the question comes to the whole workability of the bill. It is not a question of what the Government gets or charges on any one specific loan. It is a question of keeping the whole amount of the operation within the limits that are practicable for us to go. We have provided $200,000,000 capital for this institution. That is all it will have in cash. It is true it will have the right to issue $2,000,000,000 of bonds, but those being 4-percent bonds, it is a serious question whether they can sell at par. In fact, we are not contemplating that the bonds will be sold at all. We are contemplating that they will be traded out in payment for these mortgages.

We have provided that within a certain limit, when a mortgage has been taken for less than 50 percent of the value of the property and where the mortgagor has been pinched, the corporation will come to his rescue by advancing sufficient cash to pay off the mortgage. We want that to be confined to cases that are really in distress. We do not want it to go so far as to cause people to want to shift merely for the sake of getting a lower rate of interest. If that is the object, if we want merely to make loans for a lower rate of interest, we can do a volume of business out of all proportion to the amount of money here proposed.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, what has that to do with it? We will be lending some of this money at 5 percent, because that is the legal rate of interest in some States.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio will permit me?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. To fix a 5-percent rate of interest would invite every mortgagor to seek to refinace his mortgage whether there was a real necessity for it or not, and would swell the total volume of the business transacted to so many billions of dollars that the Government probably could not finance it at all.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is exactly the situation. If we offer to lend cash or advance it at a rate below the fair going-market rate, if we are going to do so large a business as that would involve, we will have to provide not $200,000,000, but we will have to run into the billions of dollars; we will have to run into an amount that I have no doubt would invite a Presidential veto of the measure.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Why not say not to exceed 6 percent?

Mr. BULKLEY. To make it as low as 6 percent would be subject to the same objection.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think so at all. For instance, in the city of Washington a man borrowing money pays 5 or 5½ percent. If the Government is going to loan money at 5 percent in the city of Washington to take up mortgages for the people here, why should not they take up the mortgages for people living in the city of Butte, Mont., or the city of Fargo, N.Dak., or some other place at the same rate of interest? There is nothing to compel the Government to take up these mortgages. The Government would only take them up, I believe, where there is some necessity for them to be taken up. But we should not discriminate; the Government ought not to discriminate against the West or the South.

Mr. BULKLEY. When the Government gives the borrower the same rate of interest that he has bargained for and agreed to pay, there is no discrimination.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes; there is discrimination.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if we fix by law a lower rate of interest than the borrower is paying, he will naturally wish to refinance his loan. He would be foolish if he did not. That means that every borrower in the United States who is paying in excess of 5 percent, or whatever rate might be fixed, will immediately seek to refinance his loan and get the benefit of the lower rate of interest.

Mr. WHEELER. I appreciate that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Government would take over the entire home-loan business.

Mr. WHEELER. I think we are coming to identically that situation anyway.

Mr. BULKLEY. We have a good deal of danger in it anyway, and we do not want that increased by any such provision as is proposed.

Mr. WHEELER. Here is what we will run up against: The Government of the United States will start lending money to the people of the city of New York or the city of Washington at 5 percent, while they will charge my people in Montana 8 or 10 percent, and they will charge the people of North Dakota and other western and Northwestern States 8 or 10 percent. Then we are going to have the greatest charge of discrimination against the Government that we have ever had. I do not want my people saying to me and I do not want to hear the people of the West and South saying that the Government of the United States discriminated against them in favor of some eastern cities where the rate of interest is already lower than it is in the other sections to which I have referred. A private borrower can discriminate in that way, but it seems to me we are placing the Government in a bad position if we undertake to do it.

I do not want to have any criticism against the Government of the United States or against the administration that we can possibly avoid having. If we arrange to loan money to the people of the city of Washington or the city of

New York or some other eastern city at 5 or 6 percent or 4 percent and charge the people of Montana, North Dakota, Minnesota, and the Middle West and South 8 percent, we will have the greatest orgy of criticism against the Government that we have had in this country for a long time.

We are discriminating enough now. We will have pressure brought to bear by the many mortgage holders in the cities of the East to relieve them. It seems to me we are going to meet with a tremendous lot of trouble if we do not lower the rate of interest or regulate it and make it uniform.

Mr. BULKLEY. How much does the Senator want to loan altogether in cash advances?

Mr. WHEELER. That has not anything to do with it.

Mr. BULKLEY. It has a great deal to do with it.

Mr. WHEELER. Not in the slightest degree.

Mr BULKLEY. How are we going to restrict the amount?

Mr. WHEELER. How are we going to restrict it, anyway?

Mr. BULKLEY. It restricts itself if we keep it within bounds. We must not make it too desirable.

Mr. WHEELER. It is not restricted at all under the present bill. I venture the assertion that every man in the State of Montana will want to borrow money from the Government of the United States if he has to pay the same rate of interest he is paying now, because he is going to feel that the Government of the United States is not going to foreclose his property, that it cannot very well do it, or at least it will not do it the same as a private lender would. If the Government of the United States loans the money, then it is going to have to determine whether or not the applicant is liable to lose his place if we do not lend him the money. If we do lend the money, it seems to me the same rate of interest ought to apply in one section of the country that applies in other sections. If not, we are bound to array one section of the country against the Government and against other sections of the country. I do not want to see it. I think it is a very bad practice for the Government to put itself in a position where it will array different sections of the country against other sections.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Senator has nearly convinced me that the Government should lend no money at all under any circumstances.

Mr. WHEELER. I am frank to say that unless we give the people of the country the same general rate, the policy adopted here is not going to do very much good, in my judgment.

Mr. BULKLEY. It is not going to do any good if we allow the people to shift their loans to the Government in order to get a lower rate of interest.

Mr. WHEELER. They are going to shift not simply to get a lower rate of interest but many of them will shift regardless of whether they get a lower rate of interest, because they will feel so much safer with the Government of the United States making the loan to them than if some private individual had made the loan. Would not the Senator feel safer and would not I feel safer if I knew the Government of the United States had made the loan, and I could appeal to my Representative or Senator? I could go down and have my Senator or Representative appeal to the Department and say to the Department, "You must not foreclose this loan." I would feel safer about it than if I had some private individual holding the mortgage and insisting, "If you do not pay this loan, I am going to foreclose and set you out on the street."

Then the question is, What rate of interest shall be fixed? It ought to be the same, and it will not make a particle of difference, in my judgment, in the administration of the provisions of the measure, except that it will stop a very severe criticism that we will get if it can be said, "Yes, the Government lends money to the city of New York and the city of Washington for 5 percent or 4 percent, but it charges the people out here in the West and Northwest in these small towns 8 percent or 10 percent."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for just a moment?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. What is the interest rate we have in the Farm Loan Act? Is not that a fixed rate—5½ or 5 percent?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; we have a fixed rate there.

Mr. LONG. What is the excuse for making fish out of one and fowl out of the other? There is no reason why we should do one thing in one act and another thing in another act.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the farm-loan proposition is not a cash advance. It is a bond exchange; and we have the same proposition here, 5 percent, when it is a bond exchange. In this section we are trying to protect the amount of cash advances that the Government will be obliged to make.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WHEELER. I do.

Mr. BLACK. Has the Senator offered an amendment which will provide that the interest rate shall be the same throughout the country?

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], I think, has offered an amendment to the amendment of the committee making the interest rate 5 percent per annum in all sections of the country.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] seems to think too many applications for loans would come in if the rate of interest were fixed at 5 percent.

The home bank bill contained a clause for individual loans. There has not been a single individual loan made, and there is a lot of criticism all over the country; and if this provision remains as it is written in the bill by the committee, there will not be any individual loans made here.

If we want the same criticism from the individual home owners who need to save their homes, let us pass the bill as it is, allowing the rate of interest to be whatever the rate of the existing mortgage is. Out in our part of the country it is from 8 to 10 percent; and there will not be any loans made by the Government under those conditions. If the bill is going to be of any benefit to these home owners, if it is going to save their homes, the rate of interest should be lowered to 5 percent.

Under subsection (d) provision is made for loans up to 80 percent of valuation at 5 percent. This provision is for loans up to 50 percent of valuation at 5 percent, if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I have explained the distinction there. One is a bond exchange, and the other is a cash advance.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I know that several of the Senators did not catch that point. Under the Farm Loan Act we loan 80 percent of the value at 5-percent interest. That is true, is it not?

Mr. FRAZIER. No; 50 percent of the value on farm loans.

Mr. LONG. But under this bill what is done?

Mr. FRAZIER. In subsection (f) of this bill it is provided that not to exceed 50 percent of the value of the property may be loaned; and the amendment would make the interest rate 5 percent.

Mr. LONG. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] a few moments ago not only stated the truth, he stated the whole truth. He said that if this amendment is adopted it will not be long before the Federal Government will take over the entire home-loan business of the country.

Certainly that is true. I do not suppose any Senator lays to his soul the flattering unction that this does not mean that sooner or later the Federal Government will make all these loans on all these homes.

The thing that impresses me, and gives me some concern, is to see "potent, grave, and reverend signiors" discussing the imaginary difference between a 3-year and a 5-year moratorium.

What is the difference? Will not the moratorium be made perpetual? Senators rise in their places and discuss the imaginary difference between 5 percent interest and 8 percent interest under this scheme. What is the difference? Neither will be paid.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] stated another truth. He said that he would feel much safer if his loan were placed with the Federal Government rather than a private lending concern. He said he did not believe the Federal Government would foreclose the mortgage. Certainly it will not. Suppose we make loans to 1,000,000 or 2,000,000 farmers, and they demand extensions, reductions, cancelations. What answer will Senators make?

Mr. WHEELER. "Cancel."

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Montana says "cancel", and echo answers "cancel", a chorus answers "cancel." There is no other course. Farmers are human; Senators are human.

Senators cannot resist the irresistible. Did we not witness here on Friday last the Senate yielding to a demand of veterans, only a small percentage of the number that will have these loans before this system is closed?

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DILL. I remind the Senator that the Federal land banks have been foreclosing on farmers. I do not think the Senator's argument is backed by the facts in connection with the Federal land banks.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, sad to say, there have been some foreclosures, and with what result? How many Senators have been appealing to these banks not to foreclose? And did not the Federal Government, a year ago, make another advance of $125,000,000, with the express stipulation that $25,000,000 should be used to avoid and avert foreclosures? Have we not just revised our entire Federal land-loan system? Congress has extended the time, reduced the rate, and granted a 5-year moratorium. That is the point. The future will reenact the past.

What is the nature of the amendments offered here today? Every one of these bills that have come forth provides for easier terms, lower rates, longer terms, wider moratoriums—merely adjourning a day that is inevitable.

Mr. President, I am willing to go as far, willing to go as fast, as whoever goes farthest and fastest in an effort to find and to apply a just, reasonable, and effective solution for our debt problem. That is the problem that staggers us, that staggers the debtors of the country. I am willing and anxious to pass laws that will enable our people to get out of debt rather than to pass so many laws enabling them to get deeper into debt—deeper in the quicksand, deeper in the quagmire of debt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of subsection (j) of section 4, on page 26, it is proposed to insert the following:

The President shall appoint one home-loan agent for each State, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the Corporation shall fix the salary of each home-loan agent, but not in excess of $6,000 per annum. The home-loan agent in each State shall be under the direction of the Corporation, and shall perform such duties as the Corporation may direct, and, subject to the approval of the Corporation, shall appoint and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, attorneys, and agents within the States as the Corporation may find are necessary to the performance of the work of the Corporation, without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment or compensation of such employees of the United States.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to put a stop to the past practices of the officials of this Government in the appointment of the men who are to carry out these emergency measures.

I remind the Senate that we passed the reforestation bill without incorporating in it any provision for control of the appointment of those who were to have charge of the operation of that bill; and what do we find? We find that instead of controlling the work from Washington, D.C., it has been turned over to the State relief commissions, and they are selecting the officials in the various States. They have control; and the Federal Government officials are simply rubber stamps.

We put in the farm bill no provision whatever for selection and confirmation of those who were to carry out those administrative parts of the bill that were to be administered throughout the States; and what has the Secretary of Agriculture done? He has turned over to the Governor and the chief justice of the supreme court of each State the selection of the men who are to administer the emergency provisions of the farm bill; and again the Federal officials here have nothing to say about it. It is the most unheard-of and indefensible procedure I have ever known.

It seems to me that with those two instances before us, with at least the complaint, if not an actual scandal, hanging around the reforestation officials already in the buying of toilet kits for the men in the reforestation camps, it is about time some little Federal control was exercised in the selection of the men who are to administer these laws.

For that reason I have offered here an amendment to provide that the President shall name these agents, and in order that some investigation shall be made by responsible committees of the Senate of the men who are to administer this statute, and that they shall not be appointed by State officials who have no responsibility whatsoever to the Federal Government or to the Congress.

I do not care to take up the time of the Senate in arguing the amendment further. It seems to me that on its face its need is so pressing that it should be adopted unanimously.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as I understand—I was not in the Chamber at the moment the amendment was offered—the Senator proposes that this act shall be administered by a State administrator confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. DILL. I propose that the men in the various States who are to carry it out shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and that the employees and assistants under him shall be recommended by him, but approved by the corporation; and that the number of them, their compensation, and their duties, shall be determined by the corporation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wish to say that the Senator's mention of the recent fraud and corruption that at least is alleged to have been going on under these appointments that are springing up like mushrooms, such as this kit sale and other things of its kind, certainly convinces me that the Senator is right, and that we ought to follow the safe and ordinary course, and have appointments that the Senate will confirm. By that means we will avoid many hours of grief that we are having already as a result of this departure from that safe precedent.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, of course the subject matter of this amendment has not been before the committee, and I cannot speak for my colleagues. I do not wish anything I say to seem to be en endorsement of any criticism of other administrations that have been set up under emergency legislation; but I see no reason why we should not accept this amendment and let it go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 25, line 20, after the word "trust", it is proposed to insert—or under power of attorney, or by voluntary surrender to the mortgagee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, this amendment has to do with the recovery of a home lost by mortgage foreclosure, and merely broadens the power of the corporation to relieve that type of victim. The present provision of the bill is that the corporation is authorized, for a period of 3 years after the date of enactment of the measure, to exchange bonds and to advance cash to redeem or recover homes lost by the owners by foreclosure or forced sale by a trustee under a deed of trust; and then the amendment proposes to insert the provision—or under power of attorney, or by voluntary surrender to the mortgagee.

It merely broadens the measure; and I understand that the committee is willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, this amendment is in line with the policy of the committee in drafting the subsection, and I feel safe in saying that it actually improves the language of the section. I hope it will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] was defeated. It is the amendment on page 25 which proposed to make the interest rate a flat 5 percent.

I move a reconsideration of that vote; and before yielding the floor—because it seems that my good friend from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] wants to apply the ax to this motion—I wish to say that I think we ought to have a record vote on this question. It is about the most important amendment we have voted on. Many Senators were not here at the time; and we ought not to pass on this question without a record vote.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to state that I am heartily in sympathy with that view. Let Senators express themselves on these matters which are of vital concern to the home owners of the country.

Mr. LONG. I agree with the Senator from Florida.

Mr. President, I do not think Senators want to leave here without a record vote on this matter. When only a few of us participate in a vote, it does not develop the sentiment of the Senate on an important matter of this kind.

This amendment provides for a uniform interest rate throughout the country. If the interest rate in New Jersey is 5 percent—and I understand that to be the legal rate of interest in that State——

Mr. KEAN. No, Mr. President; it is 6 percent.

Mr. LONG. Well, I am willing to make it 6 percent in this amendment, if the Senator wants to have it 6 percent. I wonder if I may get the consent of the Senator from North Dakota to make this 6 percent instead of 5 percent? I want to be liberal about it.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, as I understand, the motion to reconsider would have to be agreed to before we could change the rate. Six percent would be a great deal better than the present provision.

Mr. LONG. I may state, may I not, that we will modify the amendment so as to make it 6 percent if the motion to reconsider is agreed to?

Mr. FRAZIER. I will make it that.

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent, with the consent of the Senator from North Dakota, to make the figure in the amendment 6 percent instead of 5 percent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That can be done only by unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota was rejected.

Mr. LONG. Then, on behalf of the Senator from North Dakota and myself and others of us, with the permission of the Senator from North Dakota, I announce that if the vote is reconsidered, we will make this amendment provide for 6 percent, so that there will be that much more allowed.

I have not read the act lately, but I am told that we made the Farm Mortgage Act a bond proposition, with the bonds bearing 4 percent and the loans 5 percent. In this instance we will make the figure 6 percent, and there is no reason under the sun why, if we are to lend this money to the people of the country to save their homes, the man in New Jersey shall borrow it at 6 percent, the man in North Dakota at 10 or 11 percent, and the man in Louisiana at 8 percent.

Mr. LOGAN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Louisiana suggests that if there is a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was rejected he will then offer to change the amendment and make it 6 percent. What I should like to know is whether or not there is anything that will prevent the Senator from Louisiana from offering an amendment now making the rate 6 percent, without a reconsideration at all.

Mr. LONG. I can do that; can I not, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be in order.

Mr. LONG. Then, I will withdraw my motion to reconsider, without prejudice; and I now offer an amendment, in line 10, page 25, to strike out the words "the same rate as the mortgage or other obligation taken up", and in lieu thereof insert the words "a rate not to exceed 6 percent per annum."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana withdraws the motion to reconsider, and offers an amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, in line with what has been suggested by my distinguished colleague from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], I have made this amendment provide for 6 percent. That is enough; 6 percent is plenty; that is all it ought to be. We made the farm-mortgage rate 5 percent, and we certainly ought not to make this to exceed 6 percent. My amendment would allow them to charge not to exceed 6 percent per annum.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I am thoroughly in sympathy with the idea that there should not be a higher rate of interest charged for Government money in one State than in another. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that under the amendment he has now proposed the corporation might still charge 5 percent in one State and 6 percent in another. If the Senator will simply make his amendment provide for a rate of interest which shall be uniform throughout the country, but which shall in no event be greater than a certain amount, he would cover the situation.

Mr. LONG. I am willing to modify the amendment to that extent so as to read:

A rate of interest which shall be uniform throughout the United States, but which in no event shall exceed 6 percent per annum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, as modified, to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, this subject has been pretty fully discussed. The amendment as now offered does not seem to me to present the same dangers presented by the amendment carrying 5 percent. I do not think it is free from danger; I think it is a matter which ought to have further consideration, and that there ought to be further opportunity to find out how dangerous it is. With that statement I am willing to accept the amendment as offered, and hope that the conferees will consider carefully whether such an arrangement is justified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to propose an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. There is proposed to be added a new section, as follows:

On the board of directors of the Federal home land banks, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and the Federal savings and loan associations, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board shall name such number of the directors as is equal to the proportion of the total as the capital paid-in stock of the Government bears to the total of all paid-in capital stock.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offer this amendment for the purpose of giving the Government representation on the board of directors of these different agencies set up by the bill and also set up by the original Home Loan Bank Act.

At the present time, under the original Home Loan Act, the Government, although it has paid in more of the capital, as far as the cash contribution is concerned, than the other members of the organization, has no representation whatever upon the board of directors.

I should like to know where we could find a set of business men anywhere in this country who would contribute a greater proportion of the cash capital for a corporation than did other stockholders, and have no representation upon the board of directors.

The object of the amendment is to provide that if the Government has paid in $200,000,000 toward the capital stock of the corporation and other stockholders have paid in only $1,000,000 toward the capital stock, the Government shall have something to do with the management and the direction of the institution. It is upon a fairer basis, it is upon the basis of the amount of the paid-in capital stock of the Government, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in proportion to that paid in by the other stockholders. It seems to me it is a very reasonable proposition.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to make sure that I understand the amendment. The Senator intends that the Home Loan Bank Board shall name directors of the home loan banks and of the Federal savings and loan associations in the same proportion the Government capital bears to the total capital?

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is the idea.

Mr. BULKLEY. I see no objection to that, but in the amendment as submitted by the Senator there is reference also to directors of the home owners' loan corporation. The bill provides that the directors shall be the Home Loan Bank Board, so if the Senator will eliminate that from the amendment, I shall see no reason for not accepting it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wrote that in for the reason that I was not sure whether it was contemplated there should be a board separate for that organization. I modify my amendment by striking out the reference to the Federal home loan corporation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, before we vote on the bill, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question.

As written here, the bill provides that the home owners' loan corporation shall be an instrumentality of the Government, and then there is authorization that it may issue $2,000,000,000 of bonds, and a provision that interest is guaranteed by the Government. Would the purchaser of one of the bonds have any basis for stating that the bond was a Government bond, guaranteed by the Government?

Mr. BULKLEY. In my opinion, he would not, and I think any reasonable precaution ought to be taken against that. Has the Senator any suggestion?

Mr. FESS. We wrote a provision in the Home Loan Act that the bonds must state that they were not Government obligations. It was stated that that might destroy their marketability, but I feared that if such a provision were not written in some might be misled.

Mr. BULKLEY. The bonds might be given a marketability to which they were not entitled.

Mr. FESS. Yes. What I wanted was the Senator's statement, so that there might be no misunderstanding, when these bonds are offered for sale, as to whether they are Government obligations or not.

Mr. BULKLEY. As I understand it, the intent of the measure is that the Government shall guarantee the interest until maturity, and no more interest and no principal whatever.

Mr. FESS. And no purchaser of the bonds would be purchasing Government bonds?

Mr. BULKLEY. He would not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, on page 18, line 24, to strike out "$25,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$15,000." Very briefly, this amendment seeks to limit the so-called "home loan" to $15,000 upon one piece of property instead of $25,00. I think $15,000 would probably be enough, but, in view of the fact that the attitude of the chairman of the committee and some other Senators is that there will not be sufficient funds for a spread to reach any great number of home owners in taking care of their mortgages, I believe that we should reduce the maximum so that we may increase the opportunity and assurance that people who live in homes of the value of $20,000 may still have available to them this character of loan, and may enlarge the opportunity to obtain loans on the part of the owners of five and ten thousand dollar homes and even of $3,000 or $1,000 homes. As a rule, the person who lives in the humble cottage or the medium-priced home needs assistance and the beneficent aid of the Government more than does the person who lives in a $25,000 or a $30,000 or a $50,000 home. I should like to have the limitation maximum reduced to $15,000, because I think there would thereby be a greater spread.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. I want to inquire whether the committee amendment has not already been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment has been agreed to, and, under the parliamentary situation, the amendment of the Senator from Florida is not now in order unless the vote by which the amendment was agreed to shall be reconsidered.

Mr. BULKLEY. I will ask the Senator from Florida to let the amendment go, under the circumstances. The bill as it passed the House provides for a $15,000 limit, and the issue which the Senator from Florida now raises will be before us in conference anyway. Many Members have urgently wanted a higher limit. I think if the Senator will let us consider the matter in conference, it will have fair consideration.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I gladly yield to that suggestion. I had noticed that the other House placed this restriction on the bill, providing a maximum of $15,000.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. TRAMMELL. As suggested by the Senator from Ohio, the matter will be in conference anyway, but I wish to make clear that, so far as my own preference is concerned, it is that the maximum should not exceed $15,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the amendment be ordered engrossed and the bill read a third time?

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

The bill was passed.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendment, ask for a conference with the House on the bill and amendment, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. BULKLEY, Mr. WAGNER, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees on the part of the Senate.

REGULATION OF BANKING—INSURANCE OF DEPOSITS

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to submit a brief comment on the bank bill conference which is now in progress.

I understand that the Treasury Department, and perhaps even higher authority, recommended the rejection of the amendment which the Senate adopted to provide for immediate deposit insurance open to all Federal Reserve member banks and to all State banks which are qualified as solvent by the State banking authorities.

I do not care to go into the merits of the matter. I do want to comment on the attitude of the Treasury Department, because it is utterly inconsistent with the Treasury's own attitude respecting this same subject within the past 2 weeks, and I want to lay down a plain warning, that we shall have to have an explanation of the proposition which came from the Secretary of the Treasury 2 weeks ago if it shall now develop that the thoroughly limited proposition upon which the Senate agreed is to be rejected upon the Treasury's recommendation.

I remind the Senate that on May 19—and I am reading from the Washington Times—the Secretary of the Treasury proposed "a sweeping proposal for the guaranty of all bank deposits during the period of economic emergency."

I quote further:

> Machinery for the protection of depositors' funds would be administered by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The guaranty would be effective immediately.

Mr. President, I call the Senate's attention to the fact that within the past 2 weeks the Secretary of the Treasury has appeared before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency proposing not a limited insurance, such as is included in the amendment which the Senate adopted, but a complete, 100-percent guaranty.

What is the difference between the proposal which the Senate passed and the proposal which the Secretary of the Treasury submitted? As nearly as I can discover, the difference is that the Secretary of the Treasury proposed to charge the entire hazard against the Public Treasury and against the taxpayers of the United States, whereas the formula which the Senate has approved requires a primary bank contribution and a primary bank responsibility behind the insurance. In other words, the Secretary of the Treasury is in no position to complain that the limited insurance proposed by the Senate is in any degree a hazard to the public credit when he himself, within the past 2 weeks, proposed four times as much of a charge against the public credit in this connection.

There is utterly no reason in consistency or rational attitude for the recommendation which is made to the conference by these higher authorities against the acceptance of the amendment for immediate-deposit insurance which the Senate has approved.

SECRETARY WOODIN'S STATEMENT AS TO MUSIC

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it will be remembered by the Senate that in the closing days of Mr. Hoover's administration he advised the American people that it would be well if someone would write a poem that would inspire the country. I now have in my hand a message from Mr. Woodin, who suggests that if someone would inspire us with music it might bring the country back on its feet. I send this article to the desk and ask that it may be incorporated in the RECORD, and that the clerk may read the first paragraph down to the point I have marked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read the first paragraph of the article down to the point marked, and the remainder of it will be printed in the RECORD.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

> SYRACUSE, N.Y., June 5.—America, "unafraid and invincible", needs music more now than ever to stimulate courage, said William H. Woodin, Secretary of the Treasury, speaking at the sixty-second annual commencement at Syracuse University.

The remainder of the article is as follows:

> Dwelling for a moment on things financial, he said:
> "Fear, far more than any other thing, has been responsible for the failure of financial institutions. Fear spreads like forest fire, and many of the runs upon banks have been wholly unwarranted and entirely results of fear, the father and mother of panic. When a man draws his account from the bank and sticks it in a safety-deposit box or an old teapot for security, he does so because of fear; and buried money will not come out of hiding until full faith in the future is restored and the destructive hysteria or fear is turned into confidence."
> Some other high lights of the address:
> "Precisely as a small boy whistles instinctively to keep up his courage, so are we all crying for something to bring about confidence and to displace the absurd hysteria of fear which in the last few years has made men and women avoid great human responsibilities which these dynamic times demand.
> "Vibrations of fine music put mysterious initiative, resolution, and courage into the normal individual."
> Upon his arrival, Mr. Woodin was asked about unofficial rumors that he might resign.
> "I don't mind that a bit", he said. "I'm used to being asked that; but I have no statement to make, particularly today." Later he amplified this. "As I was leaving the President's room—he knew I was coming up here—he said: 'Will, you can tell them for me that when I get myself in trouble I always whistle a tune.'"
> "Isn't the harmony of the spheres more audible now than it was a year ago?" he was asked. "Some harmony is; but don't try to take me out of my sphere for the day", he replied.

INCOME TAXES—LETTER OF DR. LINSLY R. WILLIAMS

Mr. COPELAND. I have received a very interesting letter from Dr. Linsly R. Williams, of New York, relating to the income taxes. I ask that it may be printed in the body of the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, June 1, 1933.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: For a number of years I have been deeply interested in the subject of taxation and particularly in the Federal income tax. I have written a number of letters to the Secretary of the Treasury and Members of Congress, criticizing the inequalities of the present tax law.

There has been an insistent demand on the part of many people that Congress should soak the rich, and in an endeavor to secure a larger amount of tax from the larger incomes there has been added from time to time a surtax and also a tax on capital gains, to prevent people from becoming too rich. It has been held by a former Secretary of the Treasury that a capital gain was income and that a tax on dividends from stock corporations was double taxation, but he and many others approved of the surtax, which was also a double tax.

To demonstrate the inequalities and injustice of the present Federal income-tax law, based on the tax for the year 1932, I would cite the following:

Case 1. A professor, 45 years of age; has practically no savings; has wife and two children; receives a salary of $7,000 a year. This professor paid a tax of $148.

Case 2. A spinster, 60 years of age; received a trust from her father, all of which is invested in preferred and common stocks, amounting to about $200,000. She has no dependents. She paid no tax on her income, but paid a surtax of $10.

Case 3. A retired business man of 65, invested all his savings, amounting to a little over $300,000 in Federal, State, and local tax-exempt bonds; has no dependents; his income for 1932 was $14,000. He paid a tax for 1932 of $140.

Case 4. An active business man who has a large fortune invested in securities of a marketable value of over thirty million, had an income during 1932 of over one million; at the end of the year he sold a considerable number of securities and under the law claimed a loss of over a million dollars. He paid no tax.

Very few people have taken cognizance of the fact that instead of soaking the rich, the present Federal income-tax law favors the rich in many instances, although many of them do pay enormous sums, especially in good times.

No doubt there will be many suggestions made for changes in the tax law, and I should strongly recommend that very earnest consideration be given to the following:

1. That the tax at the present rate of 13½ percent on the profits of stock corporations be abolished and there be substituted a 1 percent excise tax on the gross sales of the corporation, and that the recipient of the dividends pay the tax, instead of the corporation.

2. That steps be taken to discontinue the exemption of Federal, State, and other local and municipal bonds by constitutional amendment, if necessary.

3. That the capital gain and loss clauses be abolished and that capital gains be taxed at a rate of 5 percent and not considered as income, but all receipts from this source be placed in the sinking fund.

4. That the Government depend more on excise taxes, lower the rate of tax on the smaller incomes, and maintain the higher rates on large incomes.

If these amendments were adopted, the distribution of the tax would be more fair and the Government would receive a far larger income.

Very truly yours,

LINSLY R. WILLIAMS.

AMERICA—ON THE SEA AND IN THE AIR—ADDRESS BY ALFRED E. SMITH

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] has introduced and secured the passage of a joint resolution providing for the designation of a National Maritime Day. I have here a very illuminating address by the Honorable Alfred E. Smith on the subject of America—On the Sea and in the Air. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a pleasure for me to cooperate with the men interested in furthering the cause of the American merchant marine in the celebration of a National Maritime Day. I can make no claims to a sea-faring youth, but ships and the meaning of ships were things not unknown to the youth of my generation which enjoyed playtime adventures along the docks of the East River years ago. We saw ships there in those days. I remember that they entered in a very useful and practical way into one of my favorite sports. That sport was the using of the bowsprit of a ship as it overhung a dock as a sort of trapeze. There was one very interesting lesson about shipping which I learned in my search along the docks for a bowsprit to be used as a trapeze. The boats that were loaded were the ones to look for. A boat without cargo rode so high that it was impossible for us youthful trapeze artists to reach the bowsprit. The trick was to find either those which had not yet been unloaded or those which had been loaded preparatory to clearing for sea again. We came to know those ships which came in well loaded and those which, loading and unloading, made a quick turn-around. We came to see from our own viewpoint that cargo was an important factor in shipping.

We have a habit, however, of forgetting the lessons of the past. There was a very important lesson concerning shipping which was taught us as a result of the World War. When we went to war in 1917 we were woefully lacking in ships.

A merchant-marine and an air-transportation system play an important part in the scheme of national defense.

In case of a war where we are involved it is of invaluable assistance to have an adequate merchant marine for the transportation of troops and supplies and for use as auxiliary armed cruisers. The personnel is also of the greatest utility in furnishing the Navy a proper reserve of men trained in the ways of the sea.

In event of a war, such as the beginning of the Great War in 1914, a merchant marine is of equal use in assuring us of transportation for our products in keeping up our foreign trade. We had but 17 ocean-going vessels available in 1914; and when ships of the other countries that had been carrying more than 90 percent of American exports were withdrawn for use by their own countries, millions of dollars were lost by American farmers and manufacturers through inability to get shipping for their products).

As a result of our unpreparedness, we spent 3½ billion dollars through the Shipping Board, building 2,300 ships, which, as usual when things are done that way, resulted in the waste of hundreds of millions in the building and the waste of most of the balance in the end as the ships were entirely unsuited for commercial traffic in peace time. Some of our rivers have been clogged for years by the hundreds of ships moored in them, useless for anything except scrap.

And here is what this error of our ways really cost us:

Building program, $3,500,000,000.

Annual interest on the bonds put out to finance the building, $100,000,000.

More than a hundred million dollars loss to American farmers and manufacturers through inability to export their products.

The Jones-White Act of 1928 provided for Government loans to companies at low rates of interest to build ships and 10-year mail contracts on a basis that would enable them to be operated successfully upon American wage and living standards.

Owing to American wage scales and living standards, it costs more to build ships here than abroad and it also costs more to operate them. As a result of the Jones-White Act, in the past 5 years American ship lines have constructed 42 fine new ocean-going vessels costing more than a quarter of a billion dollars, giving employment during the depression to thousands of workmen. In these same 5 years, private initiative, backed by intelligent legislation, has added a new arm to American consumers with a national system of airways between this country and the markets of 32 nations. Today this merchant marine of the air has attained world leadership. Our aircraft factories are building a fleet of flying clipper ships, the largest merchant aircraft to hold this supremacy and to win for America its rightful place on the fast-developing trade airways of the world.

We have put the American flag back upon the world's main trade routes and created a reservoir of men and ships available for national emergency. It is the duty of every American to remember that now that we have at last consolidated our position again on the high seas—an achievement in which he has a direct and personal interest—that he must lend his support and patronage to his country's shipping.

In the North Atlantic trade, which is the most active in the world, of the 20 or 25 percent of the passengers who are foreigners, the proportion selecting American steamers is almost negligible, while of the remaining 80 or 75 percent, who are Americans, more than half use foreign vessels. In short, the German, French, and British steamers are invariably selected by their citizens, yet Americans are the chief support of these foreign-owned lines to the neglect of their own. The results of this neglect are not often felt at once, but in the long run they will rise up as a damper on export trade and an actual threat to security in case of war or other national emergency.

We have a half-billion-dollar annual bill for marine freight and passenger service which the American public pays. Of this amount, fully two thirds goes to foreign shipping, and the bulk of this share, estimated at 85 percent, is not spent in this country. In other words, upwards of 60 percent of the amount we pay for shipping service in the international trade leaves our country and is spent abroad. Add this sum to our national income, and thousands of Americans could be put to work.

The statistics here given are intended to awaken lively interest in our merchant marine on the part of our citizens. It means much to the country, adds materially to our prosperity, should be a large part of our national concern for trade both at home and abroad, and let us hope that this celebration of Maritime Day may influence all who can be brought within our influence to the end that this important national and business question be the concern of all our citizens.

REPORT OF INDUSTRIAL CONTROL AND PUBLIC WORKS BILL

Mr. HARRISON. From the Committee on Finance, I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (H.R. 5755) to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 114) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say that I hope we can have this measure up tomorrow?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I desire to ask if the report just submitted by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is on the public construction bill?

Mr. HARRISON. It is.

Mr. LONG. I want to say that I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not try to bring that bill up tomorrow, because I have not been able to tell just what tax schedule some of us desire to propose. There are several of us who wanted to prepare and offer an amendment to the tax schedule which will be embraced in the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator will have an opportunity to do that.

Mr. HARRISON. The tax features come last in the bill. I am sure the Senator from Louisiana will have ample opportunity while the bill is under discussion to study that feature of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I understand the report submitted by the Senator from Mississippi is on the so-called "industrial recovery bill"?

Mr. HARRISON. It is on the so-called "industrial recovery bill".

Mr. McNARY. May I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas and to the Senator from Mississippi that the consideration of the bill go over for 1 day; that is, until Wednesday next?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am not asking that it be considered now. I am merely submitting the report, so that it may be printed.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that, but I should like to continue my suggestion that we may have an understanding this afternoon that the bill shall go over for 1 day, until Wednesday. It is the most important proposal in the nature of legislation that has ever been presented to this or any other Congress. I desire to have a conference of the Republican minority on the measure. We should at least have a day to study the bill. That is a very fair request. Tomorrow let us take up the calendar and the conference report on the gasoline tax bill. Cleaning up the calendar and getting through with the conference report will probably fully occupy the time tomorrow, and then on Wednesday we may start in on a proper and intelligent consideration of the public works and so-called "industrial recovery" bill.

If we may have that understanding, we can take a recess at this time and come here prepared tomorrow to make a study of the bill and get through with the pending business, as I have suggested, or any other that may occur to the able Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator from Oregon that the Committee on Finance has been working night and day on this measure in order to report it to the Senate as quickly as possible? It is a measure of many angles and it is important in character. I have not any desire to project the measure unnecessarily or to have it considered hastily, but I do hope that we may secure consideration of it as quickly as possible and come to a definite conclusion. I shall abide by the wishes of the leader on this side with reference to taking the bill up Wednesday or tomorrow. I do, however, want it to be taken up as speedily as possible.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to cooperate, may I say to the Senator, in the matter of securing early consideration of the bill; but I am sure, in the interest of expedition and fairness to every Member of the Senate, we should have one day in which to study the bill and the report on it. That is my only reason for suggesting that we have an understanding that the bill shall not be brought up until Wednesday.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the request of the Senator from Oregon is reasonable. The only consideration that causes me to hesitate at all to grant his request is the fact that is well known that it has been hoped the present session might be concluded at the end of the current week. In view of the importance of the bill, I can conceive that it might conserve time to let it go over until Wednesday morning; Senators will be afforded an opportunity of familiarizing themselves with it; and, in view of the very gracious spirit manifest by the Senator from Oregon and the cooperation he has given and is giving in connection with the disposition of legislation, I shall make no objection to his request.

It is my intention to move an adjournment in order that we may have a morning hour tomorrow. I understand that the arrangement suggested is satisfactory to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. It is entirely satisfactory to me. I merely want to give notice that, following the morning hour, I shall move to take up the conference report on the bill involving the tax on electrical energy.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I also suggest that if there be other conference reports, Senators in charge of them may be prepared to present them, as in all probability ample opportunity will be afforded tomorrow for their consideration.

WHEN WAR CAME TO THE INDIAN—ARTICLE BY P. F. BYRNE (S.DOC. NO. 68)

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, an article was sent to me a few days ago which is entitled "When War Came to the Indian—a Chapter of Neglected Truth in American History", by Mr. P. E. Byrne, of Bismarck, N.Dak. Mr. Byrne is an attorney there. He was secretary to former Governor Burke, and has made a deep study of the Indian question. He has written a great many articles on it. The article to which I now refer was published in the North Dakota Historical Quarterly by the State Historical Society of North Dakota. I referred the article to the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Collier, for his opinion, and he writes a letter commending it very highly and suggesting that it be printed as a Senate document.

It is an important article. The so-called "Custer massacre" has for years been greatly exaggerated and misrepresented by historians, and I believe that this little article, which I consider authentic, would do a great deal to correct the false impression that has been extant during all these years. It has been charged against the Sioux Indians that they massacred Custer's army. I believe the situation was that the Indians outgeneraled those in command of the forces of the United States.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to have this article printed as a Senate document and that the letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs may be printed as a preface to the Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, June 6, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JUNE 5, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Father in Heaven, for this radiant daylight hour we thank Thee for the marvelous revelation of Thy infinite self in the open book of nature. In Thy handiwork we see universal love and disinterested affection. Thy gracious gifts are not doled out to a selected few, but for the wide world's comfort and happiness. Thy sun shines upon the just and the unjust; the poor man is blest equally with the rich man; selfishness receives as much as benevolence. We praise Thee, merciful God, that from Thy throne there gush forth the streams of love which flow for all men. Thy kindness is universal and Thy forgiveness disinterested. We praise Thee that Thy sympathy, Thy kindness, and Thy generosity move over us like the glory of a summer sky, overflowing in countless treasure. Oh, may they all come to us with the gentle voice, namely, "Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, June 3, 1933, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H.J.Res. 192. Joint resolution to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1815. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Owensboro, Ky.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. As I understand the parliamentary situation, the House stands now in exactly the attitude that it did on Saturday afternoon last when I rose and made objection to the vote because there was no quorum present. I should like to ask the Chair if the point of no quorum made at this time by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] does not automatically call for a roll call on this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. No; because the presumption is that a quorum is present this morning.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. HENNEY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. HUGHES, of Wisconsin, is unavoidably detained because of business.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and sixty-five Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMORIAL DAY

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an eloquent memorial address delivered by my colleague from West Virginia [Mr. RAMSAY].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following memorial address delivered by Hon. ROBERT L. RAMSAY, of West Virginia, at McMechen, W.Va., May 30, 1933:

Today all over this broad land the people of the United States meet in sacred session to pay tribute of respect to their departed dead who have "crossed the bourn from whence no traveler e'er returns."

It is only natural that man should mourn and lament over the death of a friend. When the grim Reaper has passed among us and stricken one whom we loved with death, we stand appalled at the awful mystery of it all, for we do not understand why the light of yesterday does not shine today, and why we no more feel the loving touch of the vanished hand, nor hear the voice that is now still. And we cry out like infants crying in the dark, for the light, with no language but a cry. And yet—why grieve? Death has no more mystery than has life. Each is only an inevitable and necessary law of nature and an incident in some Infinite plan we know not of.

We do not know why our friend has died, yet we know not why he lived. His birth, life, and death are to us wrapped in a cloak of mystery. Yet we know that death is not all; we know that man with his fertile brain has made it possible to perpetuate the history of the past and to penetrate the future and lift the vale of ages yet unborn, and to even snatch the lightning from the skies and harness it to man's bidding. Yes; we know from the wonderful inventions and ingenuity of man that in death he is more than mortal. But in life he is only mortal and was born to die that others might live.

"The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Await alike th' inevitable hour.
The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

Civilization is progressive. Every generation has its front rank and its rear rank. But the march of progress goes steadily onward toward the evolution of God's final purpose; the rear rank of each generation and the front rank of the new generation take their stand far beyond the ken of men of days gone by.

Time was—and not many generations ago—when ordinary men like you and me were looked upon as mere pawns to be used and cast aside by the will of a man who wore a coronet on his brow and held a scepter in his hand. The life and welfare of the common man meant nothing to him. To the common man the gates of ambition were forever closed. For him life held no bright promise to lure him on to noble thoughts and valorous achievements.

Today the best spirit of the world has changed. Though the eternal battle of life still rages, though the strong continue to oppress the weak, though tears are shed, blows are struck, and blood is spilled, yet through the din of strife, above the clash of arms, now strong, now weak, but ever growing more distinct, we hear the harmony of a sweet refrain, "Truth, justice, and equality." It is the voice of the world's front rank—that mighty advance guard of civilization pouring forth that wondrous melody—that song of songs—the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

It has been said that a nation's dead constitute the Iliad of a nation's woe, and its best heritage is the lessons which it carries to the living.

To care for and preserve the memory of those who have gone before has been to the thoughtful student of history, at all times, one of the signboards which show the progressive march of civilization and the development of the races. The monument to a dead hero, whose life has contributed something to the State, stands not alone as a constant tribute to his virtues and his memory, but an inspiration to the living and the nations of the earth which have not responded to this honored sentiment have not long survived the empire of decay. However short or humble a man's life may be, there gathers about it always something of love and sympathy; and when it is gone, some fond hope or bright ambition perishes.

The dead leave their good deeds behind them to serve both as a warning and an example, to be judged by what has been accomplished, by the spirit which inspired it and temptations and environments which endanger it. No man has lived without making some impressions, for good or ill, upon his generation, and no one is wholly dead whose memory or whose example inspires the humblest to higher ideals or loftier purposes. Man's life leaves the body and is borne to the earth whence it came; fruits and flowers bloom and blossom in the springtime and, with chill November's surly blast, fall to the earth and decay; but there never was a fruit and there never bloomed a flower that did not leave its seed, and never a life that did not leave the fruit of its example. The sun of man's life goes down and passes below the horizon, but the star of his example and good works remains fixed, unalterable in the firmament.

On a hillock, above the narrow pass of Thermopylae, stands in heroic size a marble lion—fit emblem of intrepid courage—and at its base is found the inscription:

"Go, tell the Spartan, thou that passeth by,
That here obedient to their laws we lie."

To the shrine of Spartan valor, the Spartan mother brings her son and reading the message which the dead sends to the living, recounts the story of Leonidas, the young king, and his Spartan band, who gave up their lives in defense of their country's laws. The same sentiment, ever ancient and ever new, still survives and will continue to live.

Twenty-three centuries have not extinguished this feeling of veneration for the dead, who have left the impress of their lives and the force of their example behind them. It still lives to console and elevate humanity. Its memorials are today found in every civilized land.

On the banks of the Danube, the historic stream whose waves have witnessed the march of the hordes of Attila and the paladins of Charlemagne, whose shores have echoed to the tramp of Roman legions, the hymns of the Crusaders, and the artillery of Napoleon, stands a noble structure in marble, called the Hall of Heroes, containing the effigies of the great men of Germany. By the soft blue waters of Lake Lucerne stands the Chapel of William Tell; and in the black aisle of the old cathedral of Innsbruck the peasant of the Tirol comes from his Alpine home and kneels, with bowed head, before the statue of Andreas Hofer.

The Frenchman rejoices in the glories of his race as he stands under the dome of the Invalides and looks upon the sarcophagus which contains the ashes of the Corsican Corporal, who carried the eagles of France beyond the Alps, stood with the tricolor in his hand on the Bridge of Lodi, dictated the great treaty on a raft at Tilsit, and fought Russian fires and Russian snows at the gates of the Kremlin. The Great Emperor, whose heel rang out upon the tessellated floors of the capitols of Europe, as he toppled their thrones, and used them as stepping stones, upon which he mounted the throne of the Empire of France; and as his countryman follows him to that dazzling summit, he can weep over his passing as he sees him driven into exile, where, like the caged eagle, he beats out his heart against the barren rocks of St. Helena.

In England—in Westminster Abbey, the Valhalla where rest England's great, her mighty dead—under the arched domes, with its many-colored lights, there are shed soft rays from a thousand windows, where stand in flawless marble and well-burnished bronze statues and monuments of the statesmen and the warriors who have caused the drumbeat of England to circle the globe and enabled the Briton to indulge in the proud boast of an ancient Spanish King—that the sun never sets upon his possessions; and there are found the statues of her great Kings and her murdered princes, the learned Canning, and the elder and younger Pitt, the illustrious Gladstone, and his great rival in statescraft, Disraeli, the incomparable Jew, who welded principalities into an empire and crowned his queen with the diadem of an empress. Throughout the whole of the United Kingdom stand statues to her Wellington, her Gordon, and her Nelson—to the heroes of wars and the statesmen of her Parliaments. In these memorials to her departed dead you can see some of the secrets of England's 10 centuries of achievement. During life she might forget Nelson's last request before he fell at Trafalgar, she may have deserted Chinese Gordon to languish and die in the Sudan, yet she perpetuated for the living their memories, by preserving the heroism of their lives, after their deaths.

To emphasize the universality of this sentiment, one need not wander into strange lands nor search for new evidence among strange peoples. In our National Capitol, over whose dome stands the bronze figure of the Goddess of Freedom, is a Hall dedicated by national law and affectionate sentiment to the segregated States of the American Union; and in the city countless monuments and statues to the heroes of our wars for freedom and liberty—Yorktown, Gettysburg, Santiago, the Marne, and Chateau Thierry. And yet we know that these memorials, which stand out like granite ledges in the pathways of recorded time, only mark the name and perpetuate the fame of him who, by precept or example, has done the State some service, and leave unsolved the great mysteries of life and death. It is the life beyond the grave, when the soul has taken its flight from its tenement of clay, which has challenged the best thought of theologians and philosophers throughout all time. Some, in the whirl of busy life and the carnival of earthly ambition, may treat with sneer or jest the power and beauty of the Christian religion, but the sneer is robbed of its sting, and the jest becomes a mockery in the face of the struggling soul amid the agonies of dissolving nature and the gloom of approaching death. It is the quiet still voice from within which makes us feel there is that about us which will conquer mortality; that man made in the image of his Creator, the most helpless at his birth and the most decrepit in old age, of all the animal creation, was not made to wholly die.

The pagan philosopher heard the same voice when he appealed to his gods, and yet regarded them only as a superior influence which controlled the material things of life, while others of the advanced pagan school admitted as they exclaimed, "It must be so, Plato; thou reasonest well."

The savage Indian, reveling in the savagery of his race, feels the same influence when he furnishes the dead chief with food and raiment for his long journey in search of the happy hunting ground, the home of the Minto, the land beyond the Dakotas, where Hiawatha felt the spirit of Minnehaha went.

The children of the Orient feel it when they take their honored guests to the tombs of their dead ancestors, appeal to their departed spirits as they recall the injunction of Confucius, the Chinese philospher, that, "He who in the morning has seen the light may in the evening die with hope and without regret."

The children of Brittany heard the same whispering when they gathered at midnight by the shores of the sea listening for some sound from the chimes in the towers of their vanished and sunken city, which they expected to bring to them some message of hope from their departed dead.

The early Christian martyr had the same intuitive feeling when he renounced his idolatry, braved the fury of a Pagan mob, and looked calmly into the red eyes of the ferocious wild beast in the Colosseum. In all the stories which recount the heroism and Christian fortitude of the three centuries of struggle between paganism and the immortality of the soul, there is none more pathetic than the classic story of Ion and his sister Clemantha. Ion, condemned to death, his sister went to him on the night before his death to ask him in the name of their mutual affection and the memory of their dead mother, to renounce his faith, that his young life might be saved, and in despair finally asked him if he were sure after death they would meet again. "I have", he said, "asked that dread question of the sun in the effulgence of his midday splendor; I have asked it of the hills which, rock-ribbed, seem eternal; of the flowing streams which limpid flow on forever; I have asked it of the stars, amid whose dome of azure blue my radiant spirit has trod in glory; and all were dumb. But now, as I thus gaze upon thy living face, I feel the light which kindles through thine eyes cannot wholly perish. Yes; we shall meet again, Clemantha!" And on the succeeding day not one but two Christian martyrs, young in years and beautiful to look upon, hand in hand, sealed with their blood their fealty to the Christian God.

The conflict between belief and unbelief has been but little dwarfed by the ravages of time. The struggle is as acute in many respects today as it was of old and will doubtless continue to the end of time.

The same carping critics are asking, in the name of science, the same questions as did the disciples of Plato, until the issue is today not one of sect or creed but of belief against unbelief in all forms of the Christian religion. Happy are those here assembled who follow its teachings, because among beatitudes is full belief in the doctrine of revealed religion. Its teachings do not enable its members to accept one part and reject another portion of the great Book, which is the cornerstone, the substructure upon which is founded the Christian religion. It teaches the simple faith worth more than Norman blood, the faith so beautifully described by Huntington, the great master of blank verses, in the dialogue between the two sisters, when the older asks the younger why it was that the God in whom she believed permitted the rain to fall and the sun to shine upon and make fruitful the crops of the just and the unjust man alike. Her answer was, "I know not how these things are, my sister, but I gently lend my hand to faith and meekly follow where the angels lead." The same teachings cause us to believe in an eternal life beyond the grave with the same simple faith, and makes us feel that there is, there must be, a beautiful land somewhere; and this simple faith in the immortality of the soul is the most ennobling, the brightest star that ever crossed the horizon of man's unillumined vision.

But let us turn for one brief moment to the memory of our departed dead. Once they were wont to gather in our festive halls and listen to the wit and merriment of God's gifted children, but now they are gone and we have but their memory. We call their names, but from their voiceless lips there comes no answering call. We cry aloud, and the only answer is the echo of our wailing cry. And we know that in a little while we shall see you face to face. Then, O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory?

And if they could come and join the solemn ceremonies of this hour, what message would they bring? Would it not be the message which the angels brought to the shepherds in the early twilight of the long ago—"Peace on Earth, Good Will to Men"?

Would the message not tell us, who are still in the quick, to be true to our professions, faithful to our friends, and to cover with the mantle of a generous charity, the frailties of our enemies.

Would the message not exhort us to obey more sedulously the high ideals of life, in order that our arm may be strengthened and our soul refreshed in preparation for the time when we too shall wrap the drapery of our couch about us, and take our place in the cold and silent chambers of the dead? Would not the message bring happiness to the heart, strength to the body, inspiration to the soul, and enable us to forget the transitory things of this life and prepare for the more substantial ones in the life to come?

And when another year shall, in the order of the seasons, bring like memorial services, whose place will be vacant here, and for whom will we then mourn? Certain, it reasonably is, that someone here present will be absent when the long roll is again called.

Let us hope, in answer to this solemn question, that the one to whom the final summons does come, it may find him ready to meet his Creator; may find him, as the evening twilight darkens into the night of death, surrounded by his family and his friends, consoled and comforted by his religion, of whatever form of worship it may take; and that he may be able, as gentle hands wipe the death damp from his brow, to console the bereaved ones, in the beautiful language found in the passing of good King Arthur.

"Comfort thyself as best thou mayest! For me weep not because they will waft me to the Vale of Avalon, where it never rains, where it never snows, and where the winds never blow loudly, and where eternal summer reigns."

MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file a minority report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. GOSS. Reserving the right to object, is that to be incorporated with the majority report?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes; that will be satisfactory.

Mr. GOSS. Does the gentleman include that in his request?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

INTERSTATE RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, is not the regular order a vote on the railroad bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SABATH. Will it be in order to move to recommit with instructions to strike out section 206?

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The question was taken and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PAYMENT OF SEA DUTY TO SURPLUS GRADUATES OF NAVAL ACADEMY

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 5012) to amend existing law in order to obviate the payment of 1 year's sea pay to surplus graduates of the Naval Academy, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5012) to amend existing law in order to obviate the payment of 1 year's sea pay to surplus graduates of the Naval Academy having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

CARL VINSON,
FRED A. BRITTEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

PARK TRAMMELL,
GEO. MCGILL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5012) to amend existing law in order to obviate the payment of 1 year's sea pay to surplus graduates of the Naval Academy submit the following statement in explanation of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report.

The amendment of the Senate provided that one half of 1 year's sea pay as heretofore provided by law shall be paid to each of said surplus of graduates who shall graduate in the class of 1933 who do not receive an appointment.

This amendment, however, is no longer necessary since the class of 1933 has already graduated from the Naval Academy (at 11 a.m., June 1, 1933).

The managers consider that the surplus of graduates of the class of 1933 should each be paid 1 year's sea pay in accordance with the provision of the law which was in effect at the time they graduated.

In the future, however, whenever there may be a surplus of graduates, those who do not receive commissions as ensigns in the Navy or in the lowest commissioned grades of the Marine Corps or Staff Corps of the Navy will receive a certificate of graduation and an honorable discharge, but will not receive the 1 year's sea pay.

CARL VINSON,
FRED A. BRITTEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

NATIONAL-GUARD LEGISLATION

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5645) to amend the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SECTION 1. That the Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the National Guard of the United States, the National Guard while in the service of the United States, the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Organized Reserves, and the Enlisted Reserve Corps."

SEC. 2. That the fourth paragraph of section 5 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"All policies and regulations affecting the organization and distribution of the National Guard of the United States, and all policies and regulations affecting the organization, distribution, and training of the National Guard, shall be prepared by committees of appropriate branches or divisions of the War Department General Staff, to which shall be added an equal number of officers from the National Guard of the United States, whose names are borne on lists of officers suitable for such duty, submitted by the governors of their respective States and Territories, and for the District of Columbia by the commanding general, District of Columbia National Guard.

"All policies and regulations affecting the organization, distribution, training, appointment, assignment, promotion, and discharge of members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Organized Reserves, and the Enlisted Reserve Corps shall be prepared by committees of appropriate branches or divisions of the War Department General Staff to which shall be added an equal number of officers from the Officers' Reserve Corps: Provided, That when the subject to be studied affects the National Guard of the United States or the National Guard and the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Organized Reserves, or the Enlisted Reserve Corps, such committees shall consist of an equal representation from the Regular Army, the National Guard of the United States, and the Officers' Reserve Corps. There shall be not less than 10 officers on duty in the War Department General Staff, one half of whom shall be from the National Guard of the United States and one half from the Officers' Reserve Corps. For the purpose specified herein such officers shall be regarded as additional members of the General Staff while so serving: Provided further, That the Chief of Staff shall transmit to the Secretary of War the policies and regulations prepared as hereinbefore prescribed in this paragraph and advise him in regard thereto. After action by the Secretary of War thereon, the Chief of Staff shall act as the agent of the Secretary of War in carrying the same into effect.

SEC. 3. That section 37 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 37. Officers' Reserve Corps: For the purpose of providing a reserve of officers available for military service when needed, there shall be organized an Officers' Reserve Corps, consisting of general officers and officers assigned to sections corresponding to the various branches of the Regular Army and such additional sections as the President may direct. The grades in each section and the number in each grade shall be as the President may prescribe. All persons appointed in the Officers' Reserve Corps are reserve officers and shall be commissioned in the Army of the United States. Such appointments in grades below that of brigadier general shall be made by the President alone, and general officers by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Appointment in every case in the Officers' Reserve Corps shall be for a period of 5 years, but an appointment in force at the outbreak of war shall continue in force until 6 months after its termination: Provided, That an officer of the Officers' Reserve Corps shall be entitled to be relieved from active Federal service within 6 months after its termination if he makes application therefor. Any officer of the Officers' Reserve Corps may be discharged at any time in the discretion of the President. In time of peace an officer of the Officers' Reserve Corps must at the time of his appointment be a citizen of the United States between the ages of 21 and 60 years. Any person who has been an officer of the Army of the United States at any time between April 6, 1917, and June 30, 1919, or who has been an officer of the Regular Army at any time, if qualified, may be appointed in the Officers' Reserve Corps in the highest grade which he held or any lower grade. No other person except as herein provided shall in time of peace be originally appointed as a Reserve officer of Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery, or Air Corps in a grade above that of second lieutenant. In time of peace, appointment in the Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery, and Air Corps shall be limited to former officers of the Army, former officers of the National Guard of the United States, graduates of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, as provided in section 47b hereof; warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Regular Army, National Guard of the United States, and Enlisted Reserve Corps, and persons who served in the Army at some time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918. Promotions in all grades of officers who have established, or may hereafter establish, their qualifications for such promotion, and transfer, shall be made under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and shall be based, so far as practicable, upon recommendations made in the established chain of command, but in time of peace not less than 3 years' service in a grade shall be a condition precedent to promotion. So far as practicable, in time of peace, officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps shall be assigned to units in the locality of their places of residence. Nothing in this act shall operate to deprive an officer of the Reserve appointment he now holds: Provided, That this shall not apply to the discretionary-discharge power of the President previously mentioned. Members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, while not on active duty, shall not, by reason solely of their appointments, oaths, commissions, or status as such, or any duties or functions performed or pay or allowances received as such, be held or deemed to be officers or employees of the United States, or persons holding any office of trust or profit or discharging any official function under or in connection with any department of the Government of the United States."

SEC. 4. That section 38 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 38. Officers, National Guard of the United States: All persons appointed officers in the National Guard of the United States are reserve officers and shall be commissioned in the Army of the United States. Such appointments in grades below that of brigadier general shall be made by the President alone, and general officers by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

"Officers in the National Guard of the United States shall be appointed for the period during which they are federally recognized in the same grade and branch in the National Guard: Provided, That an appointment in force at the outbreak of war shall continue in force until 6 months after its termination: And provided further, That such officer shall be entitled to be relieved from active Federal service within 6 months after its termination if he makes application therefor.

"In time of peace the President may order to active duty, with their consent, officers of the National Guard of the United States for the purposes set forth in sections 5 and 81 of this act. When on such active duty an officer of the National Guard of the United States shall receive the same pay and allowances as an officer of the Regular Army of the same grade and length of active service and mileage from his home to his first station and from his last station to his home, but shall not be entitled to retirement or retired pay: Provided, That such officers ordered to such active duty shall be paid out of the funds appropriated for the pay of the National Guard.

"Officers of the National Guard of the United States, while not on active duty, shall not, by reason solely of their appointments, oaths, commissions, or status as such, or any duties or functions performed or pay or allowances received as such, be held or deemed to be officers or employees of the United States, or persons holding any office of trust or profit or discharging any official function under or in connection with any department of the Government of the United States."

SEC. 5. That section 58 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 58. Composition of the National Guard and the National Guard of the United States: The National Guard of each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall consist of members of the militia voluntarily enlisted therein, who upon original enlistment shall be not less than 18 nor more than 45 years of age, or who in subsequent enlistment shall be not more than 64 years of age, organized, armed, equipped, and federally recognized as hereinafter provided, and of commissioned officers and warrant officers who are citizens of the United States between the ages of 21 and 64 years: Provided, That former members of the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps under 64 years of age may enlist in said National Guard.

"The National Guard of the United States is hereby established. It shall be a reserve component of the Army of the United States and shall consist of those federally recognized National Guard units and organizations, and of the officers, warrant officers, and enlisted members of the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, who shall have been appointed, enlisted and appointed, or enlisted, as the case may be, in the National Guard of the United States, as hereinafter provided, and of such other officers and warrant officers as may be appointed therein as provided in section 111 hereof: Provided, That the members of the National Guard of the United States shall not be in the active service of the United States except when ordered thereto in accordance with law, and, in time of peace, they shall be administered, armed, uniformed, equipped, and trained in their status as the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, as provided in this act: And provided further, That under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, noncommissioned officers, first-class privates, and enlisted specialists of the National Guard may be appointed in corresponding grades, ratings, and branches of the National Guard of the United States, without vacating their respective grades and ratings in the National Guard."

SEC. 6. That section 60 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 60. Organization of National Guard units: Except as otherwise specifically provided herein, the organization of the National Guard, including the composition of all units thereof, shall be the same as that which is or may hereafter be prescribed for the Regular Army, subject in time of peace to such general exceptions as may be authorized by the Secretary of War. And the President may prescribe the particular unit or units, as to branch or arm of service, to be maintained in each State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in order to secure a force which, when combined, shall form complete higher tactical units: Provided, That no change in allotment, branch, or arm of units or organizations wholly within a single State will be made without the approval of the governor of the State concerned."

SEC. 7. That section 69 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 69. Enlistments in the National Guard and in the National Guard of the United States: Original enlistments in the National Guard and in the National Guard of the United States shall be for a period of 3 years, and subsequent enlistments for periods of 1 or 3 years each: Provided, That all enlisted men of the National Guard on the date of approval of this act may, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, be enlisted in grade, rating, and branch in the National Guard of the United States for the remaining unexpired portions of their enlistments in the National Guard: And provided further, That in the event of an emergency declared by Congress the period of any enlistment which otherwise would expire may by Presidential proclamation be extended for a period of 6 months after the termination of the emergency."

SEC. 8. That section 70 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 70. Men enlisting in the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and in the National Guard of the United States, shall sign an enlistment contract and subscribe to the following oath or affirmation:

"I do hereby acknowledge to have voluntarily enlisted this —— day of ———, 19—, as a soldier in the National Guard of the United States and of the State of ———, for the period of 3 (or 1) year—, under the conditions prescribed by law, unless sooner discharged by proper authority. And I do solemnly swear that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America and to the State of ———, and that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against all their enemies whomsoever, and that I will obey the orders of the President of the United States and of the Governor of the State of ———, and of the officers appointed over me according to law and the rules and articles of war."

SEC. 9. That said act be amended by adding section 71 thereto, as follows:

"SEC. 71. Definitions: In this act, unless the context or subject matter otherwise requires—

"(a) 'National Guard' or 'National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia' means that portion of the Organized Militia of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, active and inactive, federally recognized as provided in this act and organized, armed, and equipped in whole or in part at Federal expense and officered and trained under paragraph 16, section 8, article I, of the Constitution.

"(b) 'National Guard of the United States' means a reserve component of the Army of the United States composed of those federally recognized units and organizations and persons duly appointed and commissioned in the active and inactive National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia who have taken and subscribed to the oath of office prescribed in section 73 of this act, and who have been duly appointed by the President in the National Guard of the United States as provided in this act, and of those officers and warrant officers appointed as prescribed in sections 75 and 111 of this act, and of those persons duly enlisted in the National Guard of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia who have taken and subscribed to the oath of enlistment prescribed in section 70 of this act."

SEC. 10. That section 72 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 72. An enlisted man discharged from service in the National Guard and the National Guard of the United States shall receive a discharge in writing in such form and with such classification as is or shall be prescribed for the Regular Army, and in time of peace discharges may be given prior to the expiration of terms of enlistment under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe."

SEC. 11. That section 73 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 73. Oaths of National Guard officers—Appointment in the National Guard of the United States: Commissioned officers and warrant officers of the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia and in the National Guard of the United States shall take and subscribe to the following oath of office:

"I, ———, do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of ——— against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I will obey the orders of the President of the United States and of the Governor of the State of ———; that I make this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office of ——— in the National Guard of the United States and of the State of ——— upon which I am about to enter, so help me God.

"The President is authorized to appoint in the same grade and branch in the National Guard of the United States any person who is an officer or warrant officer in the National Guard of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia and who is federally recognized in that grade and branch: Provided, That acceptance of appointment in the same grade and branch in the National Guard of the United States, by an officer of the National Guard of a State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, shall not operate to vacate his State, Territory, or District of Columbia National Guard office.

"Officers or warrant officers of the National Guard who are in a federally recognized status on the date of the approval of this act shall take the oath of office herein prescribed and shall be appointed in the National Guard of the United States in the same grade and branch without further examination, other than physical, within a time limit to be fixed by the President, and shall in the meantime continue to enjoy all the rights, benefits, and privileges conferred by this act."

SEC. 12. That section 75 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 75. The provisions of this act shall not apply to any person hereafter appointed as an officer of the National Guard unless he first shall have successfully passed such tests as to his physical, moral, and professional fitness as the President shall prescribe. The examination to determine such qualifications for appointment shall be conducted by a board of three commissioned officers appointed by the Secretary of War from the Regular Army or the National Guard of the United States, or both. The examination herein provided for may be held prior to the original appointment or promotion of any individual as an officer or warrant officer and if the applicant has been found qualified, he may be issued a certificate of eligibility by the Chief of the National Guard Bureau, which certificate, in the event of appointment or promotion within 2 years to the office for which he was found qualified, shall entitle the holder to Federal recognition without further examination, except as to his physical condition.

"Upon being federally recognized such officers and warrant officers may be appointed in the National Guard of the United States."

SEC. 13. That section 76 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 76. Withdrawal of Federal recognition: Under such regulations as the President shall prescribe the capacity and general fitness of any officer or warrant officer of the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia for continued Federal recognition may at any time be investigated by an efficiency board of officers senior in rank to the officer under investigation, appointed by the Secretary of War from the Regular Army or the National Guard of the United States, or both. If the findings of said board be unfavorable to the officer under investigation and be approved by the President, Federal recognition shall be withdrawn and he shall be discharged from the National Guard of the United States. Federal recognition may be withdrawn by the Secretary of War and his appointment in the National Guard of the United States may be terminated when an officer or warrant officer of the National Guard of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia has been absent without leave for 3 months."

SEC. 14. That section 77 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 77. Elimination and disposition of officers of the National Guard of the United States: The appointments of officers and warrant officers of the National Guard may be terminated or vacated in such manner as the several States, Territories, or the District of Columbia shall provide by law. Whenever the appointment of an officer or warrant officer of the National Guard of a State, Territory, or the District of Columbia has been vacated or terminated, or upon reaching the age of 64 years, the Federal recognition of such officer shall be withdrawn and he shall be discharged from the National Guard of the United States: Provided, That under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe upon termination of service in the active National Guard an officer of the National Guard of the United States may, if he makes application therefor, remain in the National Guard of the United States in the same grade and branch of service. When Federal recognition is withdrawn from any officer or warrant officer of the National Guard of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, as provided in section 76 of this act, or upon reaching the age of 64 years, he shall thereupon cease to be a member thereof and shall be given a discharge certificate therefrom by the official authorized to appoint such officer."

SEC. 15. That section 78 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 78. Men duly qualified for enlistment in the active National Guard may enlist for one term only in the inactive National Guard and in the National Guard of the United States for a period of 1 or 3 years, under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, and on so enlisting they shall sign an enlistment contract and subscribe to the oath or affirmation in section 70 of this act.

"Under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, enlisted men of the active National Guard, not formerly enlisted in the inactive National Guard or the National Guard of the United States, may be transferred to the inactive National Guard; likewise enlisted men hereafter enlisted in or transferred to the inactive National Guard may be transferred to the active National Guard: Provided, That in time of peace no enlisted man shall be required to serve under any enlistment for a longer time than the period for which he enlisted in the active or inactive National Guard, as the case may be. Members of said inactive National Guard, when engaged in field or coast-defense training with the active National Guard, shall receive the same Federal pay and allowances as those occupying like grades on the active list of said National Guard when likewise engaged."

SEC. 16. That section 81 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 81. The National Guard Bureau: The Militia Bureau of the War Department shall hereafter be known as the National Guard Bureau. The Chief of the National Guard Bureau shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, by selection from lists of officers of the National Guard of the United States recommended as suitable for such appointment by their respective governors, and who have had 10 or more years' commissioned service in the active National Guard, at least 5 of which have been in the line, and who have attained at least the grade of colonel. The Chief of the National Guard Bureau shall hold office for 4 years unless sooner removed for cause, and shall not be eligible to succeed himself, and when 64 years of age shall cease to hold such office. Upon accepting his office, the Chief of the National Guard Bureau shall be appointed a major general in the National Guard of the United States, and commissioned in the Army of the United States, and while so serving he shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a major general, provided by law, but shall not be entitled to retirement or retired pay.

"For duty in the National Guard Bureau and for instruction of the National Guard the President shall assign such number of officers of the Regular Army as he may deem necessary; also, such number of enlisted men of the Regular Army for duty in the instruction of the National Guard. The President may also order, with their consent, to active duty in the National Guard Bureau, not more than nine officers who at the time of their initial assignments hold appointments in the National Guard of the United States, and any such officers while so assigned shall receive the pay and allowances provided by law.

"In case the office of the Chief of the National Guard Bureau becomes vacant or the incumbent because of disability is unable to discharge the powers and duties of the office, the senior officer on duty in the National Guard Bureau, appointed from the National Guard of the United States, shall act as chief of said bureau until the incumbent is able to resume his duties or the vacancy in the office is regularly filled. The pay and allowances provided in this section for the Chief of the National Guard Bureau and for the officers ordered to active duty from the National Guard of the United States shall be paid out of the funds appropriated for the pay of the National Guard."

SEC. 17. That section 82 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 82. Armament, equipment, and uniform of the National Guard.—The National Guard shall, as far as practicable, be uniformed, armed, and equipped with the same type of uniforms, arms, and equipments as are or shall be provided for the Regular Army."

SEC. 18. That section 111 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 111. When Congress shall have declared a national emergency and shall have authorized the use of armed land forces of the United States for any purpose requiring the use of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army, the President may, under such regulations, including such physical examination as he may prescribe, order into the active military service of the United States, to serve therein for the period of the war or emergency, unless sooner relieved, any or all units and the members thereof of the National Guard of the United States. All persons so ordered into active military service of the United States shall from the date of such order stand relieved from duty in the National Guard of their respective States, Territories, and the District of Columbia so long as they shall remain in the active military service of the United States, and during such time shall be subject to such laws and regulations for the government of the Army of the United States as may be applicable to members of the Army whose permanent retention in active military service is not contemplated by law. The organization of said units existing at the date of the order into active Federal service shall be maintained intact insofar as practicable.

"Commissioned officers and warrant officers appointed in the National Guard of the United States and commissioned or holding warrants in the Army of the United States, ordered into Federal service as herein provided, shall be ordered to active duty under such appointments and commissions or warrants: Provided, That those officers and warrant officers of the National Guard who do not hold appointments in the National Guard of the United States and commissions or warrants in the Army of the United States may be appointed and commissioned or tendered warrants therein by the President in the same grade and branch they hold in the National Guard.

"Officers and enlisted men while in the service of the United States under the terms of this section shall receive the pay and allowances provided by law for officers and enlisted men of the reserve forces when ordered to active duty, except brigadier generals and major generals, who shall receive the same pay and allowances as provided by law for brigadier generals and major generals of the Regular Army, respectively. Upon being relieved from active duty in the military service of the United States all individuals and units shall thereupon revert to their National Guard status.

"In the initial mobilization of the National Guard of the United States war-strength officer personnel shall be taken from the National Guard as far as practicable, and for the purpose of this expansion warrant officers and enlisted men of the National Guard may in time of peace be appointed officers in the National Guard of the United States and commissioned in the Army of the United States."

SEC. 19. That section 112 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 112. Rights to pensions: When any officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man of the National Guard or the National Guard of the United States called or ordered into the active service of the United States, or when any officer of the Officers' Reserve Corps or any person in the Enlisted Reserve Corps ordered into active service, except for training, is disabled by reason of wounds or disability received or incurred while in the active service of the United States, he shall be entitled to all the benefits of the pension laws existing at the time of his active service; and in case such officer or enlisted man dies in the active service of the United States or in returning to his place of residence after being mustered out of active service, or at any other time in consequence of wounds or disabilities received in such active service, his widow and children, if any, shall be entitled to all the benefits of such pension laws."

SEC. 20. That the seventh paragraph of section 127a of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"In time of war any officer of the Regular Army may be appointed to higher temporary grade without vacating his permanent appointment. In time of war any officer of the Regular Army appointed to higher temporary grade, and all other persons appointed, as officers, shall be appointed and commissioned in the Army of the United States. Such appointments in grades below that of brigadier general shall be made by the President alone, and general officers by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided, That an appointment, other than that of a member of the Regular Army made in time of war, shall continue until 6 months after its termination, and an officer appointed in time of war shall be entitled to be relieved from active Federal service within 6 months after its termination if he makes application therefor."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is what is commonly known as the National Guard bill. It comes to you today with the unanimous report of your Committee on Military Affairs. It should be termed the child of the National Guard Association.

In 1926 the National Guard Association, meeting in Louisville, Ky., passed a resolution asking for legislation along the lines of this bill. In compliance with this resolution, the Secretary of War appointed a special committee, composed of officers of the Regular Army, of the National Guard, and of the Reserves. This special committee formulated this bill. It was then sent to Congress and introduced in this body. The bill was passed by this House in the Seventy-first Congress and has been favorably reported unanimously by your Committee on Military Affairs three different times.

It imposes no additional burden whatever upon the Federal Treasury. It is a bill of some 24 pages but has just one main object and most of its language is a repetition of what is now in the National Defense Act. Contrary to the general thought, the National Guard as now constituted is not a part of the Army of the United States. It is the Organized Militia, organized under the militia clause of section 8 of article I of the Constitution of the United States, and is subject to call by the Federal Government only for three purposes: First, to execute the laws of the United States; second, to suppress insurrections; and, third, to repel invasions. It is not subject to call for service beyond the boundaries of the United States.

Gentlemen will recall that at the time of the World War the National Guard could not be called into the Federal service for use in France. The individual members of the National Guard, as individuals, had to be drafted into the Federal service, and when this drafting had to be resorted to it meant that many units of the National Guard that had come down from the days of the Revolution were ruthlessly destroyed and members of these units had to go into new and entirely different units in the Army of the United States.

In the event of another war, the National Guard is anxious to come into the Army of the United States in its National Guard units and set-up and not have to be disbanded and its members drafted as individuals into new units.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Does this bill go so far as to take the National Guard out of the control of the Governors of the States so that the National Guard cannot be called by the Governor in his own State for riot service, for instance?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; it does not affect the present status of the National Guard in any way whatsoever, except when the Congress of the United States has declared a national emergency to exist, or has declared war and has authorized the use of troops in addition to the Regular Army. It does not affect the National Guard in any way whatsoever so far as its peace-time status is concerned.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. The purpose of this bill, as I gather it, is to enable the National Guard to go into the service of the United States in the event of war as an organization and to come out as an organization?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. That is correct.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. One more question, if the gentleman will permit. I read the provisions of the McSwain bill as introduced. Will the gentleman state to the Congress what amendments, if any, were added in committee?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

I may state to the gentleman from Mississippi that there were very few amendments added, and these were minor. As the bill was originally introduced, it provided that the chief of the National Guard Bureau, which today is known as the "Militia Bureau", might succeed himself. The bill as now before the House provides that the Chief of the National Guard Bureau shall have a term of 4 years and shall not succeed himself.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman approve of that amendment? The present Chief of the Militia Bureau is an up-to-date soldier. There is nothing obsolete about him.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I think it was the intent of Congress when the National Defense Act was passed that the chiefs of these bureaus should have only a 4-year term and then step aside and let somebody else have the opportunity to be chief of the particular bureau. I wish to say, however, that I share the gentleman's esteem and appreciation of the present Chief of the Militia Bureau.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. What are the other amendments?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The other amendments in the bill are very minor. The bill was reintroduced after the committee had considered it, and any committee amendments do not show in this print, but they were not of any consequence. Does the gentleman from Mississippi have any particular section in mind?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I understand there were amendments relating to promotion. What is this amendment?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. There was no such amendment.

Mr. TERRELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. TERRELL. I have not had time to study this bill. Does it provide that the President may draft these units into the service in foreign fields without further legislation?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No. The President cannot call the National Guard into the Army of the United States unless the Congress of the United States has declared war or has declared a national emergency to exist and has gone farther and authorized the use of troops in addition to the Regular Army.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. What happens to the National Guard membership as to the pension situation after it is brought into the regular standing Army under the terms of this bill?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. When war or national emergency is declared by Congress and the National Guard is called into the Army of the United States side by side with the Regular Army, then the members of the National Guard share any pension benefits or privileges that may belong to the men or officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. But not otherwise.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Not otherwise; no.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. What is the attitude of the General Staff of the Army toward this bill?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The War Department approves the bill. The National Guard Association approves the bill. The Reserve Officers' Association approves the bill. In fact, every group and element of our national defense approves the bill.

Mr. HARLAN. That includes the General Staff?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. That includes the General Staff of the War Department.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Then, the main purpose of the bill is to expedite the induction of the National Guard units into the Federal service in a time of extreme emergency?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Not only to expedite their induction, but to permit these units to come in as National Guard units in their National Guard organization or set-up, and then to permit them to be discharged and sent back into their peace-time service in their National Guard units or set-up.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Only in the event of declaration of war by Congress do they become part of the Regular Army.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes; and then only if the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States, sees fit to call them into service.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Will the gentleman explain to the Membership of the House how it was that after the World War when the National Guard troops were disbanded they were disorganized and that the respective States had to reorganize the National Guard after the war?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. After the World War the National Guard units had to be reorganized to all practical intents and purposes as if there had been no National Guard.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. And under this bill if the National Guard is used in an emergency it can be returned to the States as units; is that right?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes. The gentleman from Georgia is a former adjutant general of the State of Georgia, a distinguished National Guard officer, and he has been one of the best and most helpful friends of this legislation.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I certainly am friendly to it, and I would like to see it passed without a single vote against it.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Good.

Mr. STUDLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. STUDLEY. Is the gentleman convinced that this law will make the military forces more mobile and more efficient in time of war?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I think it will do this. I am confident it will materially help the morale of the National Guard. When the men of the National Guard can come in with their own units and in their own organizations it will make for better morale and better esprit de corps.

Mr. STUDLEY. And easier mobilization.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. There is nothing in this bill that affects the present drill pay of the National Guard?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. There is nothing that affects that whatever.

Mr. HEALEY. In other words, if the National Guard organizations go into service, they preserve their identity in the service.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes; that is the purpose of the bill.

In passing this bill we are carrying out, after 150 years, the admonition of George Washington, made with reference to the establishment of a "well-regulated militia." On April 9, 1783, Alexander Hamilton, as chairman of a committee of the Congress of the United States composed of Hamilton, Madison, Osgood, Wilson, and Elsworth, and appointed to consider what arrangements should be made in the different departments of the Government with reference to peace, addressed a letter to Gen. George Washington asking for his views on the defense of the United States, particularly with reference to reconciling the principles of security with economy and with the republican institutions which all citizens were then intent upon setting up. Before complying with the request Washington called upon all of his generals, at or near his headquarters, for their written opinions on the subject, and received replies from such distinguished officers as Pickering, Knox, Putnam, King, Clinton, and Von Steuben. After digesting the papers submitted to him by his trusted lieutenants, Washington wrote his own views under the title of "Sentiments on a peace establishment", which he transmitted to the President of the Congress.

The Revolutionary War had been won by the Continental Army. This force from Washington down to the lowest private was composed of citizen soldiers. Its modern prototype is our National Guard. Washington desired to assure the speedy formation of a similar force for future emergencies. He therefore proposed that a sufficient number of the younger men of the militia be set apart and trained in time of peace. This would form a Continental Army of the future. This is what Washington meant by a "well-regulated militia", and this is what we provide by the passage of the pending bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am as good a friend of the National Guard as any other Member of this House. I will do just as much for them as any other Member here. I am going to vote for this bill, because it is their bill, and this will be the only opportunity to consider and pass it before we adjourn. And what I shall say respecting this "motion to suspend the rules" must not be construed in any way as any opposition to this National Guard bill, but a protest against calling up such important measures under a suspension of the rules, with only 20 minutes' debate allowed to the side, and when there is no opportunity for any Member to offer any amendment, however salutary and necessary, but all Members must vote for the bill just as it is written, and there cannot be one word or syllable of it changed.

Such important bills as this should be called up and considered under the general rules of the House, when their provisions may be known to and understood by all of the Members, and an opportunity given to offer proper amendments, if it should develop that same are necessary.

No committee is infallible. All committees make mistakes, once in a while. Every bad bill that was ever passed by Congress, had been favorably approved by some committee. Every bill that is defeated in this House, came from some committee with a favorable report. We have defeated several bad measures in this special session of Congress. Some committee had approved and asked for their passage.

This bill contains 25 printed pages. I will guarantee that outside of the Committee on Military Affairs, which reported it, there are not 10 Members who have ever read it. You have not even heard it read by the Clerk. Our colleague from Alagama, Mr. HILL, in charge of it through unanimous consent, had the reading of it waived, and it will be passed here in a few minutes without the Membership knowing just what is contained in the many paragraphs of the 20 different sections of the 25 printed pages of this bill. Is that a sane way to legislate?

Now, remember, I am going to vote for this bill. I am for the National Guard. This is the National Guards' bill. I am for it. But I am registering my protest against this method of legislating. I am doing it as a suggestion and warning to my colleagues that they must watch the many bills closely that are to be called up under suspension between now and adjournment, because most of the bills that will be passed hereafter, excepting, of course, the Consent Calendar, will be passed under suspension of the rules, when they cannot be properly debated, and they cannot be amended in any particular. Some of them will not be so good. In fact, some of them will be bad. And there will be some of them that we must defeat.

This bill was introduced in this House on May 15, 1933, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, was printed that night, and on the next day was favorably reported by the committee, and on May 16, 1933, was put on the calendar of this House.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN] introduced practically the bill we have before us today many weeks ago, and the committee went over that bill line by line and section by section and——

Mr. BLANTON. I cannot yield further.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. And then had the bill, as amended, introduced.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama has his own time and I will let him answer me in his own time.

This particular bill, H.R. 5645, as I say, was introduced on May 15, 1933. The next day, on May 16, 1933, as soon as it came from the Government Printing Office, it was taken up that day by the Committee on Military Affairs and favorably reported, and it was placed on this calendar for passage. Now all rules are to be suspended and this bill of 25 printed pages, without having been read here even once, is to be passed without allowing any amendment, with only 20 minutes debate to the side. This is pretty rapid procedure.

What time did the National Guard or the National Guard units of the United States have between the 15th day of May and the 16th day of May in the 48 States of the Union to pass upon the amendments that were put on the other McSwain bill and that are now in this present McSwain bill? I do not know that down in my State the National Guard has approved these amendments. I am with the National Guard of my State. I am for their program and for their bill. I am for passing a bill that will protect their interests, but I do not know that this bill protects them. I am forced to accept it blindly, because the National Guard are entitled to have their bill passed.

This special session is the session of the President of the United States. It was called for no purpose other than to put into effect the President's policies and the President's program. This particular bill has not come from the White House. Franklin D. Roosevelt has not sent this bill up here and asked us to report it on 24 hours' notice and to pass it under suspension of the rules. There may be excuse for passing the President's bills under suspension, because he wants them passed just as he has prepared them. He does not want them ruined by amendments that may come from across the aisle designed to hamper him.

Do you new Members know what you are going to have to do under this procedure? Dr. WEARIN, you are going to have to sit there like an open-mouth mocking bird and swallow a 25-page bill that you have not read and that you have not heard read, and of the contents of which you know nothing, when you cannot, as a good representative of the people of Iowa, offer an amendment, and you cannot debate it, even though you have been the Democratic leader in the Iowa Legislature for 4 years. You cannot change this bill by the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." You have got to vote for it as it is, after debate of 20 minutes on the side, and you cannot amend it in any particular. Is that the way to pass bills under orderly procedure?

Mr. STUDLEY and Mr. LLOYD rose.

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment I will yield.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 more minutes. If any other gentleman wants any time to speak on this matter, I will yield him time.

Mr. LLOYD. Can the gentleman tell us what is the matter with this bill? What is wrong with it?

Mr. BLANTON. Possibly nothing. But there could be some provision in it that the National Guard would not approve. Has the gentleman read the bill?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; I am on the committee, and I want to know what the gentleman has against it.

Mr. BLANTON. Was this bill read paragraph by paragraph in the committee?

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. On the 16th day of May 1933?

Mr. LLOYD. I do not know what day it was, but every paragraph has been read and considered.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the day it came from the Government Printing Office. And with its 25 pages it was reported that same day by the committee.

Mr. LLOYD. And all the members of the committee are for it.

Mr. BLANTON. That May 16 is the day it came from the Printing Office, and that is the day it was reported by the gentleman's committee and put on the calendar. It should have been read carefully that day paragraph by paragraph.

Mr. LLOYD. What is wrong with the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I cannot yield further. I will let the gentleman get his time from the committee.

I am not fighting this bill. It is probably just what the National Guard in my district want. There is probably nothing wrong with it. But surely when it is being passed in behalf of the National Guard an opportunity should be given the National Guard of every State to pass upon amendments recently added to the bill by the committee. As I said before, I am merely registering my solemn protest against passing such measures of this importance under suspension of rules, where they cannot be read, where they cannot be properly debated, where they cannot be amended, and when over 400 Representatives of the people in this House know nothing whatever about its provisions. It is to stop other bills from being taken up under suspension of rules between now and adjournment, that I am taking this time and going to this trouble.

Let me call your attention to the number of bills which today are to follow this one and are to be called up under suspension of rules. Some are good bills and ought to be passed. Some are bad bills and ought to be defeated. But when passed under suspension of rules there is no time given for proper consideration. You have not time to properly explain the good ones, so as to insure their passage, and you have not time to explain the bad ones so as to be sure to cause their defeat.

Following this National Guard bill, which we ought to pass without a vote against it, there will be called up the bankruptcy bill of our friend from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN], H.R. 5884, which is a bill of 32 printed pages; and it was introduced in this House on June 2, 1933, and on that day was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed, and on that same day, June 2, 1933, was favorably reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, being report no. 194, and was immediately placed on the calendar, which shows some unusually speedy work. Outside of the committee there are not a dozen Members who have read that 32-page bill; and it will not be read here when it is called up. It will be passed perfunctorily and only a few here will know what it is all about. That is not the way to legislate sanely and judiciously. It is not the orderly way.

Fortunately we are assured by members of the Judiciary Committee that this is a proper bill. But we have to take their word for it. We do not know ourselves. Hence we are voting on it blindly.

Then there will be called up today to be passed under suspension of rules the Senate bill S. 604, which passed the Senate on May 1, and was favorably reported by our Committee on the Public Lands on May 22, 1933. How many Members here know anything about it? From inquiries we are told by the committee that it is "all right" and possibly it is; yet, after all, we must vote on it blindly, and must take the word of the committee for it, and we cannot amend it in any particular. Suppose there should be something wrong with it? Suppose it is unwise and not salutary? Our constituents will hold us responsible for it. We cannot excuse ourselves by saying, "We relied on the committee." Our constituents back home are expecting us to know that a bill is good before we vote for it. Our constituents are depending on us, and on us alone. They are not depending on the committee. We are their Representatives. They expect us to legislate for them.

Then there will be called up by our friend from Mississippi, Mr. RANKIN, the bill he introduced at the instance and request of the President of the United States, H.R. 5767, authorizing the President of the United States to appoint as Governor of Hawaii a citizen of the mainland. This is the President's bill. There is some reason for passing it under suspension. The President wants it passed. The President needs it. Just now, particularly, the President desires to appoint for this most important position as Governor of Hawaii someone whom he knows has proper qualifications, someone in whom he has perfect confidence, someone who has good judgment, someone who is wise and sagacious, someone who is dependable under all circumstances, and someone who will bring order out of chaos, and who will enforce law and maintain order, for the protection of all of the people of Hawaii. And it is to protect as well the United States. An unwise Governor there could involve us in serious complications and embarrassments. We have ample authority, both under the treaty and under the organic act, to pass this bill. And this bill is probably the only one that should have been called up here under suspension of rules. The other bills should have been considered under the general rules of the House.

Then, probably, there will be called up under suspension of rules Senate Joint Resolution 54, or a similar House measure, which provides that our criminal statutes shall be waived, and shall not apply to any counsel or other officer of the Department of Agriculture, if designated by the Secretary of Agriculture at the time of appointment as entitled to such benefits, thus permitting him to act as agent or attorney for another before departments, notwithstanding his employment by the Government, with a proviso that not more than three such officers shall hold such exemption. This is a bad bill. It should not pass. We should not extend any such unwise precedent. We should not let any man thus hold two jobs, where there are millions seeking one job and cannot find any. We should never allow any official on the pay roll of this Government to accept employment from another to represent such private interests against the Government. That is unthinkable.

I have discussed this unwise policy of passing bills under suspension of rules, hoping that we will stop the practice, except as to administration measures which the President desires to be passed during this crucial emergency, just as he writes them. And when this emergency is over, we must stop passing President's bills. Then they must be our own bills. We are not reading this 25-page bill. It is not the President's bill. Such bills should be read.

Mr. O'MALLEY. When the economy bill was passed we did not read it, and the gentleman's point is that this is too important a measure to pass without discussion by paragraph.

Mr. BLANTON. It is too important a matter to take up here without even reading it, when only emergency matters thus should be passed and passed under a suspension of the rules. It is a bill of 25 pages. We cannot have time to discuss the provisions, it cannot be read by paragraphs, and we cannot amend it.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, I have not the time. I will let the gentleman use the time of the committee. If you will look at section 19, on page 23 of this bill, you will see where it provides for pensions for the National Guard. Now, I am in favor of this provision. But in connection with it there are some disabled World War veterans and disabled veterans of the Spanish-American War who are lying on their backs disabled 100 percent and have had their pensions taken from them. Under regulations promulgated by Director Douglas and General Hines, under the economy bill men dying of tuberculosis, who are 100 percent disabled, have had their pensions taken away, when they cannot get a job and when their wives cannot get jobs, because when people find out that her husband has tuberculosis they will not employ the wife. They are helpless. Why not provide to suspend the rules and pass a bill to remedy these injustices General Hines is causing when men are dying of tuberculosis? They are becoming desperate; they do not know which way to turn. There are going to be thousands of men put on charity in every part of the United States. While we are passing a bill like this for men who are now able-bodied, and arranging pensions for them in the future, do not you think that at the same time we ought to provide pensions to men who were disabled on the battlefields of France and who are now helpless?

The man who went to France and who was gassed and come back and months and even years afterward developed tuberculosis—show me the scientists who can say with certainty that such tuberculosis is not the result of his service. Where is the scientist who can tell you that he knows that the tuberculosis did not result from the man's service?

I know some scientists have said so; they have told the Veterans' Administration so, and many of these men are now losing their pensions and all are going to be cut in their pay.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes more.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman in favor of taking up such bills under suspension?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not care when it is taken up.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I cannot yield to the gentleman. I am in favor of taking such bills up under orderly procedure, reading them under the 5-minute rule section by section, and give Members a chance to find out what is in the bills and a chance to amend them if they need amending. Oh, they say, members of the committee know what it means. How many of you gentlemen who are not on the committee know what it means? There are over 400 of you who are not on that committee. How do you know what is in this bill? It has not been read.

Mr. STUDLEY. We have confidence in the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Then why do not you go home and let the committee bring in the bills and pass them? You are not needed here because you have confidence in the committee.

The gentleman is willing to follow the committee when he himself does not know anything against it. That is getting to be a habit with others.

Mr. MILLARD. Has not that been the custom right through the Seventy-third Congress so far?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, to be sure, with respect to administration measures; the President knows what his policies are, and he has his program, and he prepares measures and sends them here to our leadership, and they are introduced for him and are favorably reported as a matter of course, and to be sure that they are passed as the President wants them and not as he does not want them; they have to be considered either under a rule that prevents amendments or else rules are suspended and they are passed without amendment. That has been the custom from time immemorial.

That happens regularly under Republican Presidents and it happens regularly under Democratic Presidents.

Naturally in this special session that rule has been much in vogue. This is the President's special session. He called it for the express purpose of putting his policies into effect. The people were not depending on Congress. They were depending on President Franklin D. Roosevelt. Our constituents back home, Republicans and Democrats alike, expected us to back the President. They wanted us to give the President what he asked for, because in no other way could he put his program into execution.

The people are relying upon the President and not upon you and me. The people want the President to have a chance, and I have been giving him the chance.

Mr. STUDLEY. The gentleman voted against the beer bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, that involved a moral question. The gentleman ought to observe the rules and rise when he addresses a Member, and first get permission before he interrupts. He ought to study the manual. He ought to get the revised copy that our distinguished colleague from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], one of the greatest parliamentarians this House has ever known, is getting out now in the Printing Office.

It is in the last 6 days of every session that bills are passed without proper consideration. Having been here watching things for 16 long years, I have come to the conclusion there ought not to be any "last 6 days" of a Congress. When you pass bills under suspension, you cannot change them, you cannot amend them, and you cannot properly debate them. We ought not to bring up any bills hereafter in this special session except the President's measures that are a part of his program. We will have plenty of time in the next session to pass measures that are not sent here by the President.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is not discussing the bill. He is talking about the way it should be passed in the next session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will discuss the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. The Chair will not hold me out of order although the gentleman from New York may.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I regret that I have not the time.

Mr. SISSON. For just one simple question.

Mr. BLANTON. No; I cannot, because I want to conclude. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I think the Chair should protect the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. With my other good friend from New York [Mr. CLARKE] here, I do not need any protection. I want to ask one question. Why should we not put other bills off that the President does not ask for until next session and take them up in an orderly way, when we can have the consensus of opinion of 435 Members, and not merely the opinion of one committee? When I first brought before this committee my Resolution 355 to remove William Wolff Smith as general counsel of the Veterans' Bureau many of the members of the committee were against me. But after placing before the committee a lot of evidence, the members of the committee helped me, and we forced him to resign.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. SNELL. And the gentleman claims that he knows more about the rules than any man in the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 minutes more.

Mr. SNELL. I insist upon the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will speak to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Of course I know my good friend from Potsdam is in favor of this bill.

Mr. SNELL. I make the point of order that the gentleman must proceed in order. He has not followed the rules of the House since he has been on the floor today.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure that the distinguished minority leader is in favor of these suspensions, even if he does come from Potsdam. He has passed so many bills during the time that he has been the Republican leader under suspension of the rules——

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order and insist the gentleman talk to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman in favor of suspensions?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I insist upon the gentleman confining himself to the bill. He has told us today that he is an expert on the rules and follows them, and I insist that he follow the rules of the House and talk on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am going to do it in spite of the gentleman from Potsdam. This is a good bill. I am for it. It ought to be passed, even though there may be some things in here that may affect adversely the interest of every National Guard in any one of our States. These things get by the committee sometimes. A committee is not infallible.

Mr. Speaker, I am ready to conclude my remarks. I have registered my protest against passing large bills of great importance under suspension of rules, unless they are administration measures and are a part of the Chief Executive's program.

Mr. Speaker, I would not have used so much time if it had not been for the interruptions. If anyone desires time, I will be glad to give them what is left.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] said this bill would put the National Guard, as far as pensions were concerned, in the same status as the disabled veterans. My distinguished friend from Texas is mistaken in this matter. If the Congress should declare war and the National Guard was inducted into service under the same conditions as the Regular Army, then those men in the guard would be entitled to a pension. So there is nothing in this bill which discriminates against the disabled veterans at all.

Mr. BLANTON. I did not say that. My distinguished friend from Massachusetts misunderstood me. I just called attention to section 19, which provided pensions, merely to remind the Congress that the Pension Bureau is now doing grave injustice to veterans of several wars.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The gentleman from Texas has not been recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. I was speaking with the permission of my friend from Massachusetts, who has the floor.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; I am always glad to yield to the gentleman from Texas. We have had many interesting colloquies on the floor of this House in the past 10 years.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] knows how to protect himself and does not need any help from the gentleman from New York. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. The National Guard has been trying to get this legislation since 1926. Seven years the guard has favored this type of bill. The gentleman from Texas gave the impression to the House that the National Guard did not know just exactly what was in this bill. They know what is in the bill. They have been after it for 7 years. Every National Guard unit in the United States wants this bill passed.

The National Guard is the backbone of national defense. They have a great esprit de corps, great love of their units, and during the World War when they went into service, just as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] said, it was a source of great annoyance to them and great regret that they lost their unity in being thrown into other outfits. This bill protects that esprit de corps so necessary in fighting outfits and its passage will greatly help the morale of the guard. So I hope the bill is passed. It is a great bill for national defense, and anything we can do to help national defense is needed at this time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE].

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is that if ever war be declared, the National Guard units would be summoned by the President into the National Army as units.

I was here in 1917, and I happened to be the second Member of the Congress of the United States who declared he thought we should sever diplomatic relations and declare war upon Germany, Mr. Gardner, of Massachusetts, being the first. I was the first Member of Congress to declare in favor of the selective-service system. Whether we were wise or unwise in that position is not now the point, but my own idea is that when you have to fight you have to fight. I watched our men go to France. I saw the army commands in Europe try to disintegrate our men and put them into various European army commands as cannon fodder, and I saw that great American, Pershing, refuse absolutely to do it. [Applause.] One of the glories of the American armies is that we fought in Europe as an American army. And it was the solid American army unit who broke the Hindenberg line. Now, because this bill was not in effect then, to permit the National Guard units to be accepted as units, we had to draft our National Guard men not as units but as individual members, so that they did not have the esprit de corps they would have had if they had gone in under their own National Guard officers and with the associates with whom they were in close fellowship at home.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EAGLE. Oh, I cannot yield, having only 2 minutes. Please excuse me.

There should not be a single vote against this bill. After it is passed the National Guard will go in as units and will fight as units and we will come out as units, and the States will not then be reorganizing their National Guard units again. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] has expired.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I differ very much with my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. For one, I am delighted at this session that we are having less wind and more action. [Laughter.]

Why put off this bill? It has been before Congress for 7 years. It comes before you now with the approval of the War Department.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. There are close to 200 new Members in this Congress, who, I feel, should be entitled to have time to study these matters.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. They had better leave the study alone and take the advice of the oldtimers.

Mr. O'MALLEY. They did that on the economy bill, and what good did it do?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. If they will take the advice of the oldtimers, they will get along fine. What you need to do is get in and drill. [Laughter.]

Everybody is in favor of this bill. I say, everybody connected with the Military Establishment is in favor of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN] has expired.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I have only one speaker on this side, and I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to use the balance of his time.

Mr. BLANTON. I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL].

Mr. HOEPPEL. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE], who said he voted for the selective draft, if he voted for the National Economy Act?

Mr. EAGLE. I did not; and I am not having to "eat crow", as some people, in pretending that I did not know the effect of it, either. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I have obtained this time for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from Oregon, General MARTIN. In his remarks a few moments ago he said that this bill had been considered by Congress for 7 years. I do not see the general now——

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Here I am, right here.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. I wish to ask the gentleman what Congress he means?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Before the Congress of the United States, House after House. Now it comes before us again.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Just a moment. I want a definite answer to my question; it is certain that the same Congress has not considered this legislation for 7 years and most assuredly this is the first time it has been before the Seventy-third Congress.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I am trying to answer the gentleman. He cannot take me off my feet.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Just a moment. The gentleman says that it has been before Congress for 7 years. Congress has changed several times during the period of 7 years, and I am referring to its Membership. The present House has not discussed it at all previous to this debate today. More than one third of the House Members of this Seventy-third Congress are new men, and you expect us to accept measures like this with 20 minutes' discussion and no opportunity to offer amendments.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The gentleman is a Member of it, however, and has the opportunity to study these things.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. That is the trouble with you, General; you want to give orders like you would in the Army, and expect us to obey like buck privates. [Applause.] You want to thrust legislation down our throats. I am not objecting to the bill, but I am objecting to the procedure under which it is being considered. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in the remaining time left to me I desire to call attention to the fact that because I registered my protest against important measures embracing 25 printed pages being called up under the suspension of all rules, several speakers have indicated by their remarks that I was fighting the passage of this bill. Such is not the case. I am for this bill, and there probably will not be a vote against it.

When I mentioned section 19, on page 23 of the bill, I was not against the pensions there provided for, as my friend from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] in his remarks indicated. I merely referred to such section 19 in calling attention to the many injustices now being done other pensioners who are helpless and disabled. This section 19 provides:

> When any officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man of the National Guard or the National Guard of the United States called or ordered into the active service of the United States, or when any officer of the Officers' Reserve Corps or any person in the Enlisted Reserve Corps ordered into active service except for training, is disabled by reason of wounds or disability received or incurred while in the active service of the United States, he shall be entitled to all the benefits of the pension laws existing at the time of his active service; and in case such officer or enlisted man dies in the active service of the United States or in returning to his place of residence after being mustered out of active service, or at any other time in consequence of wounds or disabilities received in such active service, his widow and children, if any, shall be entitled to all the benefits of such pension laws.

There is nothing wrong with the above section. I am in favor of it. When our National Guard is mustered into service, I am in favor of giving them every right that is enjoyed by the Regular Military Establishment. This bill should have been passed long ago. But it should have been passed under the general rules of the House, so that we could study it and be sure that the amendments recently placed on same by the committee are right and proper and meet with the approval of the National Guard at home in our various States.

My earliest recollections as a young boy are centered around the brilliant achievements of the Houston Light Guards, then the crack company of the United States. I then lived at the corner of Fannin and Lamar Streets, in the city of Houston. Just a block from my home was Bremond Square. It was here this champion company put on many of its wonderful drills. If I remember correctly, it took first prize both in New Orleans and Philadelphia in the competitive drills then annually held over the United States. Captain Price, of the Houston Light Guard, then was my hero. He lived close by. Many times he talked to me. He let me handle his sword. He explained to me just what his company meant to the United States. Having lived in such an atmosphere as a child, I could not be unfriendly to the National Guard. I am their friend. And having registered my protest against the unwisdom of passing measures under suspension of rules, I want to see this bill pass. And I hope there will not be a vote against it.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, this is not a General Staff bill. It is not a bill of the Military Affairs Committee. It is a bill which has been voted on and acted upon for 7 years by the National Guard and Reserve officers. The ones who have brought pressure upon Congress and the Military Affairs Committee to have action today—in fact, we have tried it several times this session—are the National Guard and the Reserve officers. We have been told by the National Guard that if this bill passes the House today they will get the bill through the Senate before we adjourn on June 10, and they will then have a bill for which they have been fighting for 7 long years.

In addition to that the Reserve officers are holding their annual convention at Chicago today and they are hoping before they adjourn they will get word that the House had passed this bill by unanimous vote.

The Gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] talked about the National Guard officers getting pensions. The only thing that happens is in case the National Guard are called into the Regular Army in times of war or national emergency they receive the same treatment as men of the Regular Army.

The necessity for this bill, more than any other, is well illustrated by the following: In 1898 I happened to be a volunteer—private in the "rear rank." We had five National Guard regiments in Michigan. We went from the National Guard into the Regular Army. These five National Guard regiments were disbanded. When the war was over we were discharged as individuals from the Regular Army, and it took some of us 2 or 3 years to get back the same regiments we had in Michigan before. The same thing happened in this last war. Although the war was over in 1919, we have been trying in Michigan, unsuccessfully, ever since to get the National Guard back as it was.

This bill means that when Congress after declaring war or a national emergency the President may call in a regiment of the National Guard and it will retain its National Guard status.

Gentlemen, this bill ought to pass the House. It has passed the House before, and it should pass today by a unanimous vote.

Mr. CASTELLOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAMES. I yield.

Mr. CASTELLOW. Will this bill increase in any way the expenses of the Government?

Mr. JAMES. In no way whatsoever.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill be passed?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Goss), there were—ayes 169, noes 1.

So, two thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

REDUCTION OF PENSION OF A VETERAN OF THE SPANISH-AMERICAN AND WORLD WARS

Mr. CLARKE. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, this defender of our Nation served in two wars—as a captain in the Spanish-American War and as a captain in the World War—and has had his pension reduced from $50 a month to $6.

He did not apply for a pension until his condition became so serious he was unfit for work in June 1920. His original pension was $12, was increased to $18, later to $30, and on June 2, 1930, to $50 a month, upon a rating of three quarters disability.

When he was mustered in he had a slight left inguinal hernia, and the records show it was "slight, but well sustained by truss." He could do everything any man could do, so was accepted for service. In camp in 1898 he contracted a severe cold and the cold developed into pleurisy, but sailed with his detachment for Honolulu and served at Camp McKinley; was again taken sick, this time with malarial fever, and was transferred to a military hospital.

On November 30, 1898, his regiment returned to the United States, but he was kept in the hospital in Honolulu until December 20. About December 10 he had a recurrence of the pleurisy. These two attacks affected his rupture very seriously and developed a tendency toward bronchial colds and cough incident to the pleurisy.

This soldier has had a slight shock, impairing the use of his right hand and partially of the left, affecting his speech and walk. At present he is wholly disabled and at 75 years of age there is little chance of improvement.

If there is a man in the United States entitled to a pension, it is this man; and I cite this fact in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, have brought it to the attention of Mr. Morgan, Director of Pensions, and the Director of the Budget, as I cannot believe that it was ever the intention of the Congress, and certainly not their expectation, that such injustices would be wrought under the guise of economy.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY LAW

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5884) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, with an amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", as amended by the acts of February 5, 1903, June 15, 1906, June 25, 1910, March 2, 1917, January 7, 1922, May 27, 1926, February 11, 1932, and March 3, 1933, be, and it is hereby, amended by adding to chapter VIII, entitled "Provisions for the relief of debtors", two new sections to read as follows:

"SEC. 78. Additional jurisdiction: In addition to the jurisdiction exercised in voluntary and involuntary proceedings to adjudge persons bankrupt, courts of bankruptcy shall exercise original jurisdiction in proceedings for the relief of debtors, as provided in section 79 of this act.

"SEC. 79. Corporate reorganizations: (a) Any corporation which could become a bankrupt under section 4 of this act, and any railroad or other transportation corporation, except a railroad corporation authorized to file a petition or answer under the provisions of section 77 of this act, and except as hereinafter provided, may file an original petition, or, before adjudication in an involuntary proceeding, an answer, or in any proceeding pending in bankruptcy, a petition stating that the corporation is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature and that it desires to effect a plan of reorganization. The petition shall be filed with the court in whose territorial jurisdiction the corporation, during the preceding 6 months or the greater portion thereof, has had its principal place of business or its principal assets. The petition or answer shall be accompanied by payment to the clerk of a filing fee of $100, which shall be in addition to the fees required to be collected by the clerk under other sections of this act. Upon the filing of such a petition or answer the judge shall enter an order either approving it as properly filed under this section if satisfied that such petition or answer complies with this section and has been filed in good faith, or dismissing it. If the petition or answer is so approved, an order of adjudication in bankruptcy shall not be entered and the court in which such order approving the petition or answer is entered shall, during the pendency of the proceedings under this section, have exclusive jurisdiction of the debtor and its property wherever located for the purposes of this section, and shall have and may exercise all the powers, not inconsistent with this section, which a Federal court would have had it appointed a receiver in equity of the property of the debtor on the ground of insolvency. The corporation shall be referred to in the proceedings as a 'debtor.' Any corporation the majority of the capital stock of which having power to vote for the election of directors is owned, either directly or indirectly through an intervening medium, by any debtor, or substantially all of whose properties are operated by such debtor under lease or operating agreement, may file, with the court in which such debtor has filed its petition or answer, and in the same proceeding, a petition stating that it is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature and that it desires to effect a plan of reorganization in connection with, or as a part of, the plan of reorganization of such other debtor; and thereupon such court, if it approves such petition, shall have the same jurisdiction with respect to such corporation, its property, and its creditors and stockholders as the court has with respect to such other debtor. Three or more creditors who have provable claims against any corporation which amount in the aggregate, in excess of the value of securities held by them, if any, to $1,000 or over may, if such corporation has not filed a petition or answer under this section, file with the court in which such corporation might file a petition under this section, a petition stating that such corporation is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature and has committed an act of bankruptcy within 4 months, that such creditors propose that it shall effect a reorganization; and such corporation shall, within 10 days after the service of a copy of such petition upon it, answer such petition. If such answer shall admit (a) the jurisdiction of the court, (b) that the claims of the petitioning creditors constitute the amounts necessary to entitle them to file such petition under this section, and (c) that the corporation is either insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature, the court shall enter an order approving the petition as properly filed under this section if satisfied that it complies with this section and has been filed in good faith, or dismiss it if not so satisfied. If such answer shall deny either the jurisdiction of the court or that the claims of the petitioning creditors constitute such necessary amounts or that the corporation is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature, the judge shall determine summarily the issues presented by the pleadings, without the intervention of a jury, and if the material allegations of the petition are sustained by the proofs and the court is satisfied that the petition complies with this section and has been filed in good faith it shall approve the petition; otherwise the court shall dismiss the petition; and if any such petition shall be so approved, the proceedings thereon shall continue with like effect as if the corporation had itself filed a petition or answer under this section. In case any such petition or answer or proceedings shall be dismissed in the manner provided in this subdivision (a) or in subdivision (c), clause (8), of this section, the same shall not constitute an act of bankruptcy or an admission of insolvency or be admissible in evidence, without the consent of the debtor, in any proceedings then or thereafter pending or commenced under this act or in any Federal or State court. If three or more creditors who have provable claims which amount in the aggregate in excess of the value of securities held by them, if any, to $1,000 or over, or if stockholders holding 5 percent in number of all shares of stock of any class of the debtor outstanding shall, prior to the hearing provided for in subdivision (c), clause (1), of this section appear and controvert the facts alleged in the petition or answer, the judge shall determine as soon as may be the issues presented by the pleadings, without the intervention of a jury, and unless the material allegations of the petition or answer are sustained by the proofs, the proceedings shall be dismissed.

"(b) A plan of reorganization within the meaning of this section (1) shall include provisions modifying or altering the rights of creditors generally, or of any class of them, secured or unsecured, either through the issuance of new securities of any character or otherwise; (2) may include provisions modifying or altering the rights of stockholders generally, or of any class of them, either through the issuance of new securities of any character or otherwise; (3) shall provide for the payment in cash of all costs of administration and other allowances made by the court except that compensation or reimbursement provided for in subdivision (c), clause (9), of this section, may be paid in securities provided for in the plan if those entitled thereto will accept such payment and the court finds such compensation reasonable; (4) shall provide in respect of each class of stockholders, a majority of which shall not accept such plan (unless the judge shall determine either that the debtor is insolvent, or that the interest of such class of stockholders will not be affected adversely by the plan), adequate protection for the realization by them of the value of their equity, if any, in the property of the debtor dealt with by the plan, either as provided in the plan, (a) by a sale of the property at not less than a fair upset price, or (b) by appraisal and payment in cash of the value either of their stock, or at the objecting stockholders' election, of the securities allotted to such stockholders under the plan, if any shall be so allotted, or (c) by such methods as will do substantial justice to such stockholders under and consistent with the circumstances of the particular case; (5) shall provide in respect of each class of creditors two thirds in amount of which shall not accept such plan (unless the claims of such class of creditors will not be affected by the plan, or the plan makes provision for the payment of their claims in cash in full), provide adequate protection for the realization by them of the value of their interests, claims, or liens, if the property affected by such interests, claims, or liens is dealt with by the plan, either as provided in the plan (a) by the transfer or sale of such property subject to such interests, claims, or liens, or by the retention of such property by the debtor subject to such interests, claims, or liens, or (b) by a sale free of such interests, claims, or liens at not less than a fair upset price and the transfer of such interests, claims, or liens to the proceeds of such sale; or (c) by appraisal and payment either in cash of the value either of such interests, claims, or liens, or, at the objecting creditors' election, of the securities allotted to such interests, claims, or liens under the plan, if any shall be so allotted; or (d) by such method as will in the opinion of the judge, under and consistent with the circumstances of the particular case, equitably and fairly provide such protection; (6) may reject contracts of the debtor which are executory in whole or in part, including unexpired leases except contracts in the public authority; (7) shall, in case any creditor or stockholder or class thereof shall not be affected by the plan, specify the creditor or stockholder or class or classes thereof not affected and contain such provisions with respect thereto as may be appropriate, and in case any controversy shall arise as to whether any creditor or stockholder or class thereof shall or shall not be affected, the issue shall be determined by the judge after hearing upon notice to the parties interested; (8) shall specify what claims, if any, are to be paid in cash in full; (9) shall provide adequate means for the execution of the plan, which may include the transfer of all or any part of the property of the debtor to another corporation or to other corporations, or the consolidation of the properties of the debtor with those of another corporation, or the merger or consolidation of the debtor into or with another corporation or corporations, or the retention of the property by the debtor, the distribution of assets among creditors or any class thereof, the satisfaction or modification of liens, indentures, or other similar instruments, the curing or waiver of defaults, extension of maturity dates of outstanding securities, the change in interest rates and other terms of such securities, the amendment of the charter of the debtor, and the issuance of securities of either the debtor or any such corporation or corporations, for cash, or in exchange for existing securities, or in satisfaction of claims or rights, or for other appropriate purposes; and (10) may deal with all or any part of the property of the debtor. No creditor or stockholder shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be affected by any plan of reorganization unless the same shall affect his interests materially and adversely. The term 'securities' shall include evidences of indebtedness, either secured or unsecured, stock, certificates of beneficial interest therein, and certificates of beneficial interest in property. The term 'stockholders' shall include the holders of voting trust certificates. The term 'creditors' shall include for all purposes of this section and of the reorganization plan, its acceptance and confirmation, all holders of claims of whatever character against the debtor or its property, including claims under executory contracts and for future rent, whether or not such claims would otherwise constitute provable claims under this act. The term 'claims' includes debts, securities, other than stock, liens, or other interests of whatever character. For all purposes of this section unsecured claims which would have been entitled to priority over existing mortgages if a receiver in equity of the property of the debtor had been appointed by a Federal court on the day of the approval of the petition or answer under this section, shall be entitled to such priority, and the holders of such claims, and of other claims, if any, of equal rank, shall be treated as a separate class of creditors. In case any executory contract shall be rejected, the same shall be deemed to have been breached and the holder shall be entitled to file a claim for damages for such breach and such claim may be allowed provided such contract shall not have terminated by forfeiture, reentry, or otherwise. In the case of secured claims entitled to the provisions of clause (5) of this subdivision (b), the value of the security shall be determined in the manner provided in section 57, clause (h), of this act, and if the amount of such value shall be less than the amount of the claim, the excess may be classified as an unsecured claim. The provisions of section 60 of this act shall apply to claims against the debtor in a proceeding under this section. For all purposes of this section any creditor may act in person or by a duly authorized agent or committee.

"(c) Upon approving the petition or answer or at any time thereafter, the judge, in addition to the jurisdiction and powers elsewhere in this section conferred upon him, (1) may, after hearing upon notice to the debtor and to such others as the judge may determine temporarily continue the debtor in possession or appoint a trustee or trustees of the debtor's estate, and shall require the debtor, or such trustee or trustees, if appointed, to give such notice as the order may direct to creditors and stockholders and to cause publication thereof to be made at least once a week for 2 successive weeks of a hearing to be held within 30 days after such appointment, or, if no such appointment, within 30 days after the approval of the petition or answer, at which hearing or any adjournment thereof, or at any subsequent hearing after notice, the judge may make permanent any such appointment, or terminate it and restore the debtor to possession, or, if no trustee has been appointed, may appoint a trustee or trustees, and may remove any such trustee or trustees and continue the debtor in possession or appoint a substitute trustee or trustees and may appoint an additional trustee or trustees; (2) shall fix the amount of the bond of every such trustee, and every such trustee, upon filing such bond, shall have all the title and shall exercise, subject to the control of the judge and consistently with the provisions of this section, all the powers of a trustee appointed pursuant to section 44 of this act, and, if authorized by the judge, the same powers as those exercised by a receiver in equity to the extent consistent with this section, and, subject to the authorization and control of the judge, the power to operate the business of the debtor during such period, fixed or indefinite, as the judge may from time to time prescribe; (3) may, for cause shown, authorize the debtor or the trustee or trustees, if appointed, to issue certificates for cash, property, or other consideration approved by the judge for such lawful purposes, and upon such terms and conditions and with such security and such priority in payments over existing obligations, secured or unsecured, as may be lawful in the particular case; (4) shall require the debtor, or the trustee or trustees, if appointed, at such time or times as the judge may direct, and in lieu of the schedules required by section 7 of this act, to file such schedules and submit such other information as may be necessary to disclose the conduct of the debtor's affairs and the fairness of any proposed plan; and may direct the debtor, or the trustee or trustees, if appointed, to prepare (a) a list of all known bondholders and creditors of, or claimants against, the debtor or its property, and the amounts and character of their debts, claims, and securities, and the last known post-office address or place of business of each creditor or claimant, and (b) a list of the stockholders of each class of the debtor, with the last known post-office address or place of business of each, which lists shall be open to the inspection of any creditor or stockholder of the debtor, during reasonable business hours, upon application to the debtor, or to the trustee or trustees, if appointed, and the contents of such lists shall not constitute admissions by the debtor or the trustees in a proceeding under this section or otherwise; (5) may direct the rejection of contracts of the debtor executory in whole or in part; (6) shall determine a reasonable time within which the claims and interests of creditors and stockholders may be filed or evidenced and after which no such claim or interest may participate in any plan, except on order for cause shown, the manner in which such claims and interests may be filed or evidenced and allowed, and, for the purposes of the plan and its acceptance, the division of creditors and stockholders into classes according to the nature of their respective claims and interests; and may, for the purposes of such classification, classify as an unsecured claim the amount of any secured claim in excess of the value of the security therefor, such value to be determined in accordance with the provisions of section 57, clause (h), of this act; (7) shall cause reasonable notice of such determination and of all hearings for the consideration of any proposed plan, or of the dismissal of the proceedings, or the liquidation of the estate, or the allowance of fees or expenses, to be given creditors and stockholders by publication or otherwise; (8) if a plan of reorganization is not proposed or accepted within such reasonable period as the judge may fix, or, if proposed and accepted, is not confirmed, may, after hearing, whether the proceeding be voluntary or involuntary, either extend such period or dismiss the proceeding under this section or, except in the case of a railroad or other public utility or of a debtor which has not been found by the judge to be insolvent, direct the estate to be liquidated, or direct the trustee or trustees to liquidate the estate, appointing a trustee or trustees if none shall previously have been appointed, as the interests of the creditors and stockholders may equitably require; (9) may allow a reasonable compensation for the services rendered and reimbursed for the actual and necessary expenses incurred in connection with the proceeding and the plan by officers, parties in interest, depositaries, reorganization managers and committees or other representatives of creditors or stockholders, and the attorneys or agents of any of the foregoing, but appeals from orders fixing such allowances may be taken to the circuit court of appeals independently of other appeals in the proceeding and shall be heard summarily; (10) in addition to the provisions of section 11 of this act for the staying of pending suits against the debtor, may enjoin or stay the commencement or continuation of suits against the debtor until after final decree; and may, upon notice and for cause shown, enjoin or stay the commencement or continuance of any judicial proceeding to enforce any lien upon the estate until after final decree; and (11) may refer any matters to a special master, who may be one of the referees in bankruptcy, for consideration and report, either generally or upon specified issues, and allow such master a reasonable compensation and reimbursement for his services and actual and necessary expenses. The debtor shall have the right to be heard on all questions. Any creditor or stockholder shall have the right to be heard on the question of the permanent appointment of any trustee or trustees, and on the proposed confirmation of any reorganization plan, and upon filing a petition for leave to intervene, on such other questions arising in the proceeding as the judge shall determine. In case a trustee is not appointed, the debtor shall continue in the possession of its property, and, if authorized by the judge, shall operate the business thereof during such period, fixed or indefinite, as the judge may from time to time prescribe, and shall have all the title to and shall exercise, consistently with the provisions of this section, all the powers of a trustee appointed pursuant to this section, subject at all times to the control of the judge, and to such limitations, restrictions, terms, and conditions as the judge may from time to time impose and prescribe. While the debtor is in possession (a) its officers shall be entitled to receive only such reasonable compensation as the judge shall from time to time approve, and (b) no person shall be elected or appointed to any office, to fill a vacancy or otherwise, without the prior approval of the judge.

"(d) A plan of reorganization which has been approved by creditors of the debtor, whose claims would be affected by the plan, being not less than 25 percent in amount of any class of creditors, and not less than 10 percent in amount of all the claims against the debtor, or, if the debtor is not found by the judge to be insolvent, but is found unable to meet its debts as they mature, by stockholders whose interests would be affected by the plan, provided said amount is not less than 10 percent of any class of stock outstanding and not less than 5 percent of the total number of shares of all classes of stock outstanding, may be proposed by any creditor or by any stockholder, or without such approval by the debtor, at a hearing duly noticed for its consideration or for the consideration of any other plan of reorganization similarly proposed.

"(e) (1) A plan of reorganization shall not be confirmed until it has been accepted in writing, whether before or after the filing of the petition or answer under this section, and such acceptance shall have been filed in the proceeding by or on behalf of creditors holding two thirds in amount of the claims of each class whose claims have been allowed and would be affected by the plan and by or on behalf of stockholders of the debtor holding a majority of the stock of each class: Provided, however, That such acceptance shall not be requisite to the confirmation of the plan by any creditor or class of creditors (a) whose claims are not affected by the plan, or (b) if the plan makes provision for the payment of their claims in cash in full, or (c) if provision is made in the plan for the protection of the interests, claims, or liens of such creditor or class of creditors in the manner provided in subdivision (b), clause (5), of this section: And provided further, That such acceptance shall not be requisite to the confirmation of the plan by any stockholder or class of stockholders (1) if the judge shall have determined either that the debtor is insolvent, or that the interests of such stockholder or stockholders will not be affected by the plan, or (2) if provision is made in the plan for the protection of the interests of such stockholder or class of stockholders in the manner provided in subdivision (b), clause (4), of this section. With such acceptance there shall be set forth, verified in such manner as the judge shall require, what, if any, contracts of the debtor are executory in whole or in part, and what unexpired leases have been rejected and surrendered. With such acceptance there shall be filed a statement, vertified in such manner as the judge shall require, showing what, if any, claims and shares of stock have been purchased or transferred by those accepting the plan after the commencement or in contemplation of the proceeding, and the circumstances of such purchase or transfer: Provided, however, That if the judge is satisfied that by reason of the number of securities outstanding and the extent of the public dealing therein the preparation of such a statement would be impractical, he may direct that it be not filed. If the United States of America is a creditor or stockholder, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to accept or reject a plan in respect of the interests or claims of the United States.

"(2) In case the debtor is a utility subject to the jurisdiction of a regulatory commission or commissions or other regulatory authority or authorities, created by the laws of the State or States in which the properties of the debtor are operated, a plan of reorganization shall not be confirmed until (a) it shall be submitted to each such commission or authority having regulatory jurisdiction over the debtor, (b) an opportunity shall be afforded each such commission or authority to suggest amendments or objections to the plan, and (c) the judge shall consider such amendments or objections at a hearing at which each such commission or authority may be heard. In case the debtor is a public-utility corporation wholly intrastate in character, no court shall approve any plan of reorganization if the regulatory commission of such State having jurisdiction over such public utility certifies that the public interest is affected by said plan, unless said regulatory commission shall first approve of said plan as to the public interest therein and the fairness thereof. If said regulatory commission shall not within 30 days or such additional period as the court may prescribe after the submission of a plan to it file said certificate, it shall be deemed that the public interest is not affected by said plan.

"(f) After hearing such objections as may be made to the plan, the judge shall confirm the plan if satisfied that (1) it is fair and equitable and does not discriminate unfairly in favor of any class of creditors or stockholders, and is feasible; (2) it complies with the provisions of subdivision (b) of this section; (3) it has been accepted as required by the provisions of subdivision (e), clause (1), of this section; (4) the provisions of subdivision (e), clause (2), of this section have been complied with; (5) all amounts to be paid by the debtor or by any corporation or corporations acquiring the debtor's assets, and all amounts to be paid to committees or reorganization managers, whether or not by the debtor or any such corporation for services or expenses incident to the reorganization, have been fully disclosed and are reasonable, or are to be subject to the approval of the judge; (6) the offer of the plan and its acceptance are in good faith and have not been made or procured by any means or promises forbidden by this act; and (7) the debtor, and every other corporation, issuing securities or acquiring property under the plan, is authorized by its charter or by applicable State or Federal laws, upon confirmation of the plan, to take all action necessary to carry out the plan, and that, in case the debtor is a utility corporation subject to the jurisdiction of a regulatory commission or commissions or other regulatory authority or authorities, created by the laws of the State or States in which the properties of the debtor are operated, all authorizations, approvals, or consents of each such commission or authority required by the laws of such State or States have been obtained. Before or after a plan is confirmed, changes and modifications may be proposed therein by any party in interest and may be made with the approval of the judge after hearing upon notice to creditors and stockholders, subject to the right of any creditor or stockholder who shall previously have accepted the plan to withdraw his acceptance, within a period to be fixed by the judge and after such notice as the judge may direct, if, in the opinion of the judge, the change or modification will be materially adverse to the interest of such creditor or stockholder, and if any creditor or stockholder having such right of withdrawal shall not withdraw within such period, he shall be deemed to have accepted the plan as changed or modified: Provided, however, That the plan as changed or modified shall comply with the provisions of subdivision (b) of this section and shall have been or shall thereafter be accepted as required by the provisions of subdivision (e), clause (1), of this section, including acceptances by reason of failure to withdraw as hereinbefore provided, and the provisions of this subdivision (f), and of subdivision (e), clause (2), of this section, shall have been complied with in respect thereof. Upon confirmation of the plan by the judge, the debtor and other corporation or corporations organized or to be organized for the purpose of carrying out the plan, shall have full power and authority to put into effect and carry out the plan and the orders of the judge relative thereto. The provisions of sections 721, 722, 723, 724, and 725 of the Revenue Act of 1932 shall not apply to the issuance, transfers, or exchanges of securities or making or delivery of conveyances to make effective any plan of reorganization confirmed under the provisions of this section.

"(g) Upon such confirmation the provisions of the plan and of the order of confirmation shall be binding upon (1) the debtor, (2) all stockholders thereof, including those who have not, as well as those who have, accepted it, and (3) all creditors, secured or unsecured, whether or not affected by the plan, and whether or not their claims shall have been filed, and, if filed, whether or not approved, including creditors who have not, as well as those who have, accepted it.

"(h) Upon final confirmation of the plan, the debtor and other corporation or corporations organized or to be organized for the purpose of carrying out the plan, shall have full power and authority to, and shall put into effect and carry out the plan and the orders of the judge relative thereto, the same and the orders of the judge relative thereto, shall be put into effect and carried out, under and subject to the supervision and control of the judge, and the property dealt with by the plan shall be transferred and conveyed by the trustee or trustees to the debtor or the other corporation or corporations provided for by the plan, or, if no trustee has been appointed, shall be retained by the debtor pursuant to the plan or transferred by it to the other corporation or corporations provided for by the plan free and clear of all claims of the debtor, its stockholders and creditors, except such as may consistently with the provisions of the plan be reserved in the order confirming the plan or directing such transfer and conveyance, and the court may direct the trustee or trustees, or if there be no trustee, the debtor, to make any such transfer or conveyance, and may direct the debtor to join in any such transfer or conveyance made by the trustee or trustees. Upon the termination of the proceedings a final decree shall be entered discharging the trustee or trustees, if any, making such provisions as may be equitable, by way of injunction or otherwise, and closing the case. Such final decree shall discharge the debtor from its debts and liabilities, and shall terminate and end all rights and interests of its stockholders, except as provided in the plan or as may be reserved as aforesaid.

"(i) If a receiver or trustee of all or any part of the property of a corporation has been appointed by a Federal, State, or Territorial court, whether before or after this amendatory act takes effect a petition or answer may be filed under this section at any time thereafter by the corporation, or its creditors as provided in subdivision (a) of this section and if such petition or answer is approved, the trustee or trustees appointed under this section, or the debtor if no trustee is appointed, shall be entitled forthwith to possession of and vested with title to such property, and the judge shall make such orders as he may deem equitable for the protection of obligations incurred by the receiver or prior trustee and for the payment of such reasonable administrative expenses and allowances in the prior proceeding as may be fixed by the court appointing said receiver or prior trustee. If a receiver or trustee has been appointed by a Federal or State or Territorial court prior to the institution of a poceeding under this section, and such proceeding shall be dismissed under subdivision (c), clause (8), of this section, the judge may include in the order of dismissal appropriate orders directing the trustee or trustees, or the debtor if no trustee is appointed, to transfer possession of the debtor's property within the territorial jurisdiction of such court to the receiver or prior trustee so appointed, upon such terms as the judge may deem equitable for the protection of obligations incurred by any trustee or trustees appointed under this section, and for the payment of administrative expenses and allowances in the proceeding hereunder. For the purposes of this section the words 'Federal court' shall include the district courts of the United States and of the Territories and possessions to which this amendatory act is or may hereafter be applicable, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the United States Court of Alaska, and the District Court of the United States for the Territory of Hawaii.

"(j) A certified copy of the final decree or of an order confirming a plan of reorganization, or of any other decree or order entered in a proceeding under this section, shall be evidence of the jurisdiction of the court, the regularity of the proceedings, and the fact that the decree or order was made. A certified copy of an order directing the transfer of the property dealt with by the plan as provided in subdivision (h) of this section shall be evidence of the transfer of title accordingly, and if recorded shall impart the same notice that a deed, if recorded, would impart.

"(k) If an order is entered directing the trustee or trustees to liquidate the estate pursuant to the provisions of clause (8) of subdivision (c) of this section: (1) The case may be referred to a referee as provided in section 22, who shall be compensated as provided in section 40; (2) the first meeting of creditors shall be held as provided in section 55, upon notice as provided in section 58; (3) a trustee or trustees shall be appointed as provided in section 44, and be compensated as provided in section 48; (4) claims which are provable under section 63 may be proved as provided in section 57, except that the time within which proof may be made shall not expire until 6 months after the date of the last publication of the notice of the first meeting; (5) debts shall be entitled to priority as provided in section 64; (6) sales shall be made as provided in subdivision (b) of section 70; (7) dividends may be declared and paid as provided in section 65. None of the sections enumerated in this subdivision (k), except subdivisions (g), (l), (j), and (m) of section 57, and subdivisions (a) and (e) of section 70, shall apply to proceedings instituted under this section 79 unless and until an order has been entered directing the trustee or trustees to liquidate the estate. All other provisions of this act, except such as are inconsistent with the provisions of this section 79, shall apply to proceedings instituted under this section, whether or not an order to liquidate the estate has been entered. For the purposes of such application, provisions relating to 'bankrupts' shall be deemed to relate also to 'debtors'; 'bankruptcy proceedings' or 'proceedings in bankruptcy' shall be deemed to include proceedings under this section; the date of the order approving the petition or answer under this section shall be taken to be the date of adjudication, and such order shall have the same consequences and effect as an order of adjudication.

"(l) No judge, debtor, or trustee acting under this section shall deny or in any way question the right of employees on the property under the jurisdiction of the judge to join the labor organization of their choice, and it shall be unlawful for any judge, debtor, or trustee to interfere in any way with the organizations of employees or to use funds under such jurisdiction in maintaining so-called 'company unions' or to coerce employees in an effort to induce them to join or remain members of such company unions.

"(m) No judge, debtor, or trustee acting under this section shall require any person seeking employment on the property under the jurisdiction of the judge to sign any contract or agreement promising to join or to refuse to join a labor organization; and if such contract has been enforced on the property prior to the property coming under the jurisdiction of said judge, then the judge, debtor, or trustee, as soon as the matter is called to his attention, shall notify the employees by an appropriate order that said contract has been discarded and is no longer binding on them in any way.

"(n) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed or be deemed to affect or apply to the stockholders, creditors, or officers of any corporation operating or owning a railroad or railroads, railway or railways, owned in whole or in part by any municipality and/or owned or operated by a municipality, or under any contract to any municipality by or on its behalf or in conjunction with such municipality under any contract, lease, agreement, certificate, or in any other manner provided by law for such operation: Provided, however, That this paragraph shall not apply to or affect any corporation or the stockholders, creditors, or officers thereof, if not more than 20 percent of its operating revenue is derived from such operations.

"(o) In proceedings under this section and consistent with the provisions thereof, the jurisdiction and powers of the court, the duties of the debtor and the rights and liabilities of creditors, and of all persons with respect to the debtor and its property, shall be the same as if a voluntary petition for adjudication had been filed and a decree of adjudication had been entered on the day when the debtor's petition or answer was approved.

"(p) This section shall take effect and be in force from and after the date of the approval of this amendatory act and shall apply as fully to debtors, their stockholders and creditors, whose interests or debts have been acquired or incurred prior to such date, as to debtors, their stockholders and creditors, whose interests or debts are acquired or incurred after such date. Proceedings under this section may be taken in proceedings in bankruptcy which are pending on the effective date of this amendatory act."

SEC. 2. Section 74, subdivision (e), of such act of July 1, 1898, as amended, is amended by adding a new sentence at the end of the subdivision, to read as follows: "After the first meeting of the creditors as provided in subdivision (c), the debtor fails to obtain the acceptance of a majority in number of all creditors whose claims are affected by an extension proposal representing a majority in amount, the debtor may submit a proposal for an extension including a feasible method of financial rehabilitation for the debtor which is for the best interest of all the creditors, including an equitable liquidation for the secured creditors whose claims are affected."

SEC. 3. In the administration of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended, the district court or any judge thereof shall make in its or his discretion such an equitable distribution of appointments as receiver as will prevent any persons, firms, or corporations from having a monopoly of such appointments within such district.

SEC. 4. (a) Section 63 (a) of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended, is amended to read as follows: "(a) Debts of the bankrupt may be proved and allowed against his estate which are (1) a fixed liability, as evidenced by a judgment or an instrument in writing, absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition against him, whether then payable or not, with any interest thereon which would have been recoverable at that date or with a rebate of interest upon such as were not then payable and did not bear interest; (2) due as costs taxable against an involuntary bankrupt who was at the time of the filing of the petition against him plaintiff in a cause of action which would pass to the trustee and which the trustee declines to prosecute after notice; (3) founded upon a claim for taxable costs incurred in good faith by a creditor before the filing of a petition in an action to recover a provable debt; (4) founded upon an open account, or upon a contract express or implied; (5) founded upon provable debts reduced to judgments after the filing of the petition and before the consideration of the bankrupt's application for a discharge, less costs incurred and interest accrued after the filing of the petition and up to the time of the entry of such judgments; (6) founded upon an award of an industrial accident commission, or other commission, body, or officer, of any State or Territory having power or jurisdiction to make awards as workmen's compensation in case of injury or death for injury prior to adjudication; and (7) claims for damages respecting executory contracts including future rents whether the bankrupt be an individual or a corporation, which claims shall be liquidated under section 63 (b) of this act."

(b) The provisions of clause (6) of section 63 (a) of such act of July 1, 1898, as amended by this section, shall apply to estates pending at the time of the enactment of this act, and claims provided for in such clause (6) shall have the priority provided for in clause (7) of section 64 (b) of such act of July 1, 1898, as amended.

SEC. 5. Section 67 (f) of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended, is amended to read as follows: "That all levies, judgments, attachments, or other liens, obtained through legal proceedings against a person who is insolvent, at any time within 4 months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against him, and any bond which may be given to dissolve any such lien so created, shall be deemed null and void in case he is adjudged a bankrupt, and the property affected by the levy, judgment, attachment, or other lien, and any nonexempt property of his which he shall have deposited or pledged as security for such bond or to indemnify any surety thereon, shall be deemed wholly discharged and released from the same, and shall pass to the trustee as a part of the estate of the bankrupt, unless the court shall, on due notice, order that the right under such levy, judgment, attachment, or other lien shall be preserved for the benefit of the estate; and thereupon the same may pass to and shall be preserved by the trustee for the benefit of the estate as aforesaid. And the court may order such conveyance as shall be necessary to carry the purposes of this section into effect: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall have the effect to destroy or impair the title obtained by such levy, judgment, attachment, or other lien, of a bona fide purchaser for value who shall have acquired the same without notice or reasonable cause for inquiry.

SEC. 6. Conciliation commissioners appointed under section 75 of such act of July 1, 1898, as amended, shall be entitled to transmit in the mails free of postage under cover of a penalty envelope all matters which relate exclusively to the business of the Government, including notices to creditors.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. KURTZ. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, at the last session of Congress we passed a law amending the Bankruptcy Act, giving the right to individuals, farmers, and railroads to adjust their debts or obligations by consent of their creditors. As the bill passed the House it included corporations. It went to the Senate in the last days of the Congress. They did not have time enough to consider the corporate reorganization feature of the bill, so it was dropped out of the bill, and the act became a law granting to individuals, farmers, and railroads the right to go into court and compose their differences and have extensions and reorganizations of their debts.

So there comes now a great urge from corporations throughout the country who ask the same privilege enjoyed by the individuals, the farmers, and the railroads.

All this bill does is to give a forum where corporations may come in and ask to compose their differences or for extensions of time to work out their obligations or a reorganization of the corporation.

Now, in this bill, as to corporation reorganization, we have safeguarded the minority creditors and safeguarded the rights of the minority stockholders, and as to utility corporations we have protected the public interest in the reorganization of utility corporations by requiring the corporations in the States where they are reorganized, and that must be the State where they have their principal place of business or where their principal assets are located, to get the consent or approval of the plan by the regulatory commission of the State, if its business is wholly intrastate. If it does business in more than one State, the regulatory body of each such State is to be heard, if it desires, upon the plan or any objections to the plan.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. If I remember correctly, a short time ago we passed a bill similar to this applying to individuals.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. When that bill was introduced originally, did it not contain the word "corporations"?

Mr. McKEOWN. We had a section on corporations and it passed the House, but when it was over in the Senate they did not have time in the closing days of the session to go through the matter with respect to corporation reorganizations and the railroads were pressing more strongly than the corporations for the legislation, so they dropped out the corporation section.

Mr. SNELL. You are now doing practically what we did originally in the House?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; and we have made a correction to meet an objection raised in the Senate that there was no regulatory body to look after the public interest in the reorganization of utilities. We have straightened that out in this bill.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. There is nothing in this measure applying to municipalities?

Mr. McKEOWN. No; nothing at all as to municipalities. This bill is to give the same thing to corporations that the individual now has.

Mr. DUNN. As I understand the gentleman, this bill does not pertain to municipalities.

Mr. McKEOWN. No; municipalities are not included in this measure.

I do not know whether any of you are overlooking it or not, but in the act that was approved on March 3 last, there is a provision with respect to the farmers by which they can obtain extensions of their debts. There is a provision that 15 farmers in any county can petition the Federal judge and he must appoint a referee or conciliator, whose business it is to get the creditors together and see if they can adjust the debts of the farmer.

This was a forerunner of the legislation that has passed, whereby loans out of the $200,000,000 fund can be made available to farmers to refinance their farm mortgages.

Let me show you why you should call the attention of your constituents to this act. Under the act, if 15 farmers in any county petition the Federal judge of that district, it is his duty to appoint one of these conciliators or referees, and the maximum charge to the farmer is not in excess of $10. That is all he pays. Then let us see what takes place. By using one of the conciliators, the farmers in the county that are in debt and have mortgages which they cannot pay can call in all of their creditors and sit around the table, and they can scale down their debts or postpone them as they may agree. If they agree on the scaling down, the first mortgagee, for instance, agrees to cut his mortgage $2,000, and the bank and the merchant and the blacksmith and all the others agree to scale their claims in like proportion, and then they can submit this and make it permanent by having it confirmed by the court, and then this farm refinancing section will advance the money and take a second mortgage on the place. So you have the farmer out of debt, with nothing but his obligation to the Government.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. As I get the remarks of the gentleman, this is following along the line of the bill we passed previously, and helps the more to do away with that racket whereby they can petition a man into involuntary bankruptcy and mulct him of everything he has.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; and this will reduce the cost of administration, because it provides that the owners of the property may continue it as a going concern and will be able to handle it much better and cheaper than to have some trustee or receiver appointed to handle the property.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any information as to the number of farmers who have taken advantage of this amended act.

Mr. McKEOWN. We have information that they are beginning to utilize it in several of the States and in this measure I have amended the other bill in this regard. We gave the conciliator $10 and that was his full compensation. It was found that when he went to get his supplies he could not have the franking privilege to send out these notices and it cost him more in stamps than he got out of it. We have changed that so that now he will be able to send out the notices in a franked envelope.

Mr. TRUAX. But the effectiveness of the amendment depends wholly upon the willingness of the mortgagee to agree to scale down his mortgage.

Mr. McKEOWN. No; not necessarily. We have an amendment to this bill that if you cannot get a majority of the creditors to agree in amount and in number, and we will say a mortgagee is the largest creditor in the whole bunch and he stands out and refuses to agree, or if a majority will not agree, the farmer may present a plan that looks toward his rehabilitation as well as being fair to all his creditors.

Mr. TRUAX. But in the final analysis if the mortgagee refuses to agree, then he can go on and foreclose his mortgage and sell him out.

Mr. McKEOWN. He cannot. When the farmer files his petition the court stays any kind of action against the farmer without the consent of the judge.

Mr. TRUAX. Or any action on an involuntary petition in bankruptcy?

Mr. McKEOWN. They cannot put the farmer into involuntary bankruptcy. He is not called a bankrupt but a distressed "debtor." That is the title. It is the petition of a distressed debtor, and no man can sue him on any debt.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield myself 5 minutes more.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. What is the difference between a distressed debtor and a bankrupt; they are both in the same boat.

Mr. McKEOWN. There is a great misapprehension about bankruptcy. Because a man is insolvent and cannot meet his debts when they mature, you cannot put him into bankruptcy. You cannot put him into bankruptcy unless you show that he has committed some act of bankruptcy like preferring creditors, and so forth.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. How long can you forestall or prevent the mortgage from being foreclosed?

Mr. McKEOWN. For such time as the judge may deem it to be fair to the debtor and to the man who holds the mortgage.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. That will be heard in a Federal court?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; in a Federal court.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. Does this bill include municipal corporations as well as other corporations?

Mr. McKEOWN. No.

Mr. BUSBY. That is embraced in the provisions of the Wilcox bill. Can the gentleman state when that will come up?

Mr. McKEOWN. I cannot. I believe it has been reported out.

Mr. BUSBY. Does not the gentleman think it should include municipal corporations?

Mr. McKEOWN. That will come up as a separate bill.

Mr. WILCOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILCOX. It is well understood that there are now in the United States between a thousand and fifteen hundred governmental units that are in default of payment of public obligations, and so serious that the very existence of the local government in at least that number of units is seriously threatened. Does not the gentleman think that some system of relief is just as essential to these municipal units as the taking care of corporations?

Mr. McKEOWN. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. KURTZ. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER].

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, there is no reason why there should be protracted debate on this bill, for it is of such character that it ought to pass practically without much debate. There was no challenge to it in the committee on either the part of the majority or the members of the minority. The bill has been considered for a good number of days past and every possible phase of it has been carefully gone over.

I am inclined to think the verbiage of the bill may be in some way obscure, but on the other hand, I cannot easily see how the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN], who handled it, could have made a bill of that character less obscure. It furnishes a reasonable way to fight bankruptcy on the part of corporations which may be tottering on the brink of bankruptcy. As far as the minority side of it is concerned, and I think I speak for them, we are as one in the idea that this should pass the House.

Mr. ELTSE of California. May I ask the gentleman what precaution has been taken in the bill to protect an employee upon an award in his favor where the bankrupt employer is an insurance carrier—will the insurance company be released by the adjudication of the principal?

Mr. HOOPER. I shall hardly have time in my 3 minutes to answer that. The ranking committee member is going to explain. Suffice it to say that there is a protection in the bill which he will set forth.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to use any more time?

Mr. KURTZ. Not unless the majority does. I want first to answer a question. I am asked what there is to protect a creditor for labor under this act.

Mr. McKEOWN. The provision is in the bill that labor shall have its priority, as applied by the State laws. It has the same priority for wages as under the State law.

Mr. KURTZ. But not to exceed $600.

Mr. ELTSE of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KURTZ. Yes.

Mr. ELTSE of California. The specific question I have in mind is this: Take it in the State of California. The employers carry insurance in one or more companies. I notice here that you have extended the Bankruptcy Act to include awards of commissions. What protection has the employer got, where he holds an insurance, against a release of the insurance?

Mr. McKEOWN. This is put in here because at the time of the passage of the Bankruptcy Act in 1898 there was no such social legislation on the books as the Workingmen's Compensation Act. So the Workingmen's Compensation Act is not proven now in bankruptcy, so that if a man is insured and he receives an award and the corporation goes into bankruptcy, he should have the opportunity to file his claim with the bankrupt and get whatever his part is. It has the same priority as wages.

Mr. ELTSE of California. He gets a clearance in that way; but what about the creditor?

Mr. McKEOWN. The creditor recovers against the insurance company.

Mr. ELTSE of California. What is there in the bill that protects the holder of an insurance policy?

Mr. McKEOWN. The gentleman means the workman who has been injured?

Mr. ELTSE of California. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. He does not give up anything because he files against the bankrupt's estate. He has an election. He is not required to file it at all.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from that the laboring man would get the same amount as is allowed by the State law. The Bankruptcy Act provides for not more than $600.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; but my bill does not limit it to bankruptcy.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. In the State of Washington we have only $100, while the bankruptcy law allows $600. The gentleman only wants it $100 in that State?

Mr. McKEOWN. I want the State law to remain.

Mr. McFARLANE. Is this an administration measure?

Mr. McKEOWN. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

H.R. 4544

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to place therein an editorial from one of the papers in my district, which will take about half a column.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an editorial which appeared on Tuesday, May 30, in the Bakersfield Californian, which aptly discusses the myth of overproduction of crude oil in the United States during the past 5 years.

The Bakersfield Californian's editorial on this subject is ably authored by Alfred Harrell, dean of the Democratic Party in California, a publisher of Nation-wide repute and the first eminent editor of the entire West brave enough and far-seeing enough to take up the torch in favor of a protective tariff or an embargo on the importations of crude oil.

Those of you who are interested in the subject of Federal control of the domestic petroleum industry would do well to study his editorial closely, which follows:

THE OVERPRODUCTION MYTH

The wisdom of the proposal for Federal control of the oil industry will be questioned by independent producers and by the public generally just so long as there is no restriction on importations. And particularly will that be true as people understand that the claim which has been stressed for so long that there is great overproduction, is not borne out by the figures with production measured against consumption.

If we go back for a period of 5 years, to 1928, the daily average production in the United States was 2,400,000 barrels; the daily consumption during that year was 2,600,000 barrels. In 1929 the daily average production was 2,700,000 barrels; the daily average consumption was 2,800,000 barrels. In 1930 the daily average production was 2,400,000 barrels, the daily average consumption, 2,600,000 barrels. In 1931 daily production was 2,300,000 barrels against 2,500,000 barrels daily consumption. In 1932 the daily production was 2,100,000 barrels against a daily consumption of 2,200,000 barrels.

So it will be observed that in those 5 years the domestic production was below the country's consumption, and the fact that we have now a colossal surplus is due to another factor, and that is importations. Let us consider imports for the same 5 years. In 1928 we had a daily average importation of 218,000 barrels; in 1929 a daily average of 216,000 barrels; in 1930 a daily average of 173,000 barrels; in 1931 a daily average of 129,000 barrels, and in 1932 a daily average of 122,000 barrels.

As against these daily average imports, exports were, daily: In 1928, 52,000 barrels; in 1929, 72,000 barrels; in 1930, 65,000 barrels; in 1931, 70,000 barrels; and in 1932, 75,000 barrels.

The gain in surplus from year to year—and surplus is the thing that menaces the stability of the industry—is not, then, due to overproduction, but is directly traceable to importations. For in a period of 10 years the total volume of importations is just about equal to the total oil in storage. Which means, if it means anything, that if there had been no importations there would have been no surplus and no stagnation in the oil business. So it is we find the claim of overproduction to be a myth.

The Federal Government and all others who are interested in stabilizing the oil business would find a ready willingness on the part of those concerned with the industry to cooperate in a policy of curtailment if there were legislation to prohibit the incoming of foreign oil. But in the absence of any such legislation, there will be a disinclination in the future, as in the past and at the present, to cooperate in a movement which, in effect, makes either a market for foreign-produced oil, or adds said oil to the surplus to menace the prosperity of the industry.

The figures quoted by Alfred Harrell are authentic, being based upon calculations of the United States Bureau of Mines, and they are particularly refreshing in view of the false statements concerning production and consumption in the United States upon which we have been fed these many years by organizations operating solely for their own selfish ends.

I agree with my distinguished friend and compatriot in California that we cannot hope for an equitable adjustment within the petroleum industry through the avenue of Federal control until we have set our house in order by an effective restriction of crude-oil importations, and as the life of the first session of the Seventy-third Congress draws to a close, I want to serve notice that when we meet again it is my intention to wage a valiant battle for the adoption of H.R. 4544, which calls for the prohibition of all importations of crude oil.

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNOR OF HAWAII

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5767) to authorize the appointment of the Governor of Hawaii without regard to his being a citizen or resident of Hawaii, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 66 of the Hawaiian Organic Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 48, sec. 531), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 66. The executive power of the government of the Territory of Hawaii shall be vested in a Governor, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and shall hold office for 4 years and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President. He shall be not less than 35 years of age; shall be a citizen of the United States; shall be commander in chief of the Militia of Hawaii; and may grant pardons or reprieves for offenses against the laws of the said Territory and reprieves for offenses against the laws of the United States until the decision of the President is made known thereon."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Vermont to 20 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, as is well known, we have only two Territories, Alaska and Hawaii. The Philippines, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands come under the designation of insular possessions. With the exception of Hawaii, the Governors of Alaska and the various insular possessions are appointed from anywhere in the United States that the Chief Executive may deem proper. He may appoint a Governor of Alaska from the Territory of Alaska or he may appoint him from the continental United States. One President appointed a Governor of Puerto Rico from Kansas, and he appointed one Governor from New York.

In Hawaii up to the present time, under the law, it has been necessary to appoint the Governor from the Territory of Hawaii, as he must be a citizen or a resident of that Territory. The President, in the exercise of his duties as Chief Executive, has asked authority to appoint a Governor of Hawaii from anywhere within the United States, whether residing in Hawaii or in continental United States. He sent a message to the House a few days ago, in which he said:

> It is particularly necessary to select for the post of Governor of Hawaii a man of experience and vision, who will be regarded by all citizens of the islands as one who will be absolutely impartial in his decisions on matters as to which there may be a difference of local opinion. In making my choice I should like to be free to pick, either from the islands themselves or from the entire United States, the best man for this post. I request, therefore, suitable legislation temporarily suspending that part of the law which requires the Governor of Hawaii to be an actual resident of the islands.

Acting in accordance with that message, the Committee on Territories met and reported this measure, which we hope to have passed today and at the other end of the Capitol very soon, in order that this authority may be given to the President at once, so that he may proceed to appoint a Governor of the Territory of Hawaii to enter upon the discharge of his duties there without delay.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 minutes, and in that time I will endeavor to state my objections to the measure.

Mr. Speaker, Hawaii is located 2,100 miles west of the mainland. Its government was formerly a monarchy with a long line of kings and queens. The people overthrew the monarchy and Hawaii became a republic. When it became a republic, application was made to join the United States. A committee was formed, made up in part of citizens of Hawaii and an agreement arrived at as to the basis of joining the American Nation. This was covered by a resolution adopted by the Congress of the United States.

Its relation to the United States and its status are fixed by the Organic Act. The Organic Act provides, among other things, that the Governor shall be a resident of Hawaii. At first he was required to be a resident for 1 year. In 1920 or 1921 it was changed to 3 years. Since that time one of the requisites has been that the Governor be a resident of Hawaii for 3 years.

It is proposed by this bill to permit the appointment of any citizen of the United States, of 35 years of age, and with other qualifications. I am opposed to it. In the first place, no good reason was shown to the committee for the change. Not a word of testimony was brought out except the message of the President, in which he asked for a temporary suspension of the provisions of the organic law. I am opposed to it because it is opposed by the people of Hawaii, by the business men, and by the legislature. I am opposed to it because no investigation has been had to determine whether this should be passed or not. I am opposed to it because it breaks faith with the people of Hawaii. You must remember that Hawaii is a defense outpost in the Pacific Ocean, and we should be in harmony with those people, and we should encourage their cooperation and that spirit of patriotism that has always actuated them.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GIBSON. I will.

Mr. SNELL. Was there any information before your committee except that contained in the message of the President of the United States why this should be done?

Mr. GIBSON. Not any in favor of the passage of the measure.

Mr. SNELL. There was no investigation of any kind?

Mr. GIBSON. None whatsoever.

Mr. SNELL. I am a little surprised that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] should bring in a bill advocating carpetbag government in any Territory or in any part of the United States. That is the last place I would suppose it would come from. It might come from New York State, but when it comes from Mississippi, there is something back of it.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield,

Mr. SNELL. I will.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is so easily surprised these days that we are not surprised ourselves.

Mr. SNELL. Well, you have taken practically all the surprise out of me.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] has expired.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. MCCANDLESS].

Mr. MCCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, this bill which proposes to change the residence qualifications for the Governor of Hawaii, as set forth in our Organic act, is not an emergency measure. No mention has been made of any emergency to justify the change proposed in this bill. In fact, no arguments or evidence were brought forth in committee that would justify this change.

The bill would, without apparent reason, vitally affect the rights which were granted the people of Hawaii when those islands were made by joint resolution of Congress a part of the United States.

Throughout Hawaii's history as a Territory it has been provided by law that our Governor shall be a resident of the islands. The organic act as first passed in 1900 provided a 1-year residence qualification. Twenty-one years later Congress felt that this length of residence was not sufficient to properly acquaint the Governor with conditions in Hawaii. Consequently, in 1921 the residence qualification was increased to 3 years. This has assured the people of Hawaii a Governor familiar with local conditions, not a stranger.

The Government of this Nation is founded on the principles of freedom and the right of the people to rule themselves. My forefathers of Pennsylvania fought and bled with Washington to secure for this country those rights, which were incorporated in the Constitution of the United States.

We people of Hawaii had identical rights, identical freedom, when as an independent republic, a sovereign nation, we voluntarily and by mutual agreement became a part of the United States, and the Constitution was extended to us, covering and protecting us as it covers and protects every State in the Union.

You now propose to take from us one of the most sacred of these rights, the guaranty in our organic act that the people of Hawaii shall have their Governor chosen from among their own citizens. What logical reasons have the proponents of this bill for partially disenfranchising the people of Hawaii? Thomas Jefferson, the father of Democracy, was a defender of State rights, and through his efforts these rights were preserved for the people. We in Hawaii feel that Congress should continue to preserve for us this same constitutional right of self-government.

Before you take action in this important measure, I ask that you appoint a committee from this Congress to visit Hawaii and investigate conditions there at first hand. Let this committee report its findings back to Congress at the next regular session, and then base your actions on the report of your own Members after a personal investigation. I appeal to you not to act in haste and without sufficient knowledge upon which to base your actions.

The people of Hawaii are unanimous in their opposition to any change in the residence qualifications of their Governor. They resent the sending of a stranger to Hawaii to run their affairs, just as you men from the South resented the wave of carpetbaggers which flooded your States in the years immediately following the Civil War.

The Legislature of Hawaii, now in session, has just passed a concurrent resolution appealing to Congress to make no change in our organic act. That resolution has been read into the RECORD of this House. The Chamber of Commerce of Honolulu and the Honolulu Realty Board and Board of Retail Trade have wired me opposing this bill. It is un-American, undemocratic, and unjust.

Every Members of this House would resent, and rightfully resent, having a stranger thrust upon him as Governor of his State. I plead with you, therefore, to treat us as you would yourselves be treated. [Applause.]

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCANDLESS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Have the natives of Hawaii resented the intrusion of the white people who are down there now to rule them?

Mr. McCANDLESS. They have not.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Did they resent it in the first place?

Mr. McCANDLESS. They never have.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I think history will not bear out the gentleman's statement.

Mr. McCANDLESS. History will bear me out, and the Territorial legislature is unanimous in opposing any change in the Organic Act of Hawaii that would take away the residence qualification of our Governor, and a majority of the legislature are Hawaiians.

The SPEAKER. The time of the Delegate from Hawaii has expired.

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, to include a telegram and two resolutions.

The SPEAKER. Without object it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

HONOLULU, May 20, 1933.

L. L. McCANDLESS,
Hawaii Delegate, Washington, D.C.:

Representing business community, we strongly oppose any change to organic act of Territory to make possible the appointment of a nonresident as Governor. We respectfully urge such an amendment is unfair to Hawaii and unnecessary, as there are many able men in Hawaii qualified to fill the position of Governor.

CHAMBER COMMERCE OF HONOLULU.
RETAIL BOARD OF HONOLULU.
HONOLULU REALTY BOARD.

Resolution

Whereas it has come to the attention of the Democratic County Committee of the City and County of Honolulu from press reports that there is now under consideration in Washington a movement to amend the Hawaiian Organic Act so as to permit the appointment of a nonresident as Governor of the Territory or Hawaii; and

Whereas the Democratic Party in Hawaii has always strongly opposed any encroachment upon our rights of local self-government; and

Whereas we firmly believe that if any action were taken permitting a nonresident of the Territory of Hawaii to be appointed as its chief executive, it would be a step backward and would be a distinct reversal to the hopes held out since annexation to the United States of ultimate statehood for Hawaii; and

Whereas because of the many problems in Hawaii peculiar to itself we believe that the President of the United States could only be properly served and represented by one who has had long residence here and who is familiar with all angles of the situation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Democratic county committee of the city and county of Honolulu, That this committee is unalterably opposed to any amendment to the organic act which would permit of the appointment of a nonresident Governor of the Territory of Hawaii by the President of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be immediately forwarded to the President of the United States, Secretary of the Interior, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, the Delegate in Congress from Hawaii, national committeeman and national committeewoman from Hawaii.

The undersigned, secretary of the Democratic county committee of the city and county of Honolulu, does hereby certify that the foregoing is a full, true, and correct copy of a resolution this day adopted by the Democratic county committee in and for said city and county.

Done at Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, this 21st day of May A.D. 1933.

PETER E. CHU,
Secretary County Committee, City and County of Honolulu.

Resolution

Whereas the delay in appointing a Democratic Governor for the Territory of Hawaii has been a great disappointment to the Democratic Party in Hawaii and the people as a whole; and

Whereas latest press reports received in Hawaii indicate the possibility that the organic act of the Territory may be amended to permit the appointment of a nonresident as Governor of Hawaii; and

Whereas assurances were given by persons in high authority at the last Democratic National Convention at Chicago that the principle of home rule for Hawaii would be adhered to by the national Democratic administration; and

Whereas there are in Hawaii a number of Democrats eminently qualified for the post of Governor who would fill the office to the satisfaction of the President and the people of Hawaii; and

Whereas in the interest of true democracy and of all the residents of the Territory, regardless of party affiliations it is most desirable that a resident of the Territory who is familiar with its problems and sympathetic with its people be named as Governor: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Territorial central committee of the Democratic Party of Hawaii assembled on the 20th day of May 1933, unanimously and most emphatically protest any change in the Organic Act of Hawaii having for its purpose the appointment of a nonresident to the governorship of the Territory of Hawaii; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Honorable Horold L. Ickes, Secretary of Interior, and the Honorable James A. Farley, chairman National Democratic Committee.

I, the undersigned assistant secretary of the Democratic Territorial central committee of Honolulu, do hereby certify that the foregoing resolution was duly and regularly adopted at a meeting of said Territorial central committee held on Saturday, May 20, A.D. 1933, in Honolulu, city and county of Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii.

ERNEST N. HEEN,
Assistant Secretary Democratic Territorial Central Committee.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gen-gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, it happens to be my good fortune to be a member of the Committee on Territories. I frankly confess I do not know a lot about Hawaii from observation, but I am for this bill because it is a bill requested by the President of the United States.

I submit to you if the President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt, can be trusted to control the destinies of agriculture, if he can be entrusted by this Congress to control the destinies of industry, if he can be entrusted with all the broad, vast powers with which we have clothed him, then surely he can be entrusted to appoint a Governor of Hawaii who will be competent, capable, and fearless. He appoints the Governor now, even though he must be a resident of Hawaii. This is an important military post or point of vantage to the United States. Who is better able to judge, who is more capable to select, than this great President of ours, who is giving the country a new deal, Franklin D. Roosevelt?

I think we should support this measure and wave aside the arguments that may be made against it, if for no other reason than that the President deems it vitally necessary; that he considers it positively vital to the welfare of Hawaii itself, and he should be given broad powers and latitude to select whomever he deems to be best fitted for that high position.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I only have 3 minutes. I cannot yield.

I repeat, we have entrusted the President with almost unlimited power. We went along with him on the so-called "Economy Act". We went along with our friend, Mr. McKEOWN, from Oklahoma, on a measure which the gentleman said was a Presidential measure. This, my friends, is a measure which the President of the United States has deemed of sufficient importance to send to the Congress of the United States a special message, so that there will be no question in the mind of anybody.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I cannot yield.

I want to urge all of you Members who want to support the President, who are continually standing in the well of this House and waving the flag and shouting "Follow the President", to support the President on this measure which he asks you to pass. [Applause.]

The best argument in favor of this bill is the fact that the Chief Executive of this Nation, who is also the Chief Executive for the Territory of Hawaii, considers it necessary that he be free to pick the best man for the job whether he be a citizen of Hawaii or a citizen of the United States.

The United States has complete Territorial jurisdiction over Hawaii. It is invested with all the sovereign jurisdiction which a nation has over its territorial possessions and waters and over all personnel or property within them. As has been stated on this floor, two political factions diametrically opposed to each other in politics, in principles, and in practices are in existence in Hawaii. They operate and function much as do the two major political parties of the United States, with this exception—they do not vote for their chief executive; hence when an appointment for Governor is made from the ranks of the one faction, the other faction is naturally displeased and incensed, friction follows, most disagreeable and annoying to say the least. No one is better acquainted with this situation, no one is more familiar with the intrigue and plotting and maladministration that may take place than the President of the United States, who is also the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. It is now his prerogative to appoint the Governor of Hawaii. Do not handicap him, do not hamstring him, do not tie his hands by forcing him to make his selection from those only who have lived in or adopted this Territory as their home and legal residence.

It is natural that some of the people affected by this act and new order of choosing a Governor are objecting to the procedure. In every major piece of legislation some of the people affected object, and many of them most strenuously. For instance, witness the effects of the administration of the so-called "Economy Act." Members of this House daily are importuned by those affected to use their best efforts to urge that the administration of the law will be made less drastic than at present. I myself receive dozens of letters every day from World War veterans, Spanish War veterans, and even widows of Civil War veterans who face the zero hour, having received notice that their pensions, their compensation, and disability allowances representing their income, their daily bread, their all, will be taken away from them or reduced most drastically on July 1, 1933.

The taxpayers of this country have been affected adversely by the huge loans of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the tottering banks, bankrupted railroads, heartless insurance companies, and 36-percent loan sharks, yet those complaining taxpayers are compelled to stagger along under the tremendous burden of taxation.

This bill really needs no lengthy explanation. The executive power of the Territory of Hawaii is vested in a Governor. "Governor" means merely that which the word implies, namely, a person appointed to govern a Province or Territory; one who governs or, as in the United States in each of the various States, the person elected as chief executive in a State. The old act, section 66 of the Hawaiian Organic Act, as amended:

That the executive power of the government of the Territory of Hawaii shall be vested in a Governor, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and shall hold office for 4 years and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President. He shall be not less than 35 years of age; shall be a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii; shall have resided therein for at least 3 years next preceding his appointment; shall be commander in chief of the militia thereof; and may grant pardons or reprieves for offenses against the laws of the said Territory and reprieves for offenses against the laws of the United States until the decision of the President is made known thereon.

The law as amended under H.R. 5767 will read:

The executive power of the government of the Territory of Hawaii shall be vested in a Governor, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and shall hold office for 4 years and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President. He shall be not less than 35 years of age; shall be a citizen of the United States; shall be commander in chief of the militia of Hawaii; and may grant pardons or reprieves for offenses against the laws of the United States until the decision of the President is made known thereon.

It will be thus readily observed that this amendment merely effectuates the desire of the President that the Governor of Hawaii shall be a citizen of the United States, instead of a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii, and leaves the President unfettered and unbound, free to use his best judgment and pick a man from either the islands themselves or someone among the 120,000,000 people of the United States of America.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I want to address myself for a few moments to the bill introduced by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN], H.R. 5884, to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto. The gentleman in charge of time on the minority side was courteous enough to give me time, but the gentleman from Oklahoma requested a vote before I was recognized.

I expect to vote for this bill, not because it is perfect but because it is one of the many amendments to the National Bankruptcy Act that should be adopted by this Congress to preserve the rights and property of thousands and thousands of our citizens who are having their property legally confiscated by the money lenders and Shylocks of the country. The gentleman from Oklahoma states that the Bankruptcy Act as now written will save the farmer from being foreclosed by the mortgagee. He says that it will acccomplish the same purpose as will my bill (H.R. 5237) which was introduced on this floor April 25. I must take issue with the gentleman on this point. I maintain that the National Bankruptcy Act as now written does not protect the harassed property owner from having his property confiscated. It provides that his property will be saved only when a majority of his creditors reach an agreement to scale down his debts or to extend his time. If it accomplishes the purposes the gentleman claims for it, then why are 3,000 farmers and home owners being set out in the country roads and the city streets every day? I cannot for the life of me understand why the Committee on the Judiciary has not reported my bill favorably as a companion measure. They all want to save the farmer and the home owner, I am sure. Then why do they not support this measure?

In my bill there are no "ifs" or "whens." The property owner is not thrown on the tender mercies of the unscrupulous money lender. Under the bill we say that when a real-estate owner cannot pay his taxes, interest, or principal to the mortgagee, then he automatically becomes a bankrupt for the purpose of this act only. The mortgagee or any other creditor can then proceed against him only through the bankruptcy courts. If undeterred then, these Shylocks do go ahead and try to dispossess the mortgagor, then under the provisions of my bill we authorize any court of record in the United States to enjoin the mortgagee from further proceedings for the period of 1 year, until the property owner can refinance his property through the provisions of the Farm or Home Mortgage Acts of 1933, which carry appropriations of $4,000,000,000 to save American homes and farms. The following letters are typical of the many hundreds received from all sections of the United States supporting my bill. These people are at a loss to understand why Congress fails to act on this most important of all humanitarian measures.

PROPERTY OWNERS ASSOCIATION,
FORMERLY MINNEAPOLIS ASSOCIATION OF APARTMENT OWNERS,
Minneapolis, Minn., June 3, 1933.

Hon. CHARLES V. TRUAX,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. TRUAX: Our congratulations. Your bill providing for a year's suspension on the foreclosure of mortgages on farms, homes, and other real estate is one of the most commendable measures of relief yet to be effected for the suffering, down-trodden property owner.

This association is in accord with your measure to the *n*th degree. You, as well as the other Congressmen from the Middle West, have indicated broad judgment in introducing for the home owner this vitally important measure of relief. We represent over $100,000,000 worth of real-property owners, and have worked night and day for the past 3 months in securing for them a similar mortgage-suspension payment. We are the sponsors of the 2-year moratorium mortgage payment law in this State, which was recently held unconstitutional by one of our very sympathetic (?) lower-court jurists. At the present time we are optimistic in our hopes that our State supreme court, to whom we appeal the case, will find a decision in favor of the much-suppressed home and property owners.

We believe precisely as you have outlined in your bill that in this time of national emergency steps should be taken at once by the Government to retard this wholesale dispossessing of property owners from their homes and apartments; this horrible loss of life savings of thousands of people through the predatory plundering of these mortgage-loan companies. The situation has become so serious in this Commonwealth that we have thought it necessary to draft a letter to the President, a copy of which we are enclosing, pleading for his assistance and consideration toward effecting relief as speedily as possible.

Anything we can do to assist in helping you and your colleagues put your outstanding bill into effect will be a distinct pleasure as well as a duty. Don't fail to call on us at any time. Our support is yours whole-heartedly. Over $100,000,000 worth of real-property owners in this State are behind you pulling for your success. We are confident you will win. Please accept our vote of thanks.

Respectfully,

PROPERTY OWNERS ASSOCIATION OF MINNESOTA,
H. S. GOLDIE, Secretary.

4728 MATHIS STREET,
Cincinnati, Ohio, June 2, 1933.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States, Washington, D.C.

DEAR PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT: I am writing you in the interest of that large group of home owners (of which I am one) who because of the economic situation find themselves faced today with the loss of their homes through mortgage foreclosures unless Federal action prevents.

We have been looking forward hopefully and expectantly to the final passage of the home-owners-relief measure, but there are many rumors current today that the building-and-loan associations here in Cincinnati are organizing and will refuse to accept 4-percent Government bonds in payment of mortgages, if and when this relief bill becomes a law, as most of the present mortgages carry a much higher rate of interest, some running as high as 8 percent, I am told.

Will these moneyed interests be allowed to take the last dollar of the hard-pressed home owner to pay their excessive interest charges, and then, when they cannot pay the interest, take his home, which in most instances represents the entire savings of the individual?

Is there not some way of making it mandatory on the part of the building-and-loan associations and other mortgage holders to accept 4-percent Government bonds in exchange for mortgages, or of making them reduce their interest rates to 5 percent?

We sincerely appreciate your efforts in behalf of this much-needed Federal relief, and we are depending on you to make this relief effective.

Sincerely yours,

GRACE D. RICHMOND.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT].

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it is well to remember that the Territory of Hawaii was not acquired by conquest or purchase, but was the result of the meeting of minds of two independent governments, resulting in an agreed annexation.

Annexation was first officially considered in 1854, when a treaty with that as its objective was drawn up and signed by the officials of both nations, but failed of ratification by the United States Senate, because it provided for the admission of Hawaii as a State. The drafts of the treaty show that attempts were made to persuade Hawaiian officials, especially the king, to accept the status of a Territory, but this they refused to do. This treaty failed of ratification, but the project of annexation was kept alive. The United States often demonstrated its interest in and a protecting attitude toward Hawaii.

President Abraham Lincoln said of Hawaii in 1864 in a letter to Elisha Allen, envoy extraordinary from the United States to Hawaii:

> Its people are free, and its laws, language, and religion are largely the fruit of our own teachings and examples.

This is a strong statement of the attitude of the United States at that time toward the government created by the people of Hawaii. It certainly was not contemplated by President Lincoln to annex Hawaii and give it a less free government than it then had or now has.

In 1875 a step nearer to annexation was taken by the two countries by a reciprocity treaty, which was signed that year and went into effect the following year.

The island government remained in the hands of the natives of the island under a monarchial form until 1893, when a successful revolution, headed by Sanford Ballard Dole, overthrew the monarchy and caused the establishment of the republic. Negotiations for annexations were at once opened by both countries along the lines similar to the treaty of 1854. President Harrison, in his message transmitting the treaty to the Senate, February 15, 1893, said:

> Only two courses are now open: One, the establishment of a protectorate by the United States, and the other annexation, full and complete. I think the latter course, which has been adopted in the treaty, will be highly promotive of the best interests of the Hawaiian people, and is the only one that will adequately secure the interests of the United States.

The treaty contained the following phrase:

> Especially in view of the desire expressed by the said government of the Hawaiian Islands that these islands should be incorporated into the United States as an integral part thereof.

It is evident from these treaty stipulations, and from statements made by the Presidents of the United States and several Secretaries of State that both Nations agreed that Hawaii, if annexed, was to become an integral incorporated part of the United States; that the people of Hawaii had demonstrated their ability to govern themselves; and that after annexation the people would be more free, secure, and self-governing than they had been in the past. Indeed, this was one of the objects of annexation.

Almost immediately after the inauguration of President McKinley another important treaty was negotiated and signed June 16, 1897. The treaty said: "These islands should be incorporated into the United States as an integral part thereof." As a result, Hawaii was annexed by joint resolution of Congress, approved July 7, 1898.

The Hawaiian Islands are not merely a foreign possession of the United States, but are an integral and incorporated part thereof, and have been so defined by decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

Following annexation the United States initiated in the islands the usual American form of government, and it is modeled after the governments of most of the American States.

For more than 30 years the Territory has been operating under the American form of government, happily, patriotically, and successfully.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. HOOPER. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that in the island of Hawaii, an island the size of the State of Rhode Island, there has been but one murder in the past 25 years?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. I understand that to be the fact.

The Territory, through taxation, raises money to defray all ordinary expenses. It supports excellent public schools for its 90,000 children who are subject to compulsory education along strictly American lines. Its university is attended by 2,000 students.

The various activities of the Territory are maintained just as the States carry on such activities, and cost about $12,000,000 a year. In the middle of the year 1932, while many of the States and municipalities on the mainland were in difficulty, Hawaii struck a balance and found that with all bills paid she had $5,000,000 in cash on hand and $5,000,000 more in liquid bonds. In addition to her Territorial taxes, it was shown that during the previous year Hawaii had also contributed to the Federal Government $5,375,000 in income and custom taxes. A balancing of the books between the Territory of Hawaii and the Federal Government showed that during the preceding 30 years it had sent to Washington $175,000,000, while the Federal Government had spent upon activities that might be properly charged up against the Territory, about $32,000,000, leaving a net profit to the Federal Government of some $149,000,000 in taxes received from the islands. Thus, the islands have not been an expense to the Government of the United States, but have yielded a direct, handsome cash profit. The record of self-government that Hawaii has made in more than 3 decades of Territorial life, from every aspect, has been an enviable one. It is safe to say that its institutions compare favorably with those of the half dozen more progressive States on the mainland. Within the short period of 30 years, it has developed itself into one of the most important subdivisions of the United States.

At this time to change its organic act, to change its form of government, to set up a dictatorship over the islands in violation of the spirit of the treaty negotiations, in violation of the spirit of the articles of annexation without giving its people a chance to be heard, and in opposition to the expression of its legislature, and over the protest of its duly elected representative here in this House is an autocratic and an un-American procedure.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, this is a proposal to change the fundamental law of a Territory in order to permit the President of the United States to make a political appointment of a character that has for 33 years been prohibited by that fundamental law.

It is a proposal to repeal a portion of the Organic Act of Hawaii in order to permit the President to appoint as Governor of that Territory a nonresident.

I understand the appointment is to be made immediately. The appointee is to be selected from the continental United States. There can be no question about that. The President intends, if given this authority, to put it into effect at once and to send to Hawaii as Governor a person who is a stranger to the people of that Territory. This he intends to do without the consent of the people there and in disregard of the formal protest of the Legislature of Hawaii filed with the Congress.

Now, whatever of merit there may be to this proposal, and I leave the discussion of that to others, if they know, the fact remains, and I do not see how it can be contradicted, that in passing this resolution you are repudiating a solemn covenant which was entered into by the Government of the United States and the Republic of Hawaii when the treaty of annexation was effected more than 30 years ago.

It is true the Organic Act of Hawaii is not a constitution, but it is the nearest thing that the people of a Territory can have to a constitution. The organic act of a Territory is the law which guarantees to the people of that Territory the kind and character of government under which they are to live; and the only fundamental difference between the organic act of a Territory and the constitution of a State is that the constitution of a State may be changed only by action of the people of the State themselves, while the organic act of a Territory may be changed without the consent of the people of that Territory by an act of Congress. I think on account of this fact Congress should be very, very careful in changing a fundamental portion of the organic act of a Territory which guarantees to the people of that Territory a specific right.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DOUGLASS].

Mr. DOUGLASS. Mr. Speaker, the fact the President has sent a special message on this matter shows it is of great moment. The very first words to us in his message are these:

> It is particularly necessary to select for the post of Governor of Hawaii a man of experience and vision who will be regarded by all citizens of the island as one who will be absolutely impartial in his decisions of matters as to which there may be a difference of local opinion.

After all, Mr. Speaker, Hawaii is a Territory of the United States and it is the most important Territory or insular possession of the United States because our Government would not have accepted it unless we had needed it for purposes of national defense. In considering this request of the President, it should be remembered that the greatest portion of the population of Hawaii is Asiatic; that one third of the population is Japanese; that we have in the Hawaiian Islands one of the biggest military establishments in our defense system, and we have there one of the greatest naval harbors intended for our national defense—Pearl Harbor. We have these defenses there for a purpose which need not be elaborated upon at this time. I think any American who knows what is going on in foreign affairs has the idea.

The President of the United States knows what is going on and he knows what may transpire. As the Chief Executive of this Nation charged with the solemn responsibility of protecting our Pacific coast from possible attack he asks for this authority, Mr. Speaker, to appoint a man either from the Islands or from the mainland as he chooses, who shall be an American patriot with the American viewpoint. When the President of the United States asks an American Congress for this power, a patriotic American Congress should give it to him in this crucial hour. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELTSE].

Mr. ELTSE of California. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, in the name of justice, democratic liberty, and fair play in the new deal, I arise to address you.

The preamble to the Federal Constitution provides:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

With every breath I emphasize the purposes expressed in that preamble: (1) In order to establish justice; (2) insure domestic tranquillity; (3) promote the general welfare; (4) and secure the blessings of liberty, we ordain and establish this Constitution.

Upon the voluntary request of the people of Hawaii, the islands were annexed to the United States on July 7, 1898. These people then sought, as they have ever since sought, the protection afforded by the Constitution, the laws, and the power and prestige of the United States. They have enjoyed that protection and 35 years of brotherhood and friendliness in the family of States and Territories comprising the Nation. They have felt secure under the mantle of justice and liberty which our Government threw over them. The Bill of Rights—the Magna Carta—guaranteeing the rights of these people is to be found in the organic act providing for the government for the Territory of Hawaii. This act was approved by the President on April 30, 1900. Section 5 of the original act provided:

> That the Constitution, and * * * all the laws of the United States * * * shall have the same force and effect within said Territory or elsewhere in the United States.

Section 4 of the original act defined citizenship and provided, among other things, that all citizens of the United States who were residents there on August 12, 1898—

> And all the citizens of the United States who shall hereafter reside in the Territory of Hawaii for 1 year shall be citizens of the Territory of Hawaii.

Note that the residence required was 1 year.

Section 66 of the original act dealt with the Executive power, and provided that the Governor should be appointed by the President, and—

> Shall be a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii; shall be commander in chief of the militia thereof; may grant pardons or reprieves for offenses against the laws of the said Territory. * * *

Under this section no one could be Governor unless he had been a citizen for at least 1 year.

On July 9, 1921, section 66 of the act was amended to require and provide that the Governor—

> Shall have resided therein (meaning Hawaii) for at least 3 years next preceding his appointment.

The demand and necessity for this amendment requiring 3 years' residence instead of 1, as a prerequisite to governorship, was mostly occasioned by the extreme dissatisfaction growing out of the carpetbagging practices and misrule of former Gov. L. E. Pinkham. That gentleman was appointed by President Wilson, and it subsequently developed that he had not maintained a bona fide residence in the islands for the requisite time prior to his appointment, and that upon his induction into office he immediately proceeded to dispense patronage to his personal friends in a manner after the fashion of the worst carpetbagger of reconstruction days.

Congress has twice decided that the Governor of Hawaii should be appointed from among her own citizens. The people of Hawaii, through a concurrent resolution of its legislature recently passed, voice vigorous opposition to any change in the residence qualifications of the Governor. Notwithstanding, Congress is now asked to amend the organic act permitting the appointment to be made from among the citizens of the islands or from the entire United States. It is perfectly obvious that the appointment is to be given to a resident of the mainland, else the power would not be sought.

This Government which mantles the various States of the Union and the Territories is a democratic, representative government. Its essence is one of autonomy and self-rule. Are we now to say to the people of the Commonwealth of Hawaii, "You are no longer fit to rule yourselves—we shall take this power away from you." Are they to be told that the Constitution is just another scrap of paper; that in order to establish justice their autonomy must be taken away from them by the appointment of a Governor not from their own people; that in order to insure domestic tranquillity they must have an outside commander in chief of their militia, an outsider who alone can grant pardons or reprieves for offenses against their own laws? Are they to be told that the only way they can "secure the blessings of liberty" is to have a carpetbagger from the mainland appointed their feudal overlord?

My Constitution, the Constitution of the United States and of the people of Hawaii, in the words of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON], may be dressed "with the silver buckles, the long stockings, and powdered wigs of 150 years ago", but it is still the living, dynamic Constitution of every liberty-loving citizen of the United States and of its Territories, not the least—the Commonwealth of Hawaii.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, the people of Hawaii do not want the passage of this bill, the Chamber of Commerce of Hawaii is opposed to it, the Legislature of Hawaii is opposed to it, and the only thing that has been offered on the affirmative side in favor of this bill is a simple request of the President of the United States, without a single iota of fact or evidence to support it.

LINCOLN MCCANDLESS, the Delegate from Hawaii, has lived there for 51 years. His family is there, his brothers are there, his money and his property are there, and he has been a lifelong Democrat, and if I were a consistent, loyal Democrat I would rather take the word of LINCOLN MCCANDLESS, the Delegate from Hawaii, on this matter than I would the President of the United States, who is uninformed and comes here with a mere, simple patronage request. Let me also say this: You know from the public prints that the man who is to be appointed Governor of Hawaii is Judge Ben Lindsey, of Denver, one time juvenile judge, later disbarred by the Supreme Court of Colorado, and now out in Los Angeles, Calif. As a good Republican I ought to be selfish enough not to say it, because he was a progressive Republican at one time, and yet he is the man who is slated for this job, and when you look at the President's message and his request for a man of "experience and vision", can you say that Ben B. Lindsey, whose life has been devoted to juvenile work, is a man of experience, is a man of vision to deal with an island, one third of whose population is Japanese?

It seems to me that the demand of the President of the United States and the substance of the message are contradictory. So I prefer to follow the ideas of LINCOLN MCCANDLESS, the Delegate from Hawaii, whose interests are there and who loves Hawaii, who wants to see it prosper and wants to see progress made in the islands. In this particular matter I would rather follow him than I would the President of the United States, who is not particularly informed on the matter. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not view this bill with the alarm that my Republican colleague seems to view it. I believe the United States has done a good part toward Hawaii, and Hawaii is a most valued and loyal Territory. America thinks much of Hawaii. This does not necessarily mean taking power away from the Hawaiians. It merely gives the President authority and power to appoint someone residing on the mainland or residing in Hawaii, for the best interests of the Hawaiian Islands and for the best interests of the Government. I am deeply interested in the people of Hawaii and I believe their interest can well be served by thus permitting the President wide latitude in selecting their Governor.

The President believes he should have this authority at this time, and for one I will cheerfully give it to him. I am glad to trust the President to select the best man for Governor of Hawaii. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States can appoint a resident of Hawaii, if he wants to, under this bill. But conditions might cause him to prefer to appoint someone else.

The United States of America is responsible for Hawaii. We Americans have the right, under the treaty and the organic act, to provide, as we are doing in this bill, for the President of the United States to select as Governor of Hawaii the man whom he thinks can properly preserve law and order there. A Governor with poor judgment could involve us seriously.

I have always heard that there are two distinct factions there fighting at each other's throats. If the President appoints as the Governor a man from one of those factions the other faction would be against him, and vice versa.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; certainly, to my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. And one faction is in favor of the gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. MCCANDLESS] for Governor.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, that may be; and while I am a friend of our colleague [Mr. MCCANDLESS] because he is a good fellow, I am also for this bill. Why has not the President the same right to appoint a man from the mainland as Governor of Hawaii the same as he has to appoint a resident here as Governor General of the Philippines?

A MEMBER. Or Alaska.

Mr. BLANTON. Of course, the situation is a little different as to Alaska, because we purchased Alaska and Hawaii came in voluntarily. But the President now can and does appoint a Governor General of the Philippines from the mainland.

I call the attention of my friend from Hawaii to the fact that Albert Burleson appointed Macadam, a distinguished newspaper man from that press gallery up there, as postmaster general of Honolulu, and he was from the mainland. He went down there and served the country well. It was asserted from the other side of the aisle, by our Republican friends who are fighting this bill, that the author of Companionate Marriage is to be appointed Governor. I do not believe it. I have such confidence in our President of the United States that I do not believe he would consider for one moment such a man. For this position we want an outstanding man of good judgment, poise, and sagacity. No Ben Lindseys will be appointed.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY].

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think this question is not one of patronage. I think the question goes deeper than that. It is a question of local self-government. I do not know what kind of Democrats they have in Mississippi and Ohio, but I cannot imagine that either of those gentlemen from those States who are on the committee would go around campaigning in their States opposed to local self-government.

In 1917 and 1918 we went to war, and one of the reasons was that we were told we were fighting for self-government by small countries. The kind of Democrats I have always known have favored local self-government, and I think this is entirely a question of local self-government. The people of Hawaii are entitled to a man in their own Territory. The last Congress passed a bill that would grant independence to the Philippine Islands, and now you are reversing yourselves in taking away independence from the people of Hawaii. A true Democrat, believing in the rights of people to govern themselves, cannot support a measure like this.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ARENS].

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee, I voted against reporting this bill.

The conditions that brought about a union between the people of the United States and Hawaii in 1898 were drafted by a committee of 5 members—3 were appointed by the United States and 2 were appointed by the Republic of Hawaii. These five drew up the organic act whereby they joined the United States.

It is my contention now that we have no right to change the organic act without the consent of the Hawaiians who had a part in drafting it. I do not believe we should govern any Territory without the consent of the governed. The Legislature of Hawaii unanimously passed a resolution opposing this measure. I believe that the will of Hawaii as expressed by its legislature should prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY] speaks of local self-government. That question is not involved here, for the reason that the President has the power to appoint a governor now from the Territory of Hawaii. Local self-government involves the question of electing a governor or a person who is to do the governing.

So far as annexation is concerned, that application was made by Americans who had gone over there and who had taken the islands away from the natives. That is how they got into the United States.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] talks about carpetbag government. He undertakes to compare this with conditions in the South. There is no comparison whatsoever. The truth of it is that conditions grew so bad under carpetbag government in the South that the people rose up and threw it off, and under the conditions in Hawaii, they have become such that the President is asking for this right in order to correct some of those conditions.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. No. I am going to answer now what the gentleman said about repudiation. Any uninformed Member of the House would have thought, from what the gentleman said, that we are repudiating a treaty with Hawaii. There is not a word in the treaty between us and Hawaii as to how the Governor shall be selected. It is only this organic law that we are amending.

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. McCANDLESS. Is it not true that the organic act passed in 1900 contained a provision that the Governor should have a residence there of 1 year?

Mr. RANKIN. But that was changed in 1921, and it is going to be changed again in 1933.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Inasmuch as the organic law of the Territory of Hawaii restricts the appointment of the Governor to a man who is a resident of Hawaii, and this amendment proposes to take off that restriction, how can the gentleman say that the question of self-government is not involved?

Mr. RANKIN. That is not the question involved here. He may appoint a Governor from over there, but he is not going to allow the two factions there quarreling with one another to dictate to him whom he shall appoint Governor of Hawaii. Not only that, but there are other questions. Every Member of the House knows, as the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DOUGLASS] has pointed out, that this is the most remote outpost, the western outpost of the United States. It is a very vital point for the maintenance of our security at times. The President is charged with the duty of seeing what goes on in Hawaii, just as he is in seeing what goes on in continental United States. He is charged with a duty, and a higher duty, if you please, than that of even the Governor of a State; because in dealing with these great questions there is involved not only the safety and welfare of the people of Hawaii, but the safety and welfare of the American people as well. He is not captious about this matter. Understanding his duty, understanding his responsibility, understanding the conditions there as no man in the House possibly understands them, understanding world conditions, understanding our situation, he has asked us to give him this authority; and I trust that every Member of the House will vote to give it to him, in order that he may pick the best man for the governorship of Hawaii, taking into consideration his responsibility to the people of that island as well as his responsibility to the people of continental United States.

I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. All time has expired. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendment.

The question was taken.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 222, nays 114, answered "present" 1, not voting 93, as follows:

Mr. Durgan of Indiana with Mr. Foulkes.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. McGUGIN, was unavoidably absent when this vote was taken by reason of having been called as a witness in one of the courts in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MUSSELWHITE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce the absence of the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. HART, on account of illness.

Mr. HENNEY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. HUGHES, of Wisconsin, is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Pursuant to the applause upon the Republican side over their defeat of a bill sent here by the President, I want to ask the Chair—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BLANTON. I have a right to make a parliamentary inquiry, and cries of "regular order" from Republicans over there will not stop me.

I want to ask the Chair if it is not a fact that it will be in order for the Committee on Rules to bring this same bill in under a rule tomorrow, so that we can then pass it with a majority vote?

Mr. SNELL. Does not the gentleman know the rules?

Mr. RANKIN. We will have a rule on the bill tomorrow.

Mr. BLANTON. And we will have you Republicans vote on it again; and we will pass it, in spite of Republican opposition.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was rejected, and lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Texas takes precedence, of course. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was rejected and lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. If that motion is carried, then the Rules Committee nevertheless will be able to bring in a rule tomorrow to take that bill up when it can be passed by a majority vote?

The SPEAKER. The Rules Committee can bring in a bill suspending the rules.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON].

The motion was agreed to.

ENTRY ON OIL RESERVES FOR GRAZING PURPOSES

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 604) amending section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes", approved December 29, 1916 (ch. 9, par. 1, 39 Stat. 862), and as amended February 28, 1931 (ch. 328, 46 Stat. 1454).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DEROUEN]?

Mr. McFADDEN. Reserving the right to object, I would like the gentleman to explain what the bill provides.

Mr. DEROUEN. I shall be glad to do that.

This bill is to amend the act of 1916. It has to do with that section of the Stock Raising Homestead Act of 1916, as amended by the act of February 1931. The only change made by this act is that it permits stock-raising people to make entry on those lands reserved in the oil-producing sections, but goes no further. That is all it does. I shall be very glad to answer any questions so that the House may understand it.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEROUEN. I yield.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. This is S. 604, which the committee unanimously reported, is it not?

Mr. DEROUEN. It was unanimously reported by the House Public Lands Committee. It has passed the Senate unanimously and is now before the House for final action.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEROUEN. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. Does this bill make any change in the law as far as the question of reserving the oil, gas, and mineral rights to the Government is concerned?

Mr. DEROUEN. Not at all. Those are all reserved.

Mr. HOPE. It does not relax the restrictions?

Mr. DEROUEN. No; not at all. It simply makes it permissible for stock raising on those lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DEROUEN]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes", approved December 29, 1916 (ch. 9, par. 1, 39 Stat. 862), and as amended February 28, 1931 (ch. 328, 46 Stat. 1454), be amended to read as follows:

"From and after December 29, 1916, it shall be lawful for any person qualified to make entry under the homestead laws of the United States to make a stock-raising homestead entry for not exceeding 640 acres of unappropriated unreserved public lands in reasonably compact form: Provided, however, That the land so entered shall theretofore have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as 'stock-raising lands': Provided further, That for the purposes of this section lands withdrawn or reserved solely as valuable for oil or gas shall not be deemed to be appropriated or reserved: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to naval petroleum reserves and naval oil-shale reserves: And provided further, That should said lands be within the limits of the geological structure of a producing oil or gas field, entry can only be allowed, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, in the absence of objection after due notice by the lessee or permittee, and any patent therefor shall contain a reservation to the United States of all minerals in said lands and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LIMITATIONS ON SECTIONS 109 AND 113 OF THE CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution (S.J.Res. 54) limiting the operations of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code, as amended.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That nothing in sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code (U.S.C., title 18, secs. 198 and 203) or any other act of Congress forbidding any person in the employ of the United States from acting as attorney or agent for another before any department (other than the Department of Agriculture) or branch of the Government, or from receiving pay for so acting, shall be deemed to apply to any counsel or other officer of the Department of Agriculture if designated by the Secretary of Agriculture at the time of appointment as entitled to the benefits of this resolution: Provided, That not more than one person shall be so designated.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, for the present I demand a second.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, the sole purpose of this resolution is to permit the Department of Agriculture to utilize the services of Frederic Lee, who was for many years one of the draftsmen for the House and Senate, and who assisted in preparing and shaping legislation. He is now a member of a law firm in Washington. He cannot afford to accept regular employment from the Department, because that would necessitate his foregoing his practice for a period of 2 years.

The Department is very anxious to utilize his services and his experience for a limited period, at least until such time as they can get their machinery working and get the Farm Act in operation. I think it would be a very great assistance to anyone who might be charged with the duty of administering the Farm Act. I am sure that the services of Mr. Lee would be more valuable in getting the program started than anyone who had not had his experience.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Of course, it has been a principle that has been very carefully guarded by Congress for a great many years, that no man should be allowed to practice and bring claims against the Government who is drawing pay from the Government.

Mr. JONES. That is correct, but there is no intention to do away with that principle.

Mr. SNELL. Because it gives him, of course, a great advantage over other men.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. And this has always been very carefully guarded. If you start breaking it down you are going to be asked to have this exception made by other departments.

For instance, a member of the Department of Justice called me this morning and said they had some matters which made it very important that such an exception be made for that department that we are asked to make for the Department of Agriculture at the present time.

Now, if we are going to do it for one, we ought to do it for both.

It is simply a question whether we are going to maintain the principle that Congress has so carefully guarded and believes is so important for the welfare of the Public Treasury.

Mr. JONES. I may say to the gentleman from New York that I am opposed to breaking down the principle. I think the principle should be maintained, but there come times when an unusual situation calls for an unusual procedure.

When Mr. Pomerene and Mr. Roberts, who is at the present time on the Supreme Court, were employed, it was found necessary to pass an identically similar resolution. I understand the same sort of resolution was passed in the Huston Thompson case some years ago. So there is precedent for this type of resolution.

Now, Mr. Lee probably knows more about the farm bill and its mechanics than anyone else who might be obtained. His services cannot be obtained if he is to be regularly employed. He does not particularly care about the employment, but he is willing to serve temporarily if this exception can be made.

The department itself has asked him to serve and is very desirous of utilizing his services.

As the gentleman knows, it will be a very hard job anyway to handle this great farm program.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. I want to endorse what the gentleman from New York has said.

It has been the understanding in Congress, with possibly one or two exceptions to which the gentleman has referred, that men who work for the Government and draw a salary or fees from the Government shall not at the same time be permitted to practice in the departments against the Government, and I think this is a splendid policy.

I have not made any objection to this bill on account of the interest of the gentleman, but I heard this morning that the Department of Justice was asking for the same privilege. I do not know why they want it, because they have not communicated with me; but I immediately said that, so far as this bill was concerned, that while I had stated to the gentleman from Texas that I would interpose no objection if it was proposed to bring it up under unanimous consent so that it could be amended, then I was going to object to it because I think Congress ought to be jealous of this policy that has been established.

I do not question what the gentleman from Texas has said with reference to the value of the services of Mr. Lee; but it is asking a great deal for us to believe that there is no one else anywhere whose services could be obtained who would not render just as valuable service as Mr. Lee.

I do think that Congress ought to stop passing this kind of bills. So far as I am concerned, if there is any other effort made to pass a bill similar to this applying to other departments, so far as my vote is concerned, it is going to be recorded against it. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I am in hearty accord with the sentiment expressed; but this, Mr. Chairman, is a somewhat complicated measure. We all know, of course, there are others who could be obtained who could do this work; but I think any member of either the House or the Senate committee who has had opportunity to know Mr. Lee's work will say he would rather have him with his experience in this particular type of legislation than any other man, at least until the program is started.

I believe it would be economy to make this exception, and I have limited the Senate resolution so that this particular case is the only one that can be handled by the Department.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman, of course, would admit that in any future practice Mr. Lee and his firm here in Washington would have a very great advantage, especially in practicing before the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. JONES. No; the Department of Agriculture is excepted.

Mr. SNELL. Yes, for a limited time; but they would likewise have a great advantage in any of the other departments.

Mr. JONES. We have provided in the resolution that he may not practice before the Department of Agriculture for 2 years.

Mr. SNELL. He will later on.

Mr. JONES. He would have to wait until 2 years have elapsed.

Mr. SNELL. But perhaps 3 years from now important matters may be pending before that Department and his firm would have the advantage.

Mr. JONES. I am in favor of the principle, I may say to the gentleman from New York. But the application of the farm bill involves a vast untried field. I do not want it to be handicapped in any way.

Mr. SNELL. What is the gentleman going to do with the Department of Justice, which is going to ask for a similar privilege?

Mr. JONES. The majority leader has just stated that he would not permit this bill to come up by unanimous consent for fear it might be broadened, and that he is opposed to extending it.

Everyone knows this is a tremendous task that the Farm Administrator will have in administering the act which has been passed. I believe it will be rather captious for us to say as a Congress that when the Secretary of Agriculture and the Administrator himself are very anxious to have the services for the time of the man who sat in and helped draft this complicated piece of legislation, especially with the limitation we have placed in the resolution, not to pass it and give every opportunity that may be had for that measure and its administration to be a success.

Mr. SNELL. Your own Attorney General is coming before you with the same kind of a proposition, that the man he wants to appoint for specific work is absolutely necessary to carry it out; and that man cannot take it unless this exception is made because he also has other practice here in the city of Washington.

Mr. JONES. We have made exceptions before in special cases for that Department. We made an exception in the Pomerene case and in the Roberts case for that Department in a much more important measure involving much larger compensation than is suggested today in behalf of the Department of Agriculture. Those men were paid much larger fees than this man can possibly be paid on the terms of this resolution.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. It is my understanding we appropriate about $100,000 for the legislative drafting service of the House and Senate. Congress is expected to adjourn in a few days. Why would it not be possible to utilize the services of some of these gentlemen who are now on the pay roll—Mr. Beaman, for instance? This gentleman for a long time was an understudy of Mr. Beaman.

Mr. JONES. As the gentleman knows, those men have assignments all through the summer, perhaps enough to carry them through the time Congress is not in session; and that does not meet the situation, because this is the man the Department wants. He is familiar with the legislation, and his services are desired by the Department, and I think we ought to let the Department have them.

Mr. SHANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SHANNON. Has not this man appeared repeatedly before the Committee on Agriculture as a hired attorney for interests seeking legislation?

Mr. JONES. He has appeared representing certain people, as any other attorney would, but at the same time he is not representing them at the present time.

Mr. SHANNON. I understand that, but it was with respect to legislation of this kind.

Mr. JONES. I assume many lawyers have done that. I presume there are members of the Supreme Court who have done that.

Mr. SHANNON. Is it not unique that this man should have appeared for years before your committee and now somebody wants him in the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. JONES. Oh, no.

Mr. SHANNON. Why not let those interests who have hired him heretofore engage him now?

Mr. JONES. No; the gentleman is in error. This man for years was a member of the legislative drafting service and was only for a brief period of time employed by certain cooperative organizations to assist them in presenting their matters.

Mr. SHANNON. But he has been employed in the past with respect to such legislation.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SHANNON. And now they wish the law enforced and they want their attorney to go into the Department.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; he is not their attorney.

Mr. SHANNON. He was their attorney.

Mr. JONES. He was their attorney at one time, but he has not been for some months.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Can the gentleman tell us whether Mr. Lee is a Republican or a Democrat?

Mr. JONES. I understand he is a Democrat, although I could not give the gentleman very definite information about that, and I may be in error. Inasmuch as the Department which is charged with handling this tremendous problem only wants him for a limited time, I thought his other qualifications were more important.

Mr. BEAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BEAM. How long has Mr. Lee been engaged in the Government service?

Mr. JONES. He is not in the Government service at the present time; he is practicing law. It has been some 4 or 5 or 3 or 4 years since he was in the legislative drafting service of the Government.

Mr. BEAM. And now he is practicing law independently?

Mr. JONES. Yes; as a member of a firm here.

Mr. BEAM. As the gentleman knows, Mr. Lee has represented several clients before the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BEAM. At absolute variance with the program of the administration with respect to different measures.

Mr. JONES. At times, perhaps, but I do not think many times; at the same time he appeared in a certain capacity and disclosed his capacity.

Mr. BEAM. I understand that.

Mr. JONES. And appeared as a draftsman and made explanatory statements in reference to measures.

Mr. BEAM. How long does the gentleman desire his services to continue under this resolution?

Mr. JONES. That was not disclosed, but they indicated they would not be able to keep him for a great length of time. He is willing to help them to start off the work but does not want to give up his practice.

Mr. BEAM. How much expense to the Government is this going to entail?

Mr. JONES. Under the terms of the bill they could not possibly pay him a higher salary than $8,500 a year. That is the highest amount that can be paid under the bill under any circumstances.

Mr. BEAM. How much of his services does he give for this $8,500 a year?

Mr. JONES. They expect to use his services a great deal pending the time they get the bill in operation. They think he is well informed on the measure, knows its limitations, and knows its powers, and that he will be of a great deal of service to them.

Mr. BEAM. Is there any other attorney in the service that could render the committee or the Department of Agriculture the services that Mr. Lee can render?

Mr. JONES. There are, of course, plenty of men who have the ability, but it would take a man a good, long while, as the gentleman knows, since he is a member of the committee, to become as well informed on the terms of the bill and the facts essential to its successful operation as is Mr. Lee.

Mr. BEAM. I understand that and that is what I am concerned about. I am a practicing attorney myself, and I dislike very much to take any position against a practicing attorney, but I feel it is a bad precedent for the Department of Agriculture or the Committee on Agriculture to bring out a joint resolution here employing a man who formerly represented certain people, and, as the minority leader so ably said and as our majority leader also stated, to establish a precedent whereby this man, by the admission of the chairman, becomes practically indispensable to the Government service, and for one, I object to it.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is mistaken about that. This does not establish a precedent. The precedent is already established, and this man does not ask for this employment. They have gone to him and asked that he render these services.

Mr. BEAM. So far as I am concerned, I object to such a practice.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Does it not appear that out of all the hundreds of thousands of dollars we pay for attorneys in the Government service, there ought to be someone competent to handle this work? If not, does not the gentleman think we need an entire reorganization of the whole thing?

Mr. JONES. We could get someone who is capable to do this work, but it would probably cost more money, because this man has had years of experience in this particular line of work. He was the draftsman for the Committee on Agriculture when the old McNary-Haugen bills were up. He was in the Government service then and he went through all the hearings on the McNary-Haugen bills for years. He also went through the hearings on the other farm measures that were presented and he knows the underlying philosophy of the farm bills. I believe if you will ask any of the members of the Committee on Agriculture on either side of the aisle during those years they will tell you that he is an unusually capable man along this line and will be of great service for the limited time he will act. He has stated he would only act a limited time in any event.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. The gentleman does not suppose it is possible for the Republican side to know more about this particular man than we do ourselves.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Why could not the Solicitor of the Agricultural Department perform these services—it is his duty, is it not?

Mr. JONES. Of course, he could perform the services, but no doubt he has his usual duties to perform. The gentleman knows this measure will call for a great deal of extra work. They are going to have a tremendous amount of work to start this machinery. They only want it for a short time, and it seems to me they ought to have this permission. This is a tremendous proposition. The Department wants a man for the time being and for a short time only.

Mr. MILLIGAN. The gentleman does not want to leave the impression that this gentleman is indispensable?

Mr. JONES. I do not think any man is indispensable, anywhere in America, but this man is probably the best informed as to this subject, and he could go right to work. Anyone else would have to do a lot of work first.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. The gentleman stated that this man does not want to accept the job, but they are inducing him to do it. I want to state that in my district and State there are a number of lawyers who would be willing to give a lot of study to a job like this in order to get it, and they would not want a special act.

Mr. JONES. I have stated to the gentleman that the work is to be done now.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Well, they are ready to go to work now. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Kentucky may be facetious, but if he had the responsibility of administering the act, if he had the responsibility of doing something for the farmers of America, and incidentally the other people of the United States, I do not believe that if he has a proper conception of the responsibilities involved he would want to jeopardize it in any way.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill provides "that not more three such officers shall hold such exemptions." I want to ask the gentleman from Texas whether or not, if we pass this bill and exempt these three men——

Mr. JONES. The bill is limited to only one.

Mr. BLANTON. But as introduced in the Senate on May 15 it provided for three. Well, if we pass the bill for this one man, it will set a new precedent, unwise and unsalutary, for these other departments, and I do not think we should do it.

Mr. JONES. I do not think the gentleman was in the Hall a moment ago when I answered that question. The precedent has been set in the case of Mr. Pomerene, Mr. Roberts, and Huston Thompson.

Mr. BLANTON. I was in the Hall. I am in this Chamber practically all of the time. They were not attorneys for departments.

Mr. JONES. No; and this man is not an attorney for the Department. He is not a Government employee.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Is this man Mr. Frederic Lee?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. GAMBRILL. He has recently been appointed by Governor Ritchie to look after legislation for the State. I do not see how he can hold two jobs successfully.

Mr. JONES. This is only temporary. The Department is very anxious about it, and I think we ought to pass this.

Mr. BLANTON. I think that the bill extends a very unwise precedent, and I hope that it will not pass.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. I should like to ask the gentleman from Texas, who was here during the administration of President Wilson, whether or not this law was not one of the great reform measures we passed at that time?

Mr. JONES. Let me say that I am in thorough sympathy with it. That law will and should remain. For this reason we are strictly limiting the exception. It passed the Senate with 3 names, but we limit it to 1, and the only reason we are making the exception at all is on account of the tremendous responsibility that they are under to get this thing started. It takes an immense amount of work.

Mr. FOCHT. I was just wondering whether the gentleman wanted to repudiate this great progressive reform?

Mr. JONES. No; I do not. I insist upon its remaining as a part of the general laws of the land.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely opposed to breaking down this precedent at this time. There is so much unemployment in the country today that the President himself, and the gentleman at the head of the Post Office Department, who runs the jobs for the administration, say that they are going to stagger all of the employment throughout the country, and, if we are going to do that, we must not break down this important precedent that has been established for many years and pass special legislation to give two jobs to one man. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] says that this man knows more about these particular matters than any other man, and that he is almost essential. Well, for God's sake, what would happen if he should die? Is there no other man in the United States that knows anything about it? Is there no other man who can unravel this complicated legislation? Does not anyone else understand it?

Mr. JONES. This gentleman has not any job now with the Government. He is in private practice.

Mr. SNELL. Yes; and the gentleman wants to place him in a position where he not only can draw pay from the Government but also can continue in private practice and present claims against the Government. As a matter of fact, we have guarded this proposition very diligently for many years. So far as I know, Congress has been practically unanimous on this agreement. There have been one or two exceptions, but, individually, I have always opposed them. At this time, from any reason that has been presented here today, there is no possible excuse for making this exception. If you do make it today, your own Attorney General is coming in here tomorrow and is going to ask you to do exactly the same thing for him, and if you do it for the Department of Agriculture, why should you not do it for the Attorney General's Department? It is just as important for one as the other.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Can the gentleman tell us why a Democratic Attorney General would appeal to a minority leader on the Republican side rather than to a majority leader on the Democratic side?

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman will have to ask the gentleman himself. It came to me from someone in the Department. I do not even know his name. I do not make any excuses for it. If the gentleman does not like it, he can go down there and give them an order and tell them not to talk to us. It does not make any difference to me. I did not ask him and do not care. The only question before us now is whether we, without any real reason, want to break down a precedent of years and to allow this man to have this job and also engage in practice against the Government and present claims against the Government when we have so many men in Washington and in other places who have not even one job—to say nothing of two jobs for one man at the present time. It has always been understood that a man gets a terrific advantage when he helps to draw a law and is a member of the department and then prosecutes claims under the law.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I understand that in the city of Detroit alone there are 42 lawyers who are on the welfare rolls. I imagine that we could even get some from there to fill in.

Mr. SNELL. Probably you could do the same thing in every city in the United States.

I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I do not know why every day or two we are considering some bill to break down the criminal statutes of the United States. If there ever was a reason for a criminal statute to prevent certain folks who have been in the Government service from prosecuting a claim, there is reason for keeping it there now, in view of all of the confusion being created by these new bills. There are going to be claims and claims and claims. Why should we start to break down the precedent now? Have we not any respect for the integrity of the Civil Service of the United States? Have we no respect for the Government itself; for the Federal Treasury? This law was passed and put on the statute books to prevent those in the Government service from taking any advantage of that position both while in the service and afterward. I appeal to the Membership of the House to stop this thing right where it is now by refusing to suspend the rules and pass this bill. Let us defeat this and keep our record intact.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I understand this is the same fellow who has drawn all the farm bills, all the way down through the last 10 or 15 years. Is that correct?

Mr. TABER. Well, I guess he is the fellow who ought to know where the holes in the bill are, so that he could present claims.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I understand he has drawn every one for the last 15 years, or for several years.

Mr. TABER. That being true, he will know where the holes are in them just as well as anybody, and he is in the best possible position of anyone to take advantage of the Government, and I suppose that is the reason why we ought to turn things over to him and let him run them.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. If he has spent 15 years in producing flops on farm bills we ought to excuse him.

Mr. BOILEAU. But the gentleman is mistaken, because I understand the bill particularly prevents him from practicing before the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. TABER. But he can practice before other departments where claims come up—in the Treasury Department under this new agricultural bill.

Mr. BOILEAU. But he could not take any advantage under this bill.

Mr. TABER. Oh, he could take advantage of what he knows about all this situation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of repealing the criminal statutes. It is idle to talk about that. There is no higher type man than Frederic Lee. He would render valuable, patriotic service. However, in view of the apparent opposition to this measure, although the Department has insisted upon it, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion to suspend the rules and pass this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS LAKE SABINE NEAR PORT ARTHUR, TEX.

The SPEAKER. The next business before the House is the consideration of bills on the Consent Calendar. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

The Clerk called the first bill on the Consent Calendar, H.R. 4870, to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across Lake Sabine at or near Port Arthur, Tex.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE DALLES BRIDGE CO.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1278) to amend an act (Public, No. 431, 72d Cong.) to identify The Dalles Bridge Co.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, a week or two ago when this same calendar was being considered I asked that this bill go over without prejudice for the reason that the Committee on Military Affairs had a bill before it affected by this bill. My understanding is that the Committee on Military Affairs has reported that bill out, which would waive the objection I had at that time to this bill, and I therefore have no objection now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act to authorize the construction of certain bridges over navigable waters of the United States, approved March 4, 1933 (Public, No. 431, 72d Cong.), be amended by adding to section 2a the words "a Washington corporation", immediately following the words "The Dalles Bridge Co."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS EAST RIVER BETWEEN BRONX AND WHITESTONE LANDING

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H.R. 5394) authorizing Charles V. Bossert, his heirs and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the East River between Bronx and Whitestone Landing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote interstate commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes, Charles V. Bossert, his heirs and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the East River between Bronx, N.Y., and Whitestone Landing, L.I., at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act: Provided, however, That construction thereof is commenced within 1 year from the date of approval thereof, in order that the construction of this bridge may offer immediate work and relieve unemployment.

SEC. 2. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, the State of New York, any political subdivision thereof within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of such State governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 50 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include goodwill, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion cost, not to exceed 1 percent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

In the event, however, that by appropriate legislation enacted by the State of New York there shall be granted to said Charles V. Bossert, his heirs and assigns, exemption from taxation by the said State, or any political subdivision thereof, with reference to said bridge or the approaches thereto, said bridge shall be turned over to the State of New York or any political subdivision designated by said State without any charge or compensation after the expiration of 50 years from the completion of said bridge.

SEC. 3. If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the State of New York or by any municipality or other political subdivision or public agency thereof, under the provisions of section 2 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 4. Charles V. Bossert, his heirs and assigns, shall, within 90 days after the completion of such bridge, file with the Secretary of War and with the Highway Department of the State of New York a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, and at the request of the Highway Department of the State of New York shall, at any time within 3 years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge; for the purpose of such investigation the said Charles V. Bossert, his heirs and assigns, shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 2 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 5. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to Charles V. Bossert, his heirs and assigns; and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 6. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "act", strike out the balance of the paragraph.

Page 2, line 18, strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

Page 3, lines 7 to 16, strike out the paragraph.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ESTABLISHMENT OF TERM OF DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES AT ORLANDO, FLA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 687) providing for the establishment of a term of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida at Orlando, Fla.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JENKINS. Reserving the right to object, someone requested that I make inquiry with regard to this bill. The report states there will be no expense to the United States Government by way of rentals. I would like to ask if there will be any additional expense in the way of clerk hire or office expense of any kind?

Mr. WILCOX. There will be no additional expense to the United States Government at all, either as to clerk hire or office, or space for holding the court, or any other expense.

Mr. JENKINS. Is there any bar association opposition anywhere?

Mr. WILCOX. No, sir. This bill was filed both in the House and the Senate at the request of the bar association.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILCOX. I yield.

Mr. SEARS. The cost of jurors and witnesses will be materially reduced?

Mr. GOSS. Where is the court sitting now? In a different place?

Mr. SEARS. The court now sits at Tampa, Miami, Jacksonville, and Key West.

Mr. GOSS. When you provide another term at a certain locality, if the locality is farther away from the base then the fees to the judge sitting might be greater.

Mr. WILCOX. May I explain to the gentleman that the nearest point to Orlando is Tampa on the southwest, for holding court, and Jacksonville to the northeast.

Mr. GOSS. But if the distance is several times that which these judges have to go, it will consequently increase their fees.

Mr. WILCOX. It might increase the amount of fees to the judge, but it would decrease the amount of fees to witnesses and jurors, which would more than offset the expense on account of the judges.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a term of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida shall be held annually at Orlando, Fla., on the first Monday in October: Provided, That suitable rooms and accommodations for holding court at Orlando are furnished without expense to the United States.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RETURN TO PHILIPPINE ISLANDS OF UNEMPLOYED FILIPINOS

The Clerk called the next resolution, H.J.Res. 118, to provide for the return to the Philippine Islands of unemployed Filipinos resident in the continental United States, to authorize appropriations to accomplish that result, and for other purposes.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a very important bill and is a matter which should receive the attention of everyone here. I am not inclined to be unfriendly to the bill. I am not inclined to oppose it at all, but I should like the Chairman of the Committee on Immigration to be given sufficient time to explain it because, as I said before, it is very important and is a great departure from any legislation we have enacted heretofore.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] to the Philippine Independence Act. Until the Philippine Independence Act is approved and put into effect, what is the use of sending Filipinos home? They can come right back again.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No; they cannot. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am willing for the gentleman to explain the bill, but ultimately I shall object.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman may not object when he hears my explanation.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes to explain the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is the duty of every Member of this House to cooperate in a program to pass this bill to which the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization has given careful study, by which we can, on their voluntary request, dispose of over 30,000 Filipinos who are roaming throughout the United States, most of them without homes, some of them in jail, most of them having been out of work for 2 or 3 years. They are taking jobs away from Americans whenever they can find jobs because they will work for any price at any time, day or night.

The Philippine Commissioner has indicated to the Committee on Immigration that at least 30,000 of these Filipinos, if given an opportunity to get on Government transports, are ready to leave the United States and go back to their home land.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Are these Filipinos in this country legally?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. They are in the country legally, but here is an opportunity to get them to leave in a nice way, because they would be departing voluntarily at their own request.

The gentleman from Texas suggested that because the Filipinos have not yet obtained their independence we should continue to let almost 45,000 Filipinos in California, New York, Illinois, Mississippi, and throughout the land continue roaming from house to house, without jobs and no place to go.

Here is an opportunity for this Congress to do something constructive for the American people and our American communities and let these Filipinos go home and stay home.

You may ask, Why can they not come back here? They cannot get back because once they accept this gratuity from the Government the regulations provided for might properly require that they sign a pauper's application; then once they go out they stay out.

This bill gives the American people an opportunity in a nice way, in a friendly way, to rid our communities of almost 30,000 of these Filipinos.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. By the terms of this bill we are dealing with Filipinos alone. There are thousands of people of other races in this country in the same condition the Filipinos are in, people who are here legally. They should be made to meet the same conditions.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. In answer to the gentleman's statement may I say that the committee has reported another bill to the House, H.R. 3524, No. 31 on the Union Calendar, which will take care of that situation. We are taking care of everybody who wants to go back home and who voluntarily asks the Government to send them.

Mr. O'MALLEY. But this bill is solely for the Filipinos.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes; because we can use Navy and Army transports to take them to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does the gentleman think that all people in this country who are not citizens and who are unemployed should be sent back?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No. That is not what I said.

Mr. O'MALLEY. That is what this proposes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No; the gentleman has not read the bill.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. These Filipinos have indicated a desire to return to the Philippine Islands. At the present time they are roaming around in my city and other sections of the United States unable to find employment and they are terribly handicapped. Why not send them back home instead of permitting them to continue to be a charge upon the people of this country?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I think anybody who wants to leave should be entitled to.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. They do not have to go.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No Filipino who is here legally is compelled to leave this country. If the Members will read the report of the committee, they will see that the Commissioner of the Philippine Islands indicated that there are almost 30,000 Filipinos who voluntarily want to go back and stay in the Philippine Islands. We are not deporting anybody. This is not a slap at the Filipino people. I say here is an opportunity to save 30,000 jobs for 30,000 Americans.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. How much will it cost to send them back?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The Navy has estimated that the cost is 65 cents a day per person as a passenger on their boats.

Mr. McFARLANE. What will the cost aggregate?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I cannot give the gentleman this information, but should the bill be passed that question would go to the Appropriations Committee, and they will determine the amount necessary to provide. I am giving the gentleman the substance of the testimony given by the Navy Department in which they say they can take on an average of a thousand every 2 months, and that it will cost an average of 65 cents a day.

Mr. McFARLANE. How long does it take to go from here to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. About 10 or 15 days from the west coast, I imagine.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. The more Filipinos who leave this country, the more jobs are left for our own people.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Certainly.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. And it is better to have them leave voluntarily, is it not?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Certainly. Just let me quote a few extracts from the report on this bill:

The United States Census of 1930 shows the total number of Filipinos in the continental United States as 45,208. Of this number, 38,030 were located west of the Mississippi River, with the greater number residing in three States, as follows:

California	30,470
Oregon	1,066
Washington	3,480

Seven thousand one hundred and seventy-eight were located east of the Mississippi River, with the greater number residing in four States, as follows:

Illinois	2,011
Michigan	787
New York	1,982
Pennsylvania	614

Attached hereto is a table showing the distribution of Filipinos in the continental United States by States.

Estimates of the number of indigent Filipinos who might apply for transportation under the provisions of the act cannot be made with any degree of accuracy. During the calendar year 1932, 2,070 Filipinos returned to the Philippines from the continental United States at their expense. With expenses paid, it is probable that the number of applicants would greatly exceed this number.

Your committee roughly estimates that perhaps 20,000 to 30,000 of these Filipinos would apply for the benefits of this resolution before the date fixed as the last date upon which application may be made and accepted by the officers of the Immigration Service; that is, prior to December 1, 1933.

Such a movement on the part of these unemployed Filipinos would be distinctly beneficial to our own citizens who also are without regular income and who are seeking employment; at the same time, it would get these Filipinos speedily among their own peoples, where adjustments probably would be more possible than if they remained here.

While the hearings developed that a number of communities in the United States are now, and have been for sometime, overburdened with calls for solution of the vexing problem of caring for these people, who are neither citizens nor entirely aliens, still testimony submitted clearly established that there existed a definite desire of many Filipinos to go back to their homeland provided a way is provided to finance the journey.

Your committee views this situation, with respect to these Filipinos, as a national emergency to overcome which the Government is fully justified in using the Army and Navy transports as means of transportation, with the actual expense incurred in this means of transportation payable from the Treasury. However, there did not seem any logical reason for withholding this business from certain commercial shipping firms operating ships under United States registry if such commercial firms cared to take this business at a per capita rate as low as, or lower than, the agreed upon rate for passage and maintenance aboard Army transports; that is, rates covering actual cost when civilians man the ships. The Navy transports are manned by enlisted men.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BLANTON). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Certainly.

Mr. O'MALLEY. If this measure is of benefit to the Filipinos and will do them some good and enable them to be transported back to the Philippine Islands at the expense of the United States, I think the measure should be broadened to include all races or all peoples similarly situated. I think, personally, this is class legislation.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If the gentleman will bear with me, this is not only of benefit to the Filipinos, but it is of benefit to the American workers and a benefit to the American communities where these Filipinos have been roaming around now for 2½ years without any work.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Then there should be no objection to broadening the legislation.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. One thing has nothing to do with the other. As I said before, the committee has already reported to the House another bill that will extend the time from 3 years to 5 years within which indigent aliens ask to go back to their native lands at Government expense, and this measure will be considered at the proper time by the House.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. For a brief question; yes.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. If the gentleman will permit, I want to answer the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY]. As a Californian I want to say that we have a greater number of Filipinos than any State of the Union and, of course, they are roaming up and down our State, and they are just floatsam and jetsam so far as we are concerned; but we cannot provide in this measure that we will include everybody who wants to go back to his native home, because in the case of the Filipinos we have a great Army and a great naval base in the Philippine Islands, and we are utilizing in this particular case our Army transports and our Navy transports to take these people back at a cheap rate. Can the gentleman point to any other country where we have a naval base and an Army base and where we could use our transports for such a purpose?

Mr. O'MALLEY. My contention is that if this is a good thing with respect to the Filipinos, why not include them all?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If the Members of the House will be good enough to look at the report, they will find the States in which these men are situated and they include Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, District of Columbia, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, and almost every State of the Union; and the testimony at the hearings indicates clearly that a large percentage of them are out of employment. Would it not be a nice thing for this country, when they have indicated a willingness to depart voluntarily, to send them back to their own country? In order to be sent back they can be required, under regulations to be drawn up, to sign a pauper's statement in the application, and when they do this they cannot come back if they are likely to become a public charge.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. For a brief question; yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I think I am heartily in favor of the bill, but on page 6 of the bill, line 2, there is a provision that no commercial steamship company transporting Filipinos to Manila, Philippine Islands, shall be taxed. Suppose the transports are occupied with troops of the Army and Navy, this would mean that commercial steamship lines would be employed.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is entirely within the discretion of the Committee on Appropriations. Any appropriation under this bill would go to them and they would determine the feasibility of such a practice and whether or not all these Filipinos could be put on transports.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I would like to make this observation.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Regular, order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JENKINS. If the regular order is demanded, Mr. Speaker, I am forced to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will call the next bill on the Consent Calendar.

GAME REFUGE IN THE OUACHITA NATIONAL FOREST

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 3511, to authorize the creation of a game refuge in the Ouachita National Forest in the State of Arkansas.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. How much would it cost to carry out the purposes of the bill?

Mr. GLOVER. I will say that it will not cost one penny. I have a statement from the Department saying that it will be without any expense to the Government.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. How are they to get the game?

Mr. GLOVER. The game is there now in the 827,000 acres.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. And they are at liberty now to kill that game?

Mr. GLOVER. They are now, but we want to prevent it. The game is there, and they are destroying it, and we want to prohibit it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of providing breeding places and for the protection and administration of game animals, birds, and fish, the President of the United States is hereby authorized, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, to establish by public proclamation certain specified areas within the Ouachita National Forest as game sanctuaries and refuges.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EMERGENCY RELIEF FOR MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Speaker, since 1920 the bonded indebtedness of cities, towns, counties, and special tax districts has increased to such enormous proportions that hundreds of these units of government now find themselves entirely unable to meet maturities of principal and interest on their debts and still carry on the necessary functions of government.

From 1921 to 1932, inclusive, the average annual emission of new bond issues of the States and their political subdivisions was $1,309,000,000. It is now estimated that there are outstanding in the hands of investors approximately $18,000,000,000 of municipal, county, district, and State bonds. Most of these bonds were issued during the hectic years of our recent boom period and represent to a large extent the same extravagant expenditure of money and the same disregard of the consequences resulting from the creation of debts which characterized business in general during this same period. The overexpansion of many municipalities and the installation of ill-advised and, in some instances, utterly useless and unnecessary public improvements requiring the expenditure of millions of dollars have resulted in an unbearable burden of debt.

Nor were the officials of these governmental units alone to blame for the issuance of unreasonable quantities of bonds. During this period investors purchased municipal, county, and district bonds entirely without regard to the paying ability of the units issuing them, and indeed in many instances bond brokers and investment houses not only encouraged but insisted upon the issuance of more and more of these obligations.

It can now make little difference what reasons or motives prompted the issuance of these obligations. Nor is it necessary to consider the wisdom of the action of municipal officials or investors. The fact remains that there are some $18,000,000,000 worth of these securities outstanding and that hundreds, even thousands, of taxing units find themselves so burdened with debts that they cannot meet the maturities of principal and interest.

A recent survey of defaulting units discloses the startling information that more than 1,000 governmental units are now in default in the payment of principal or interest, or both, upon their bonded indebtedness. These defaults have extended into 41 States. Three States, 193 counties, 398 cities and towns, 142 school districts, 185 reclamation, levee, irrigation, and drainage districts, and 97 other districts were on April 26, 1933, in default in the payment of principal or interest or both, and the number of defaulting units is increasing daily.

This condition is not limited to any one State or any one section of the country. As illustrative of the wide-spread area covered by these defaults, attention is called to the fact that the State of Florida has 148 defaulting units; North Carolina has 152; Texas has 83; Ohio, 79; California, 73; Arkansas, 42; Missouri, 41; Kentucky, 34; Oregon, 35; and Michigan, 28.

Nor is this condition limited to any one class of taxing units. The list of defaulting units includes not only the small improvement districts but extends also to some of the largest cities in the United States. Prominent among the cities reported as being in default are such communities as Detroit, Flint, and Pontiac, Mich.; Akron, Loraine, Marion, and Alliance, Ohio; Asheville, Raleigh, High Point, and Greensboro, N.C.; Charleston and Florence, S.C.; St. Petersburg, Miami, and West Palm Beach, Fla.; Mobile, Phoenix City, and Decatur, Ala. These are, of course, only a few of the more than 1,000 defaulting communities and are cited only for the purpose of illustrating the wide territory covered by this condition.

The condition is rapidly becoming worse. Since February 1, 1933, more than 100 additional communities have defaulted and more are being added to the list each day.

It is now estimated by good authority that the bonds of these municipalities and other taxing units actually in default far exceed a billion dollars and the fact that this enormous amount of municipal bonds is now in default and their holders unable to collect interest upon them is having a very serious effect upon the ability of other communities to finance themselves. The fact that more than a billion dollars of these securities are now practically worthless has almost completely destroyed the market for municipal securities, with the result that many of our otherwise solvent cities and counties are finding it increasingly difficult to borrow money even for temporary financing. The result of this, of course, will be that unless some means can be evolved by which defaulting communities can adjust, rearrange, and refinance their indebtedness, they will soon completely destroy all market for municipal securities, and we shall soon find that no community has escaped this situation.

Under the law of every State of which I am advised, the governing authorities of municipalities, counties, and other taxing districts are required to levy taxes for the payment of debts at the same time and in conjunction with the levy of taxes for operating expenses. Tax moneys must be collected and distributed pro rata between the appropriations for operation expenses and debt service. If the levy for debts is so excessive as to render the taxes uncollectable, the city or county finds itself without funds with which to pay its operating expenses. Courts are powerless to render any assistance but, upon the application of creditors, must, by mandamus, require the levy of whatever taxes are necessary to meet the requirements of bond issues regardless of collectability.

In many cities, these excessive tax levies have resulted and are resulting in a complete failure of the municipality to collect sufficient taxes to carry on and perform the ordinary and necessary functions of government and provide funds necessary to meet the unusual demands for relief being made upon them as the result of the present distressed condition existing in world affairs. Municipal officials are without discretion. They must levy such taxes as are required by bond issues regardless of collectability, and in many instances this is resulting in such enormous levies that taxpayers are finding themselves entirely unable to carry the burden of taxes, and this in turn is resulting in the failure of local governments to perform those functions which provide for the preservation and protection of the health, peace, and lives of their citizens.

Taxpayers are unable to pay the confiscatory taxes necessary to meet the requirements of these debts; there is no sale of property, and there is no incentive to improve or repair property. Because of the inability of the taxpayer to pay his taxes there is no money available for the principal or interest on bonds. We find, therefore, that hundreds of millions of dollars worth of property in these units is rendered valueless and hundreds of millions of dollars of their outstanding bonds are worthless. Permit me also to remind you that many millions of these bonds are owned by insurance companies, fraternal societies, trustees, and other fiduciaries, because municipal and county bonds have always been considered the safest investment. Unless this Congress can find some sane, equitable, and practical means by which these debts can be adjusted on a basis of ability to pay, there are thousands of small units of government which must cease to exist, hundreds of millions of dollars worth of homes and farms will be lost to their owners, and a corresponding amount of the invested funds of insurance companies, trustees, guardians, and other fiduciaries will be lost, and the health, peace, and very lives of hundreds of thousands of people will be seriously endangered because of the lack of organized governments.

To meet this situation and to provide a fair and equitable method by which the debts of taxing districts might be adjusted on a basis of ability to pay H.R. 5267, sometimes referred to as the "Wilcox municipal refinancing bill", was prepared and introduced.

This bill does not seek to repudiate any of the obligations of any taxing district in the United States. It does not provide for any arbitrary scaling-down of the debts of any taxing district, nor does it leave to the discretion of municipal officials or to the court the right to determine what shall be paid by the taxing district. It does not provide for a moratorium.

It does provide, however, for the readjustment of the debts of any taxing district by agreement entered into between the governing officials of the taxing district and the holders of two thirds of its debts.

The bill provides that where any city or other subdivision referred to in the bill as a taxing district is insolvent or unable to meet the maturities of its debts, it shall have the right, with the consent of the holders of more than one third of its debts, to file a petition with the bankruptcy court alleging its insolvency or inability to meet debts according to their terms and stating its desire to readjust its debts on a basis of ability to pay. This petition cannot be filed unless the holders of more than one third of its debts shall signify in writing their consent to the filing of the petition and their willingness that some plan of readjustment on a basis of ability to pay shall be worked out.

No taxing district, therefore, can arbitrarily seek the aid of the court in fraud upon its creditors. A substantial amount of its creditors must signify their willingness to have a plan worked out before the taxing district can go into the court in the first instance.

Having filed its petition in the court, the taxing district must, within 6 months, file with the court a plan of readjustment which has been consented to by more than one third of its creditors. If no such plan, so consented to, has been filed within 6 months of the filing of the petition, the petition will be dismissed. If such a plan consented to by the holders of more than one third of its debts is filed within 6 months, the taxing district shall have additional time, in no case to exceed 2 years from the date of the filing of the petition, to secure consent of the holders of two thirds of its debts. If the consent of two thirds of the creditors cannot be obtained to the plan, the petition is dismissed. In no case can any plan be adopted which has not been consented to by the holders of two thirds of the debts affected by the plan.

The bill contains ample provision for notice to creditors and affords to them the right to contest all other material allegations of the petition. The holders of secured claims are amply protected and the bill otherwise deals fairly and equitably with all of the creditors. No plan of readjustment can be confirmed until the court has found that it is fair and equitable; that it does not discriminate against any class of creditors; that it reasonably conforms to the paying ability of the political subdivision; and that the taxing district has full legal power and authority to perform and carry out the terms and conditions of the plan. If the court finds that the plan conforms to these requirements and has been consented to by the holders of two thirds of the debts affected by it, an order is required to be entered confirming the plan, and it thereby becomes binding upon both the tax district and all its creditors.

The object and purpose of the bill is, of course, to enable counties, cities, towns, and tax districts to adjust their debts effectively. In every instance where a governmental unit finds itself in financial difficulty and is able to make some satisfactory agreement of adjustment with the majority of its creditors there is always a small minority who hold out and demand preferential treatment. These minority creditors are prompted in this action by the thought that someone will buy them out rather than have the whole plan collapse.

The difficulty, of course, is that if one creditor by holding out can gain preferential treatment, the others withdraw, and nothing comes of the efforts at settlement or readjustment. It is to remove this difficulty that the bill has been drawn and introduced. If this bill is enacted, the minority creditors will be forced to accept the terms of adjustment which have been agreed upon by the officials of the political subdivision and by the vast majority of creditors and approved by the court as being fair and equitable. This bill, therefore, does nothing more than extend to insolvent counties, cities, towns, and tax districts the power to effectively adjust their debts by agreement with the majority of their creditors. Certainly no fairer means of adjusting the debts could be worked out than one which gives effect to a settlement agreed to by the taxing district and the great majority of its creditors.

The terms of the bill are fair, alike to the political subdivision and to the creditors. No county, city, or tax district can be imposed upon, because no plan can be confirmed except upon the voluntary petition of the governmental unit. At the same time no plan which is unjust or unfair to creditors can be confirmed, because every such plan must be approved by the holders of two thirds of debts. Certainly this great majority of the creditors will not consent to anything against the interest of creditors. But to protect the minority creditors against any unfair treatment the bill provides that the court before confirming the plan must find it is fair and equitable and does not discriminate. Cities or other units which are not actually insolvent cannot avail themselves of this bill because no solvent city could ever get the consent of the holders of a substantial quantity of its bonds to the filing of the petition, and without this consent the petition cannot be filed.

Taxpayers are protected against improper adjustment agreements being entered into by their officials: First, by the provision that before any such plan can be confirmed the court must find and determine that there is ample legal authority to do the things specified in the plan; second, by the provision that the plan must conform to the ability of the unit to pay; and, third, by the provision that the court shall not have any power to interfere with or disturb any of the political or governmental powers of the subdivision.

The creditor is further protected, because, in addition to the inherent right in the court to enforce such agreements by mandamus, the bill provides that the court shall retain jurisdiction of the case until the terms of the agreement have been fully complied with.

The necessity for the legislation will be more readily understood when it is recalled that in numerous instances refunding and refinancing plans have been worked out by municipalities and taxing districts and agreed to and accepted by the majority of creditors only to be blocked by one or two individuals holding a negligible quantity of bonds. As the law now stands, a city which owes a hundred million dollars might work out a plan of adjustment which would be entirely satisfactory to all its creditors except one man holding one $1,000 bond who could block the settlement by holding out and by bringing mandamus or other similar action. I am advised of one case where the holder of 2 percent blocked a settlement and another where the holder of $2,000 out of a total $952,000 of bonds broke up the settlement. The purpose of this bill is to give the court jurisdiction of these minority creditors who, by refusing to accept the terms of settlement agreed to by the majority creditors, keep these taxing districts from refinancing their debts.

The statement has been made by uninformed people that if cities and taxing districts would practice economy in the administration of their affairs they would be able to meet their debts. This argument is, of course, utterly ridiculous. Most of our cities have already reduced their operating expenses to the minimum and still they cannot raise sufficient tax money to pay the expenses of government and meet the demands of creditors.

I am prepared to submit comparative statements of certain municipalities which will disclose the fact that in many instances operating expenses have been reduced as much as 50 percent, and in a few instances as much as 75 percent, within the last 5 years, and yet in these cases the municipalities have not been able to pay even the interest on their debts, to say nothing of being unable to set aside sinking funds or principal payments.

And, unfortunately for the residents and taxpayers in these localities, the reduction of operating expenses has not resulted in any reduction of taxes. As appropriations for operating expenses have been decreased, the appropriations for debts have been increased. The local taxpayer, therefore, has received no benefit from the reduction of operating costs but has found himself with a less efficient local government but with an ever-inereasing tax burden.

There are a great many cities where 60 percent of the tax levy is for debts, and in some as much as 80 percent of taxes is appropriated for debts, and only 20 percent for operating costs. In such cases the municipality can only use $20 out of every $100 collected, the remainder going to liquidate debts. It will be very easily seen that it is not the operating cost of local government that is breaking the backs of taxpayers.

After all, our people look to their local governments for those services which deal directly with the preservation and protection of their health, their peace, and their lives. Without sanitation, police, and fire protection, and the numerous other functions performed by our municipalities, organized government would cease to exist. Unless funds can be raised for these things they cannot be done; and unless relief can be granted from these burdensome debts, taxpayers cannot pay enough in taxes to continue these necessary functions.

Something must be done. The very existence of local governments is seriously threatened. The value of all municipal securities is being rapidly destroyed by the fact that there is now no legal machinery available whereby hopelessly insolvent taxing districts may adjust their debts.

This bill provides a fair and equitable means of adjustment by giving effect only to settlements which have been agreed to by the taxing districts and two thirds of their creditors.

There is nothing new in this proposal. We have ample precedent for the adjustment of public debt on the basis of the ability of the debtor to pay. This Government in its dealings with foreign nations in the adjustment of the war debts has already blazed the trail; and because there is some probability that our first estimate of "ability to pay" was somewhat high, there is now a strong sentiment for new negotiations looking toward a new revision downward to meet the ability of the debtor nations to pay. And yet the per-capita debt of most of these nations is only a fraction of the per-capita debt of many of our American cities.

I have no criticism for either the past actions of our Government nor for any future action that may be taken looking toward a readjustment of war debts on the basis of "ability to pay." But I respectfully submit that if this treatment is fair in the case of European nations, certainly no fair-minded person could reasonably object to the same treatment being accorded to our own debt-burdened and tax-ridden municipalities and tax districts.

OUR MERCHANT MARINE PROBLEM AND THE OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] may extend his own remarks in the RECORD on the merchant marine.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, it is believed that matters affecting the future of the American merchant marine may come up for discussion at the approaching London Economic Conference. Foreign interests that are vitally interested in the destruction of our hard-won, partial mercantile independence are sharpening their knives in anticipation of luring us into some ill-considered concession to this end. In the meanwhile on the home front the perennial attacks, both in Congress and out, are being renewed and are adding to the misinformation and confusion in the public mind as to the actual facts concerning our merchant marine.

It is therefore of vital importance, at the present time, that the taxpayer should know how large a stake he has in our reborn ocean tonnage; that the producer, in farm and factory, should be informed as to its influence upon the fruits of his labor; that the voter should be made aware of the fact that an adequate merchant marine is absolutely essential to our economic and political safety, both in peace and in war.

Fortunately this great question may be approached without reference to party politics, to which it has never been subjected. The advocates of a strong merchant marine have included the great statesmen of the past, from Washington and Jefferson down to the leaders of our two great parties today. Its opponents, though frequently men of unquestioned good faith, have too often been motivated by sectional jealousies, misguided notions of economy, or even downright malice. Unconsciously they have served the purposes of our friendly enemies abroad and have become the vehicles for an insidious and unrelenting propaganda.

I propose here to show, briefly, that the ultimate welfare of every citizen is affected by the maintenance of a merchant marine adequate to carry a reasonable portion of our commerce over the principal trade routes of the world, and that this can only be made possible by some measure of intelligent Government assistance. This is no discrimination in favor of a privileged group or section. It is an imperative national necessity.

A. REVIEW OF OUR MERCANTILE HISTORY TO 1914

I. The golden period of American shipping, 1789–1860

For nearly 75 years American ships carried our flag and our trade over the seven seas and were known to every port in the world. The Revolution had given us political independence, the merchant marine gave us commercial independence. It was to this end that 5 of the first 11 acts of the First Federal Congress related to shipping, and that Washington declared:

We should not overlook the tendency of war to abridge the means, and thereby at least enhance the price, of transporting productions to their proper markets. I recommend it to your [Congress's] serious reflections how far and in what mode it may be expedient to guard against embarrassments from these contingencies by such encouragement to our own navigation as will render our commerce and agriculture less dependent on foreign bottoms which may fail us in the very moments most interesting to both these great objects. * * * There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure.

Jefferson, founder of the Democratic Party, shared this view and continued Washington's policy of encouraging American-flag shipping. Speaking of the dangers of lacking a merchant marine, he said:

The marketing of our productions will be at the mercy of any nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them; and our policy may be influenced by those who command our commerce. * * * But it is as a resource of defense that our navigation will admit neither neglect nor forbearance. The carriage of our commodities, if once established in another channel, cannot be resumed in the moment we may desire.

And in 1794 Madison briefly stated the case for a subsidy policy in words that are equally true and perhaps still more appropriate today:

To allow trade to regulate itself is not, therefore, to be admitted as a maxim universally sound. Our own experience has taught us that, in certain cases, it is the same thing with allowing one nation to regulate it for another. * * * A small burden only in foreign ports on American vessels, and a perfect equality of foreign vessels with our own in our own ports, would gradually banish the latter altogether.

As the result of the vigorous policies pursued by the Government and the initiative of our ship owners and builders, we built up a powerful merchant marine that grew with our foreign trade and carried the bulk of it up to the Civil War, as the following figures will show:

	American tonnage in foreign trade	Percentage of trade in American ships
1789	123,893	[1] 90.0
1790	346,254
1800	667,107
1810	981,019
1820	[2] 583,657	[2] 88.7
1830	[2] 537,563	89.9
1840	762,838	82.9
1850	1,439,694	72.7
1860	2,379,396	66.5

[2] 1821.
[3] This temporary decline of our tonnage in foreign trade was the result of the tonnage losses of the War of 1812, the blockades of the Napoleonic wars, the Navigation Acts, and the increased requirement of our coasting trade, in which tonnage steadily increased.

The average percentage of American trade carried in American bottoms, 1820 to 1860, was 77.3 percent.

During this glorious period we not only carried more than three fourths of our own foreign trade, but, in competition with other nations, we carried an important part of the trade between Asia and Europe. Our maritime supremacy was not only a glorious tradition but it proved to be a profitable national investment. To a large measure our shipping brought us the wealth for the development of our great western empire.

During the heyday of the sailing ship we were able to compete with Great Britain on an equal footing, as we had supplies of good timber near our shipbuilding towns on the seacoast. The appearance of the steamship, however, although an American invention, gave Britain the great advantages of lower construction costs and cheap coal near her ports. Unable to beat us by sail, she built steamers and piled onto the advantages they already possessed huge subsidies in the form of mail contracts. Thus fed by the British Treasury, the Cunard Line took the seas in 1840 and won the cream of the trans-Atlantic passenger and fast-freight trade. Accepting the challenge, our Government granted a postal subvention to the Collins Line of steamers out of New York in 1847. This put us back on an equality with England, and within a short time the Collins liners so demonstrated their superiority in speed and comfort that they secured 50 percent more passengers and 30 percent more freight than the Cunarders. Moreover, and of special significance to the present discussion, they forced the Cunard Line to reduce its freight rates from $35 to less than $20 a ton. This meant a saving to American commerce many times the small cost of the postal subvention.

The subsidy was finally withdrawn, however, and the line, with the added misfortune of the loss of two ships, was obliged to suspend operations after 8 years of valuable service. President Pierce, probably under the pressure of the strong sectional politics that were rife at that time, had vetoed a measure for the continuance of the postal contract. As reason he cited the fact that the contract called for payment by the Government of sums larger than the carriage of mails was actually worth, and declared that this was a violation of public policy. These are the self-same arguments that we hear today, although it is universally recognized that postal contracts are not alone for the purpose of carrying mails but are intended to create naval auxiliaries and to promote foreign commerce. Deducting postal receipts, the total subsidy cost of the Collins Line was only $1,886,000 for the entire period. This was a small price to pay for its benefits to the public.

II. Causes for the decline of American shipping, 1860–1914

While our great sailing fleets remained supreme upon the ocean until the Civil War, it was obvious that steam would replace sail, and the experience of the Collins Line showed that Government aid was necessary to maintain steamship service against subsidized foreign lines with lower construction and operating costs. The Civil War destroyed much of our tonnage, and after it public and private attention turned toward the interior and became indifferent to merchant marine matters. While railways received various forms of Government support, shipping was left to struggle against foreign competition at heavy odds. Here are the results, contrasting with the ante-bellum growth I have cited:

	American tonnage in foreign trade	Percentage of trade in American ships
1821–60, average		77.3
1860	2,379,396	66.5
1870	1,448,846	35.6
1880	1,314,402	17.4
1890	928,062	12.9
1900	816,795	9.3
1910	782,517	8.7
1914	1,066,288	9.7
1866–1913 average		14.6

The fact that we were carrying only 9.7 percent of our foreign trade in 1914 becomes even more startling when we realize that hardly any of this was, properly speaking, overseas trade. What little merchant marine was engaged in foreign trade plied principally to our nearby West Indian neighbors and Canada, and even here foreign ships carried the larger part.

The result was that the American farmer and manufacturer paid to foreign vessels each year a freight bill of hundreds of millions of dollars for the privilege of selling their surpluses abroad, or of buying the goods foreigners were willing to sell them. This was principally because public opinion had not been awakened to the gravity of the situation. To be sure, there were several half-hearted attempts at postal laws to encourage the establishment of American shipping, in 1864, 1868, and 1891. But these were either repealed or insufficient for their purposes, even though the recent Merchant Marine Acts were based upon the postal-aid law of 1891.

Had we foresightedly extended effective Government aid to shipping sufficient to offset the foreign advantages in construction and operating costs, it would have cost us but a tithe of the tribute wrung from us by all the maritime nations of the world. American commerce was the greatest and richest in the world, and our indifference made it the greatest bonanza in mercantile industry. And on top of what we were obliged to pay for these transportation services, we also paid a bonus in high freight rates over which we had no means of control.

III. Our experience shows the economic folly of maritime dependence

(a) Several of our great Presidents warned us against inaction. Among them, Grover Cleveland declared that "The millions now paid to foreigners for carrying American passengers and products across the sea should be turned into American hands." Another statement came from McKinley, who advocated an aggressive program of Federal aid to shipping:

> Our national development will be one-sided and unsatisfactory so long as the remarkable growth of our inland industries remains unaccompanied by progress upon the seas. There is no lack of constitutional authority for legislation which shall give to this country maritime strength commensurate with its industrial achievements and with its rank among the nations of the earth.
> We must encourage our merchant marine. We must have more ships. They must be under the American flag, built and manned and owned by Americans. They will not only be profitable in a commercial sense; they will be messengers of peace and amity wherever they go.

Theodore Roosevelt declared himself for an adequate merchant marine and warned the Nation that "from every standpoint it is unwise for the United States to continue to rely upon the ships of competing nations for the distribution of our goods." Finally President Wilson, under whose administration became law the first really effective merchant-marine legislation in 71 years, well stated the problem as follows in his first message to Congress in 1914:

> How are we to build up a great trade if we have not the certain and constant means of transportation upon which all profitable and useful commerce depends? And how are we to get the ships if we wait for the trade to develop without them? The Government must open these gates of trade, and open them wide. * * *
> To speak plainly we have grossly erred in the way in which we have stunted and hindered the development of our merchant marine. * * * It is necessary for many weighty reasons of national efficiency and development that we should have a great merchant marine. * * * It is high time we repaired our mistake and resumed our commercial independence on the sea.

(b) These and other declarations and warnings from our most trusted statesmen for generations should have been heeded. Yet we even ignored a series of very costly lessons. At the time of the Spanish-American War we did not even have the transports efficiently to move our troops for the Cuban campaign. Thousands of troops mobilized in our southern ports never reached the scene of warfare and were decimated by typhus and malaria. We are still paying—or should be—pensions for disabilities traceable to our neglect of a merchant marine. And in the same war our Navy was required to make use of foreign-flag auxiliaries to transport its fuel. Without them it would have remained nearly as useless as the troops rotting in our Gulf ports.

(c) Another lesson followed closely on the heels of this experience. The Boer War broke out in South Africa—this time an event in which we were in no way concerned—and British shipping serving our trade was withdrawn. The result was a temporary paralysis of our commerce and a great increase in freight rates. It was the American farm and factory that suffered for this. The British lines reaped double profits, from us and from their own Government.

(d) We should have learned our lesson by that time; yet again, in 1908, when President Roosevelt sent the great White Squadron on its world cruise we had the humiliation of having to charter foreign ships to nurse it. Small wonder that during the World War, Germany did not take the threat of our participation, 3,000 miles away, very seriously.

(e) It seems incredible that to this cumulative evidence of the dangers of lacking a merchant marine there should have been added the fantastic chapter of the World War experience. Nevertheless, when the European conflict broke out we had only 19 ships in overseas trade, of which only 6, totaling less than 70,000 tons, were in the North Atlantic service. When foreign shipping was withdrawn from our carrying trade we had none to take its place. Thus, through circumstances over which we had no means of control, our foreign trade was completely paralyzed, and our domestic prices for goods with an exportable surplus utterly collapsed. Cotton, for example, dropped immediately to 5 cents a pound, while freight rates skyrocketed as follows: Cotton, per hundredweight, from $0.35 to $11; flour, per hundredweight, from $0.10 to $1; wheat, per bushel, from $0.08 to $1.36; general average, tenfold increase.

These goods found transportation at such rates only because they were urgently needed by the belligerents. Others could not be moved at all. Whole communities were bankrupted as though by a national disaster. It was just as Jefferson predicted in 1793:

> In time of war, that is to say, when those nations who may be our principal carriers shall be at war with each other, if we have not within ourselves the means of transportation, our produce must be exported in belligerent vessels, at the increased expense of war freights and insurance, and the articles which will not bear that must perish on our hands.

Yet, had we had a merchant marine in 1914 and 1915, we would not have incurred such losses but would have made collossal profits in shipping to Europe and in replacing curtailed European exports to the principal neutral markets. South America needed manufactured goods that we could have supplied, for the year before the war seven of the 1914 belligerents had exported to that continent nearly $700,000,000 of merchandise. Under the stimulation of foreign shipping, heavily subsidized by the European maritime nations, the total commerce of South America had increased from $1,800,000,000 in 1907 to $3,000,000,000 in 1914. This was ours for the asking. Moreover, in 1915 national committees representing 17 South and Central American nations passed resolutions urging the critical necessity for increased shipping facilities between the Americas.

Our military and naval situation at that time was also interesting. Our troop-transport fleet consisted of 16 vessels, 14 over 20 years old, and 1 of them 42 years old, ranging from 871 to 6,800 tons. These were largely in unseaworthy condition. It was estimated that with this equipment it would have required 6 months for us to move 100,000 men and their supplies a distance of 1,000 miles. This condition still obtained after Europe had been at war for a year and a half. Our 25 naval colliers were about as antique and of small capacity. Further, Rear Admiral Benson estimated that 400 ocean-going vessels totaling 1,172,000 gross tons would, in the event of war, be required as naval auxiliaries adequately to support our fleets. At that time our total available tonnage in both domestic and foreign trade suitable for this service was about 500,000 tons short of that requirement.

This was our situation when we entered the war. It cost us more than $3,000,000,000 partially to remedy it, and the most prodigious efforts any nation has ever put forth into a single new enterprise. Moreover, that deficiency probably cost us vastly greater sums in terms of lost revenues we might have earned from carrying our 1914–17 trade and taking advantage of the new markets available. The interest alone on those $3,000,000,000 added to the national debt at the low rate of 3⅓ percent, would amount to $100,000,000 annually, or more than five times as much as the cost of our present postal assistance to the merchant marine. This fact alone is an unanswerable argument to the attacks upon our present subventions for the carriage of mails, the extension of commerce, and the promotion of national defense.

B. EFFECT OF OUR EXPORTABLE SURPLUS UPON THE NATIONAL ECONOMY

I. Exportable surplus of 10 percent must be sold overseas

It is generally conceded that in normal times we have a surplus over our domestic needs of approximately 10 percent of the production of our farms, mines, and factories. Or to put it another way, 1 man in every 10 employed in this country is occupied exclusively in producing goods for sale abroad. For the present purpose we may consider nearly all employment as some form of production, direct or indirect, since the consumption of construction, transportation, and other services is largely conditioned by the production of agricultural, industrial, or mined commodities. The following figures from the Department of Commerce indicate the practically fixed relationship between our total production and exports of merchandise (based upon value in dollars):

	Percentage of production exported
1899	12.8
1904	11.2
1909	9.5
1914	9.7
1919	15.7
1921	12.3
1923	8.7
1925	10.1
1927	9.9
1929	9.8

Breaking down that 9.8 percent of our total production exported in 1929 by commodities, we find that it accounts for a large part of the agricultural, industrial, and mining output of tens of millions of our people. Of our total production, we exported in 1929—

	Percent
Cotton	54.00
Tobacco	41.00
Lard	33.00
Wheat	18.00
Copper	36.00
Kerosene	34.00
Typewriters	40.00
Sewing machines	25.00
Total farm products	16.16

Corresponding figures through 1932 are not available, but the Commerce Department publications show that not only have production and exports in every important commodity dropped sharply during the present depression but the percentage of total production exported has dropped. Few will question the statement that employment and the general level of prosperity in this country are vitally affected not only by domestic production and consumption but also by the production and exportation of a certain surplus, normally around 10 percent. And when this export margin falls far below its average level, domestic prices are certain to collapse, with all the economic hardships which attend a serious deflation.

Thus, although our domestic market accounts for 90 percent of our production, our foreign market will continue to have a controlling influence upon price and employment. For this reason it is of paramount importance to retain control of the means for effecting the sale of our surpluses abroad. Whether in times of prosperity or of depression, we cannot afford to be at the mercy of eventualities beyond our control, such as the hardships imposed upon us in the past by foreign wars or economic disturbances.

II. The relation of our merchant tonnage to our exportable surplus

The importance of the merchant-marine problem to the United States is evident when we realize that, although we have the greatest foreign commerce in the world, we have less ocean tonnage per export ton and per capita than any other maritime nation today. In other words, despite the new tonnage launched under the Merchant Marine Act of 1928, we still have less security for our foreign trade than any other nation, although that trade amounts to the following unprecedented volume:

[Thousands of dollars]

	1926-30 average	1928	1929	1930
Exports	4,777,313	5,128,356	5,240,995	3,843,181
Imports	4,033,468	4,091,444	4,399,361	3,060,908

Yet a substantial and noisy minority are clamoring, apparently in good faith, for the destruction of our merchant marine and the surrender of this trade to any foreign nation that seeks it.

III. The actual employment provided by shipping, shipbuilding, and allied industries

The role that foreign commerce plays in our national economy is enormous, though the figures must remain a matter of conjecture. Statistics are available, however, as to the men actually employed in maintaining and supplying our merchant marine. The number of men employed on American merchant vessels during 1927–31 were as follows:

1927	208,949
1928	203,413
1929	200,444
1930	194,719

The Merchant Marine Act of 1928 requires that all officers and two thirds of the crews employed on American vessels be American citizens.

Another form of employment created by the existence of an American merchant marine is in the shipyards. According to Aldred H. Haag, of the Shipping Board, our war-time construction program employed 350,000 men in the yards. This, of course, was in response to the emergency, and practically all yards were closed when the program was completed. The passage of the Merchant Marine Act, however, provided steady reemployment for about 18,000 men in the shipyards and for an equal number in the allied marine-supply industries, of which total 25,000 would not otherwise have been employed.

Addressing the Fifth National Conference on the Merchant Marine, Mr. H. G. Smith, president of the National Council of American Shipbuilders, stated that a normal annual shipbuilding program sufficient for replacements and to maintain a merchant marine capable of carrying 40 per cent of our 1929 trade would include the construction each year of combination vessels and freighters amounting to 210,000 gross tons, costing $35,000,000; and of tankers, 130,000 gross tons, costing $20,000,000; or a total of 340,000 gross tons, costing $55,000,000.

The American Bureau of Shipping places the probable program desirable at a total of $75,000,000 annually. Of this, its recent publication states, $30,000,000 would be spent for labor at the yards, more than $40,000,000 would be spent for materials, and out of that cost of materials $30,000,000 would be paid to the labor producing them, making a total of $60,000,000 for labor alone.

The benefits of such a program to every part of the Nation is demonstrated by the fact that each of the 48 States produces several of the 16 principal materials or items of equipment used in shipbuilding; 22 States, with an area of 38 percent and a population of 55 percent of the United States, build ocean-going ships, and 200 major industries participate in the building of ships. Thus the $55,000,000 or $75,000,000 expended annually on a shipbuilding program commensurate with our minimum commercial needs would be a permanent source of income to every class and section of the country. And, as I shall show, this direct and measurable benefit to the Nation is achieved, under suitable merchant-marine legislation, principally at private expense and at relatively small cost to the Government.

C. TRADE FOLLOWS THE FLAG—SHIPS ARE OUR BEST SALESMEN

The lack of ocean tonnage is unquestionably a serious handicap in the competition for markets and for the raw materials that our industries require from overseas. For this reason the peace-time value of a merchant marine is far greater than the value of the services it performs, greater than the amount of the freight payments that it keeps at home as an invisible contribution to the trade balance, greater than the savings to a nation's shippers through prevention of freight-rate discriminations, and greater than all of these combined. It is the ship, more than any other agency, that establishes and maintains foreign markets. Indeed, the history of every maritime nation shows that its trade follows the ships that fly its flags. In the case of a vast proportion of our exportable commodities, prices are world prices and standards are world standards. In competition with other nations that produce the same goods we are at a disadvantage if we permit their ships to carry those goods. Another large proportion of our export trade consists of manufactured goods not in world-wide use at the present time—such as electrical appliances—for which a new demand must be created. Only American lines plying regularly between American and foreign ports under such requirements as are set up in our postal contracts may be expected aggressively to find and to develop these new markets for American goods. Foreign ships will merely transport our goods to where they are already in demand.

I shall only cite three brief illustrations of this proposition.

I. Our trade during 1800–1860 was created by initiative of shipmasters

Between 1820 and 1860 our export trade increased about sevenfold, and this we owe largely to the initiative and resourcefulness of our shipowners and their supercargoes. American ships plied every sea and visited every port, and wherever they went they developed new tastes for American products or pushed American goods ahead of those of our foreign competitors. New trade routes were established, some of them around the world, taking American goods to the Far East, carrying far-eastern goods bought in exchange to Europe for sale, and returning with what we needed for the development of our industries. Others were triangular, carrying the produce of New England for exchange with those of the South Seas, which in turn were traded for Indian textiles and spices and Chinese silks and teas. Perhaps the quaintest instance of the salesmanship of American ships of this period was the ice trade, established by Frederick Tudor, a shipowner, which was destined to become an important item in our national income. From small beginnings in the West Indies he extended a demand for ice to every city of South America and seaport of India. His agents were instructed to dispense iced American drinks. Others were told to stress the protection of public health through the preservation of food in hot countries. This trade became so large that until the invention of artificial refrigeration every New England village with a pond reaped a rich harvest from Tudor's ingenuity. And the shipment of ice created a trade in the materials for ice houses, and so forth. Further, on the heels of the ice trade came a demand in India for Baldwin apples and other northern foodstuffs that could not be transported or preserved without refrigeration. So again today there is the same work for American vessels to perform in spreading the cult of automatic refrigeration and tomato-juice cocktails! Only American-flag services may do this for us, not British or German or Norwegian.

II. Subsidized shipping won the South American trade for Britain and Germany

In the Monroe Doctrine we declared that South America was under our political protection. Yet, through neglect of our merchant marine, we left its economic development principally in the hands of foreigners. When the World War burst we were not even in a position to supply our Latin American neighbors with their necessities—the very goods which we desperately needed to sell. We had permitted foreign vessels to carry practically all our own commerce, even the bulk of our trade with our nearest customers, and we had supinely watched them develop great commercial empires in South America to absorb the surplus goods of Europe. In spite of our natural proximity and the cordial relations we have enjoyed with the South American republics, we maintained practically no means of commercial intercourse with them. European nations, however, exploited South America through subsidized shipping on a gigantic scale. On their ships went swarms of salesmen trained for the business of developing new demands. The British sold them industrial plants whose furnaces were designed to burn only Welsh coal. In 1913 Germany alone sold goods amounting to $197,000,000 on that continent, while we only sold $166,000,000 of merchandise. Even France and Italy, perceiving the opportunities in that field, gained a better foothold than we, partly by encouragements to shipping. The result of this European initiative was that South American commerce nearly doubled in 7 years.

III. Our new American-flag routes have won new markets

Fortunately we have ourselves, at last, written a new chapter in the record of trade that follows the flag. Our war and post-war merchant-marine legislation has given us some tonnage capable of engaging in overseas trade. Through the Shipping Board we established 38 regular merchant services between 60 American ports and 550 foreign ports. The effect of this upon our commerce is startling—

Trade	Number of ships engaged		Volume of commerce		Percentage of trade increase
	1914	1927	1914	1927
African	None	19	$47,000,000	$200,000,000	325
South American	5	89	347,000,000	1,000,000,000	190
Far eastern	5	140	380,000,000	1,800,000,000	380

Would foreign carriers have developed this new trade for us? I doubt that even those who propose to destroy our merchant marine would answer in the affirmative.

D. SUBSIDIES A GENERAL PRACTICE—WHY WE NEED THEM MOST

Many Americans have been taught to mistrust such words as "subsidy", "bounty", "subvention", and so forth—words that are universally accepted as part of public policy. They seem to connote something mysteriously sinister. Even in Congress, where their proper meaning is understood, enemies of the merchant marine are pleased to associate them with "racket", "fat doles", "juicy contracts", and other phrases calculated to arouse suspicion. Why? Our present measures for maintaining a merchant marine happen to be under "postal contracts", but their express intention is subsidy, and calling it that does not in the least alter the issue.

I. Merchant marines have been universally subsidized as a public utility and national necessity

There is nothing whatever new or dangerous about Government aid to shipping, although this invariably takes the form of some kind of premium, discrimination, special privilege, loan at low interest, or rebate of taxes and duties—frequently a combination of these. If our present merchant marine laws are open to attack, then so are the laws by which every maritime nation has created and maintained its fleets of merchant vessels from the seventeenth century in England down to the present in all countries. When I say "all countries", I mean practically every nation that possesses a seaport, from Great Britain down to Greece and Estonia. I have not the time here to detail the measures which these countries have taken to give their shipping a privileged status, but I recommend the comprehensive study of the subject issued by the Department of Commerce in 1931, Shipping and Shipbuilding Subsidies. If we have been mistaken in awarding postal contracts under the Merchant Marine Acts of 1920 and 1928, then our early statesmen were at fault in their successful efforts to build up an independent merchant marine. To be sure, our early laws for this purpose, of which 50 were passed before 1830, did not take the form of postal contracts, but that was because the use of mails in those days was very restricted and could not serve as the pin on which to hang Government assistance.

Let me repeat my citation from James Madison again in reply to the clamor about "fat doles":

> To allow trade to regulate itself is not, therefore, to be admitted as a maxim universally sound. Our own experience has taught us that, in certain cases, it is the same thing with allowing one nation to regulate it for another. * * * A small burden only in foreign ports on American vessels, and a perfect equality of foreign vessels with our own in our own ports would gradually banish the latter altogether.

How true, nearly 140 years later, it is that "our own experience has taught us" that failure to compensate for such burdens is the same as allowing other nations to regulate our commerce. The only difference lies in the fact that today the burden is not discriminatory duties levied against our ships in foreign ports but the maintenance of an American standard of living that is higher than that of any other nation in the world. This is a burden to our shipping for which we should be cheerfully willing to pay.

II. The handicaps of a high standard of living must not cripple our trade

Subsidies are not only universal but they should be considered as a peculiarly American problem if we are to possess ships to carry our overseas trade. We must continue the policy at which we have made a successful beginning and adhere to it consistently through every political change and in defiance of every attack at home or abroad. I say it is of particular significance to us because we pay our workers higher wages than do the other nations—not only the crews of our vessels but those that build them, those that mine our iron, those that work in our oil fields. I shall not attempt to present the comparative costs of construction and operation for all our maritime rivals, but I shall cite some significant comparisons with Great Britain, the nation whose standard of living is second only to ours.

In the American Merchant Marine Problem, published by the National Industrial Conference Board, the percentage in which American shipbuilding costs exceed the British is given as follows:

	Percent
Cargo vessels	60
Tankers	59
Passenger and cargo	54

These were estimated at a time when British yards were operating at nearer to normal capacity than were our own yards. In Shipping and Shipbuilding Subsidies, to which I have referred, these figures are broken down and analyzed in terms of the various cost elements in construction. Of particular interest, however, is the calculation of the approximate construction-cost or capital-charge differential on cargo vessels per dead-weight ton per year. It is given as $3.33. Added to this is an estimated average operating-cost differential per dead-weight ton per operating year (estimated at 11 months to allow for lay-up) of $1.75. This consists of the difference in wages, subsistence, and other overhead items. The sum of these two differentials would be $5.08 per dead-weight ton per year.

With these figures from the Department of Commerce, I shall venture one further calculation, without pretending to offer it as anything more than hypothetical deduction: We now have, normally, about 5,000,000 gross tons of shipping in foreign trade, which is approximately the equivalent of 7,500,000 dead-weight tons. If, therefore, our shipowners have against them a total fixed-charge and operating-cost differential of $5 per dead-weight ton per year, as compared with their British competitors, they would require a total subsidy of $37,500,000 a year to put them on an equal footing with the British. Of course, this hypothetical figure is based on new tonnage without reference to annual decreases in capital charges. It serves as an approximation, however, of the amount of Government aid justifiable merely to put our shipping upon an equal footing with the British.

A recent detailed study by the merchant-marine planning committee of the Shipping Board lends further emphasis to this point and shows an even higher differential in favor of British shipping. The following tables show the capital and operating differentials in the first and eleventh years, the average, and the relation of the annual average to the original investment. A simple calculation will reveal that on these figures the difference in each case is more than $8 per dead-weight ton per year.

Summary of capital and operating differentials against typical American freighter (coal) as compared with similar British freighter

The same study from which I have quoted gives a detailed comparison of wages and subsistence costs on 33 foreign vessels as compared with those on American ships of similar type, tonnage, fuel, and trade, ranging from 2,510 to 13,370 tons. I shall not insert these figures in detail but shall summarize the average differential for the ships of each nation:

Not only does the American shipowner have to bear the cost of better wages, food, and accommodation for the American seaman, but ultimately he pays for the higher standard of living in the trades that contribute to shipbuilding. Taking the wages per hour in the 12 principal shipbuilding trades in four countries, we arrive at the following contrast: United States, 69 to 79 cents; Great Britain, 30.5 to 34.6 cents; Germany, 21.9 cents; Italy, 17.5 to 20.4 cents.

I need not cite further from the mass of statistics available on this subject. These are sufficient to demonstrate beyond question the absolute necessity of compensating our shipping companies if they are to continue operation with competition of this type. The very moderate payments under our postal contracts are far from being "fat doles" under these circumstances. They are extremely moderate compensations for the performance of a great public service and the maintenance of a national necessity.

E. THE HISTORY OF OUR MERCHANT-MARINE LEGISLATION

I have stated the case for a merchant marine, shown that Government help is necessary to the establishment and maintenance of American shipping, and recalled the humiliating and alarming situation in which we found ourselves at the outbreak of the World War. We may look back with pride upon the manner in which we met that crisis and view our present merchant-marine legislation with the satisfaction of knowing that it is a sound beginning toward permanent mercantile independence. Moreover, it is one of the notable instances when our two major parties have adjourned their political differences and united their efforts in a great contribution to the national welfare. I fervently hope that our merchant marine may thrive through the same cooperation in the future.

I. The Shipping Act of 1916

I have already cited President Wilson's first message to Congress in 1914, in which he declared himself in favor of a merchant marine sufficient to carry the bulk of our commerce. He continued, in that speech, as follows:

> The Government must open those gates for trade, and open them wide; open them before it is altogether profitable to open them, or altogether reasonable to ask private capital to open them.

In this determination to have the Government take a hand in repairing the mistakes of the half century preceding, he was followed by both parties, and under his leadership was passed the Shipping Act of 1916, dedicated to—the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States, and for other purposes.

This act was adopted before we were at war or expected to be involved in war. It created the Shipping Board, with wide regulatory powers over water-borne commerce, and authorized it to organize corporations for the purpose of acquiring or building and operating merchant vessels. Later, under this authority, was established the Emergency Fleet Corporation, now the Merchant Fleet Corporation, on April 16, 1917.

Everyone remembers our unprecedented shipbuilding activities during our period at war. The number of shipyards increased from 22 to 212, employing 350,000 men. At a cost of approximately $3,500,000,000 we launched 2,300 vessels totaling 9,400,000 tons. Our total foreign trade tonnage, including ships otherwise acquired, rose 10,250,000, or 10 times what it had been in 1914.

The wastes of this hasty construction program were enormous and its costs fabulous, for it was considered that, in such an emergency, a ship was justified if she were able to make a single round trip to Europe. In fact, the total value of world shipping in 1914 was estimated at $1,450,000,000, or less than one half of the cost of our war construction program. The result was that after the war a great number of these ships were found of little use for competitive peacetime duties. Nevertheless, the Shipping Board possessed, in 1920, sufficient serviceable shipping to establish 38 regular routes to 550 foreign ports.

II. The Merchant Marine Act of 1920

The Merchant Marine Act of 1920, this time passed by Republican majorities with substantial Democratic support, attempted to consolidate the position of our new ocean-going tonnage and declared it to be our future shipping policy—

That it is necessary for the national defense and for the proper growth of its foreign and domestic commerce that the United States shall have a merchant marine of the best-equipped and most suitable types of vessels sufficient to carry the greater portion of its commerce and serve as a naval or military auxiliary in time of war or national emergency, ultimately to be owned and operated privately by citizens of the United States.

This provided for a construction-loan fund of $125,000,000 to consist of the proceeds of the sale of Shipping Board vessels to private concerns undertaking to conduct regular services to be prescribed by the Shipping Board. Several other encouragements to private shipping were inserted. The disadvantages to American shipping were so great, in view of the differentials I have described and which were substantially also true at that time, that the effect of this act was practically negligible. Only 15 ships, with a total of 100,000 gross tons, were built, 13 of them for local trades. Private companies were unwilling to buy or to build tonnage in the face of probable operating losses. As a consequence, according to Senator WHITE, American foreign trade carried in American ships declined as follows: 1921, 51 percent; 1923, 44 percent; 1926, 34 percent; 1927, 32 percent. Of our 212 war-time shipyards, only 12 were remaining in 1928, largely idle. Out of a world construction, during 1922–27, of 1,039 vessels of 4,500 tons or more, we built only 40; out of 307 modern motor ships, we built 2; and in March 1928 only 2 percent of world construction was in our yards.

No new American ships were placed in our foreign trade, while 800 foreign ships, representing 42 nations, were assigned to our commerce to reap the rich harvest we were letting slip away from us. We lost ground in 47 of our 59 principal ports, ceding a larger portion of trade to foreign ships. In the meanwhile the Shipping Board was operating at a huge annual deficit ultimately to be borne by the taxpayer.

The situation was a serious one. Even under these circumstances the Shipping Board was rendering invaluable services which I shall discuss later in more detail. The savings to the Nation—in freight rates, in shipping revenues kept at home, in the movement of our surpluses when foreign shipping was temporarily withdrawn—amounted to billions of dollars. We could not afford to scrap the instrument of these great benefits, nor would we have considered reverting to our costly and dangerous dependence upon foreign shipping. Yet the Government naturally wished to retire from the shipping business and to divest itself of the necessity of building the replacements that would be required to maintain a merchant marine longer than the useful life of its war-time ships.

III. The Merchant Marine Act of 1928

An excellent solution was found in the Jones-White Act which became law on May 22, 1928. Here again there was bipartisan cooperation with a final vote in the Senate of 29 Republicans for, 22 Democrats for, 11 Republicans against, and 9 Democrats against. In the House the bill was quickly passed without a record vote.

This bill was an amendment to the 1920 act, whose purposes it reaffirmed as the policy of the Government. It introduced a number of far-reaching reforms in our merchant marine laws, but its principal provisions are those which have made it possible for private companies to purchase tonnage from the Shipping Board, to undertake regular services on prescribed routes, and to adopt programs for new construction and replacements, subject to the specifications of the Navy Department. The most important of these was a modification of the Ocean Mail Act of 1891, under which the Postmaster General was authorized to conclude contracts for the carriage of foreign mails for periods of 5 to 10 years. The prescribed rates of compensation under this original act were from 66.66 cents a mile for vessels of class 4, having a minimum speed of 12 knots, to $4 a mile for class 1, with a speed of 20 knots or better. This act remained practically inoperative, however, as an encouragement to shipping, as the compensation was insufficient to offset the capital and operating factors against American shipowners. Foreign ships continued to carry the lion's share of our mails, receiving in 1928 under yearly contracts with the Postmaster General approximately $3,000,000.

The Jones-White or Merchant Marine Act of 1928 reclassified contract ships and established the compensation for regular specified mail service on a scale ranging from $1.50 per nautical mile for vessels of class 7, with a required gross register of 2,500 tons and speed of 10 knots, to $12 for ships of class 1, having a speed of 24 knots and exceeding 20,000 gross tons. This was in recognition of the fact that as speed is increased operating costs mount rapidly. The postal contracts under this law are to run for 10 years and require the maintenance of specified regular services, with a minimum number of sailings, under penalty of deductions, and the construction of new tonnage as agreed. The contractors for mail service are further placed under the following limitations and obligations:

(a) In the event of a national emergency ships may be commandeered, and the owner shall not be entitled to damages resulting.

(b) The ships must be of the sizes, types, and speeds deemed by the Postmaster General to be best adapted to the service contracted for.

(c) The ships must remain documented under the laws of the United States for not less than 20 years.

(d) All licensed officers and two thirds of the crews must be American citizens.

(e) Ships must be built in the United States.

(f) Ships must be fitted and equipped with the most modern, efficient, and economical machinery and other appliances.

(g) All ships must be built with particular reference to "economical conversion into an auxiliary naval vessel."

(h) The ships must carry and suitably accommodate mail messengers free of charge.

(i) Passenger and combination vessels built under postal contract must be fitted with bulkheads in excess of international safety requirements.

These are the principal conditions under which mail contracts are awarded to private concerns. The other important measure of the act is the increase of the construction-loan revolving fund, established in 1920, to $250,000,000 and its modification to permit loans up to 75 percent of the construction cost of a vessel. Loans are payable in 20 equal annual installments, and they bear interest under the act as amended in 1931 at not less than 3½ percent. Prior to this amendment interest was fixed at the lowest yield on any Government security, and subsequent legislation authorizing the issuance of Treasury notes bearing no interest led, contrary to the intention of the authors of this act, to the granting of 12 loans bearing effective rates of less than 3 percent. The average effective rate of interest upon these construction loans was more than 4 percent.

F. THE OPERATION AND EFFECTS OF THE 1928 ACT

I. The Government was relieved of enormous Shipping Board operating losses

Prior to this act the average annual operating losses of the Shipping Board were $40,431,000 during the 6-year period 1921–26. For 1931 the operating losses of the Fleet Corporation and the administrative expenses of the Shipping Board were only $6,346,000, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, only $8,431,000. In other words, by making it possible for private interests to take over the services the Shipping Board has been operating, the Government has saved about $32,000,000 a year of losses it could not otherwise have avoided. In considering the 1934 independent offices appropriation, the estimated operating losses for the next year was given as only $3,500,000, or one eleventh of the deficit 10 years ago. The cost of the ocean mail contracts by which private enterprise has been induced to take over the services of the Merchant Fleet Corporation has been as follows:

Fiscal year	Contract payments	Mail costs would have been at poundage rates	Net cost of postal contracts
1929	$9,304,217.82	$1,685,159.97	$7,916,057.85
1930	13,066,440.87	2,272,730.44	10,793,710.43
1931	18,818,039.76	2,710,645.82	16,107,393.94
1932	22,431,791.04	3,267,453.33	19,164,337.71

These costs are increasing as the liquidation of the Fleet Corporation progresses, but they remain less than half of the former losses of the fleet under Government operation. Thus the taxpayer profits from reduced Government expenditures, and the farmer and manufacturer profit by the establishment of a soundly managed, privately operated merchant marine. The difference in the cost between the poundage rate and the payments under the contracts is, frankly, a subsidy to shipping for the maintenance of a merchant marine under private operation. Opponents of the postal contracts are correct in stating that we are paying excessive rates for the carriage of mails. But they forget to add that the public policy declared by Congress as the purpose of this legislation is also the promotion of trade and of national defense.

II. Capital replacement cost of $500,000,000 shifted from public to private enterprise

It is estimated that, with the bulk of our vessels rapidly approaching retirement age, the Shipping Board would have had to spend $500,000,000 in replacements during the next 10 years to keep our flag on the seas. Out of 553 ships, 500 totaling 2,213,000 tons will have reached retirement age by January 1941. By getting out of the shipping business and by requiring new construction under the postal contracts, the Government is relieving itself of this burden and shifting it to the shoulders of private enterprise.

III. The measure has brought about new construction employing 40,000 men

Under the terms of the postal contracts, and in the confidence that the Government will keep its faith, private initiative has launched an ambitious construction program that has produced some of the finest tonnage on the seas today. These activities to date are summarized as follows:

	Number of vessels	Gross tons	Amount of loan from construction loan fund
Under act of 1920	15	106,478	$18,629,300.00
Under act of 1928:
New vessels completed	40	422,584	105,230,973.40
New vessels not completed	2	35,500	10,946,264.00
Reconditioned vessels completed	39	264,192	12,743,283.51
Reconditioned vessels not completed	1	4,963	178,773.75
Total construction and reconditioning	98	833,717	147,734,794.66

The total of the loans under the construction fund is less than 75 percent of the actual costs of construction, which was $213,984,579.30. Of this approximately 80 percent, or $170,000,000, goes to labor either employed in the shipyards or engaged in the industries supplying the materials and equipment required. As I have pointed out before, it is estimated that 18,000 men in the former and an equal number in the allied industries have found regular employment as the result of this program. This, therefore, has afforded some measure of incidental relief during the difficult years that have passed since the passage of the 1928 act.

IV. Construction loans bearing adequate interest, payments being met

Loose talk of defaulted payments and negligible interest charges on the construction loans is frequently heard from the enemies of the merchant marine. The facts, as supplied by the Shipping Board, indicate that, during this period of Federal aid to many lines of enterprise, shipping receiving construction loans has a relatively clean record. Here are the figures I have obtained:

Statistics on construction loan fund

Total cost of vessels—57 new, 40 converted	$213,984,579.30
Total loans authorized	147,680,566.66
Total amount repaid as of Dec. 31, 1932	15,415,982.54
Total amount of interest paid up to Dec. 31, 1932	8,017,030.52
Total amount due as of Dec. 31, 1932	107,868,508.00
Total amount of loans past due as of Mar. 31, 1933	1,570,525.00
Average rate of interest return on construction loans—percent	4
As of Apr. 30, 1933, cash balance in loan fund	14,314,967.10

I understand that in the case of the relatively insignificant amount of past-due payments—which are surprisingly small considering that many of contracting companies assumed obligations under these contracts before they were touched by the depression—in each instance arrangements have been made for reasonable extensions of time. Moreover, I have it on good authority that not a single penny of interest on these loans has been defaulted. Under the Merchant Marine Act of 1928, I should say, shipping provides better security for its loans, pays higher interest, and is less in arrears than most of the enterprises that are now receiving Government assistance in various forms. Moreover, the interest received is higher than that paid for such loans granted to shipping by several foreign countries. It is well known, for example, that the Cunard Line only paid 2¾ percent interest on the loan for building the Mauretania and Lusitania. The British Government has $472,000,000 of such construction loans outstanding. The charges that our Government is losing money on these loans and that the taxpayer is being assessed for the benefit of a privileged few is absolutely false.

V. Taxpayer would lose by cancelation of postal contracts

Were the postal contracts to be canceled, however, the taxpayer would certainly lose, as every one of these loans were contracted in consideration of the mail subvention. The shipping companies would not only find it impossible to make their payments, but they would probably, in many cases, be forced into liquidation. Then the Government would have to reassume the losses of public operation. The following figures, supplied by the Shipping Board, show the relationship between the mail revenues, the profits, and the other elements in the 1931 operations of all the steamship companies receiving Government aid in the form of postal contracts:

Companies under postal contracts—operations for 1931: Summary

Total revenue from operations	$123,798,822
Mail revenue (included in above)	21,354,784
Net profit after depreciation, administrative expense, and interest	1,265,722
Assets of all companies	300,000,000
Total ship sales and construction-loan mortgages to Shipping Board as of Dec. 31, 1931	124,159,997
Depreciation charges, 1931	9,438,342
Interest paid to Shipping Board and others during 1931	3,480,046

This tabulation shows that 20 percent of the revenues of these companies for 1931 were the contract payments for the carriage of mails, while only 1 percent of the revenues went to profits. Had the postal contracts been reduced or canceled, it is evident that a ruinous loss would have appeared. Indeed, many of the companies showed operating losses. Mr. T. V. O'Connor, former Chairman of the Shipping Board, stated that "interference with the ocean mail contracts will mean the end of the American merchant marine", and few will challenge that statement in the light of the data I have presented.

VI. Comparison of our foreign-trade tonnage, 1914 with 1932

As the result of the World War and of the subsequent merchant-marine legislation, we have today six times more tonnage actively engaged in foreign trade than we had in 1914, as the following comparison, by trade routes, will show:

Trade route	Number of vessels		Gross tonnage
	1914	1932	1914	1932
United States-Europe	6	193	69,212	1,194,158
South America	4	169	24,011	403,341
Pacific coast-Far East	6	87	75,615	706,103
United States-Africa	None	20		113,417
Pacific coast-Australasia	3	19	18,495	117,576
Total overseas	19	388	187,333	2,534,595
Nearby, Caribbean, West Indies, Canada	66	164	322,938	747,427
Grand total	85	552	510,271	3,282,022

G. THE BENEFITS DERIVED FROM OUR MERCHANT MARINE

It is proper to consider as one consecutive achievement the results of our construction of a merchant marine during the emergencies of the World War and the results of the steps we have subsequently taken to secure it as a permanent asset in our national life. Our merchant marine cannot be dismissed as a temporary expedient created to meet the isolated phenomenon of a war and then to be laid aside. The benefits we have derived from our ocean tonnage should be appraised just as though we had possessed a merchant marine prior to the outbreak of the World War.

I. Our success in the war hinged upon ocean transportation

No one needs to be reminded in detail of the importance of shipping during the World War. But in considering the present subject it is well to remember the following facts: We were engaged in a major war whose scene of hostilities was 3,000 miles across submarine-infested waters. Our allies, it is generally conceded, faced probable defeat unless sufficient war materials and troops could be transported to Europe before the enemy should win a decisive victory. This we succeeded in doing to a degree that turned the tide and brought to a successful conclusion the greatest war in our history. For this great achievement in transportation much of the credit goes to ships built and manned by Americans and flying our flag.

II. Overseas trade between 1914 and 1922 made us a creditor nation

Foreign capital had played a large part in our westward development and in the establishment of our great industrial equipment. In 1914, as a consequence, we were Europe's debtor to the extent of about $2,500,000,000. In 1922, the close of the World War period, our public and private obligations were paid off and we had a balance of foreign credits of about $15,000,000,000. In the short space of 8 years we moved from an unfavorable position into the dominating role in international finance. Much of the goods by which this transfer of wealth was effected was carried in American vessels—to the extent of $9,410,000,000 in 1918–22. This was one of the early dividends from our investment in a merchant marine.

III. The Shipping Board saved our farmers nearly $1,000,000,000

After the war American shipping twice came to the rescue of the farmers of the South and Middle West whose principal markets were Europe. In 1924, owing to world conditions at that time, a great volume of foreign shipping was again withdrawn from our trade. A wheat surplus of 250,000 bushels, according to testimony presented to the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, threatened to demoralize prices and to bankrupt our farmers. The Shipping Board threw its ships into the breach, and, at the cost of less than $1,000,000, averted the national calamity of a price collapse amounting to $600,000,000 or more. Again, at the time of the British coal strike in 1926, foreign tonnage was withdrawn from our trade and the Shipping Board put into service its laid-up ships. This prevented another loss of two to three hundred million dollars to our farms and industries. In other words, a foreign labor disturbance would have cost us, had we had no ships, a sum equal to an assessment of $2 per capita for our entire population. These are impressive figures to bear in mind when there is talk of scuttling our merchant marine.

IV. A $2,000,000,000 freight bill reduction

According to competent testimony, the existence of large American merchant tonnage since the war has had the effect of reducing by 20 percent the freight rates we would have paid. In the movements of cotton, grain, and our principal manufactured exports this has amounted to $150,000,000 saved annually, or approximately $2,000,000,000 for the period since the war. We remain today, thanks to the legislation that has made possible continued private operation of merchant shipping, in a position to exercise a large measure of control over ocean freights paid by our factories and farms and to prevent discriminations in the future against our trade.

V. Three billion dollars in shipping revenues earned by our ships

The Nation's ocean passenger and freight bill for the decade of 1921–30 was $9,000,000,000, or an average of $900,000,000 annually. Of this sum our own ships earned one third, or $3,000,000,000, which would otherwise have been paid to foreign concerns and spent abroad. Had we but carried, as in 1914, only one tenth of our foreign trade, our share of this sum would have been only $900,000,000, a difference of $2,100,000,000. Before the war our shipping was actually earning only $35,000,000 a year, of which about $26,000,000 was spent in this country for supplies, wages, repairs, and so forth. In 1931, a subnormal year in foreign trade, the revenues of our merchant marine were $187,000,000, of which $141,000,000 was spent in this country for these same items. Should we forego these great invisible additions to our trade balance for the sake of saving the relatively insignificant sums paid under our ocean mail contracts?

VI. Our vessels have opened new continents to our goods

I have already touched upon the development of our trade in markets in which we formerly had little participation owing to the lack of American-flag shipping. Since 19 ships have been placed in the African trade, in which we had no services before, our trade has increased by 325 percent. Our South American and far eastern commerce, in each of which only 5 American vessels were engaged, have increased 190 percent and 380 percent, respectively, with 89 ships serving the former and 140 ships going to the Orient. The difference in our trade with these three continents in 1914 and in 1927 is more than $2,000,000,000.

VII. The merchant marine as a vital part of our national defenses

Last but not least among the benefits we have derived from our reborn merchant marine is its great contribution to our national safety. I have mentioned our humiliating experiences during the Spanish-American War and the cruise of the White Squadron. As long as we have a merchant marine there can be no repetition of these disgraces. On another occasion we were obliged to purchase from a foreign naval architect the plans for one of our battleships, as there was no one here sufficiently familiar with modern construction to be entrusted with the work. Under our postal contracts, however, naval architecture has again become a profession for Americans and a promising field for our great technical genius. Moreover, shipyards will be kept open and skilled labor trained and ready to meet any emergencies of war.

Prior to the World War we had no Naval Reserve, because we had few vessels on which to train sailors for deep-water service. Practically every other important power not only has a merchant-marine personnel partly enrolled in its naval reserve, but in many cases grants large subsidies to merchant vessels in compensation for their usefulness in this respect. At last we, too, are developing a reserve of officers and young men fitted to serve the country efficiently in the event of a national emergency.

Under our merchant-marine legislation the new tonnage constructed in fulfillment of ocean mail contracts must conform to certain specifications of the Navy for vessels to serve as naval auxiliaries. The World War demonstrated the value of merchant ships for this purpose, and our recent policy of naval economy renders such measures particularly desirable. Thus we are virtually transferring to private concerns some measure of a public burden.

H. OUR SHIPPING INFERIORITY NOT YET OVERCOME; EFFORTS MUST CONTINUE

I. We still carry an unusually small proportion of our trade

We may be proud of our progress in developing our merchant marine, but we do not have any reason for self-complacence and relaxation of our efforts. As I have already pointed out, we have in foreign trade less tonnage per capita and per export ton than any other maritime nation. Between 1922 and 1931, inclusive, we carried less than one third of our foreign commerce, and no more of it than Great Britain carried for us, as the following table will show:

	Imports	Percentage	Exports	Percentage	Imports and exports	Percentage
	Tons		Tons		Tons
American vessels	75,728,000	31.0	95,977,000	30.1	171,705,000	30.5
British carried	70,141,000	28.8	98,630,000	31.0	168,771,000	30.0
Others carried	98,140,000	40.2	123,865,000	38.9	222,005,000	39.5
Total	244,009,000	------	318,472,000	------	562,481,000	------

Compared with Great Britain, our ocean-going tonnage is only one half as great, and that part of it in foreign trade is only one sixth. Even if we were never to attempt to compete with Great Britain in the carrying trade between foreign countries, we should at least, as I have shown, carry a larger portion of our own. Before the war British ships carried 52 percent of total world trade, 92 percent of her empire trade, 62 percent of the trade between the empire and other nations, and 30 percent of the trade between foreign nations. She still today holds the dominant place on the ocean, with her ships taking care of 45 percent of world commerce, 60 percent of her own, and 30 percent of ours. Her maritime success is attributed to her strong industrial position with access to raw materials, her far-flung empire with coaling stations and seaports, her large coal exports compensating for the importation of foodstuffs, and her intelligent policy of Government encouragement to shipping. We must not, however, permit these factors in her favor to reduce us again to a mercantile colony.

II. We are inferior to other powers in tonnage, speed, and obsolescence

As of September 30, 1932, our ocean-going tonnage of 2,000 tons or more comprised 1,584 vessels totaling 9,252,000 gross tons, distributed as follows:

	Vessels	Gross tons
Sold for scrapping	126	719,000
Laid-up Government fleet	137	830,000
Inactive	263	1,549,000
Tankers in foreign and domestic trade	354	2,443,000
Ships in domestic trade	415	1,939,000
Ships in foreign trade	552	3,282,000
Active	1,321	7,664,000

The following tables reveal a serious deficiency in new tonnage and in tonnage of commercial speed as compared with our five chief maritime rivals:

Type and country	Gross tons	Percentage owned by each country	Percentage of gross tonnage of each country, 10 or less years old
Combination passenger and freight:
United States	1,555,296	15.5	32.5
Great Britain	4,257,858	42.6	41.3
Japan	858,861	8.6	27.6
Germany	1,098,884	11.0	57.6
Italy	881,461	8.8	59.6
France	1,349,477	13.5	37.9
Total	10,008,837	100.0	41.7
Freight:
United States	5,254,378	22.2	1.1
Great Britain	11,110,478	46.9	40.7
Japan	2,276,170	9.6	17.0
Germany	2,064,946	8.7	34.1
Italy	1,634,258	6.9	13.6
France	1,347,370	5.7	16.2
Total	23,687,600	100.0	25.8
Tankers:
United States	2,442,626	42.5	11.3
Great Britain	2,504,245	43.5	53.2
Japan	122,315	2.1	58.8
Germany	127,311	2.2	56.6
Italy	337,150	5.9	18.4
France	220,329	3.8	55.4
Total	5,953,976	100.0	33.6

Summarizing these tables, we have the following:

Breakdown by nations, all types of ships

Country	Gross tons	Percent owned by each country	Percent under 10 years old	Percent of tonnage, speed 12 or more knots
United States	[1] 9,252,300	23.5	9.1	28.4
Great Britain	17,882,581	45.3	42.6	56.0
Japan	3,257,346	8.3	21.3	49.6
Germany	3,291,141	8.3	42.8	65.2
Italy	2,852,869	7.2	28.4	44.9
France	2,914,176	7.4	29.2	57.4
Total and average	39,450,413	100.0	31.0	49.1

[1] Only 3,282,000 tons of this in foreign trade, exclusive of tankers.

In other words, our percentage of vessels under 10 years old is less than one third the general average, and our percentage of vessels capable of 12 knots or more is little more than half of the general average. This means that if we are to keep our flag on the sea, we must look forward to further steps to compensate for these deficiencies in the near future.

III. Other nations are outbuilding us rapidly

At present Great Britain is outbuilding us 9 to 1 in terms of tonnage and 13 to 1 in terms of ships. As for the other maritime nations, here is a comparison of ships of 15,000 tons or more constructed in the past decade:

	Number of vessels	Gross tons
United States	11	226,071
Great Britain	49	1,036,216
Japan	3	51,448
France	10	288,845
Italy	12	344,340
Germany	10	262,911
Total	95	2,209,831

In proportion to our needs, we are building less than any other nation. On the other hand, we are scrapping or laying up more obsolete or unserviceable tonnage than any other nation. Here is the record for 1922–31:

Country	Tonnage scrapped	Tonnage laid up
United States	[1] 2,560,000	3,588,000
British Empire	2,388,000	3,340,000
Italy	855,000	619,000
France	773,000	931,000
Japan	215,000	256,000
Germany	147,000	1,103,000
Others	892,000	2,863,000

[1] 700,000 more tons to be scrapped, making 3,260,000.

I. THE ORIGINS, MOTIVES, AND FALLACIES OF THE PROPAGANDA FROM FOREIGN SOURCES

I have given the above comparative figures regarding the merchant marines of the principal powers in such detail in order to present ample evidence of the falsity of the charges frequently brought against our merchant marine policy. I shall quote some of these. First, however, I wish to emphasize the fact that a large volume of deceptive material advocating the abandonment of our merchant marine appears in print in this country regularly. It is my considered opinion that much of this is inspired and paid for by foreign interests. To my personal knowledge, a professor at one of our leading universities was commissioned by an internationalist organization to write a book demonstrating the errors of our ways in merchant marine matters and advocating permitting foreigners to handle our foreign trade. After he had made a preliminary study of the facts, however, he refused the job, and wrote in favor of supporting our merchant marine. Probably there are many other examples of the same type of efforts to influence public opinion against our best interests. We must not be misled by them, least of all at the present time, when our representatives are to sit in council with delegates of other maritime nations in an attempt to reach agreements of mutual economic benefit. We can make no concessions in this respect.

Each foreign nation which has placed new tonnage in our trade—more than 800 ships flying 42 different flags—is determined that we shall not build up a merchant marine, for our annual passenger and freight bill of hundreds of millions of dollars is the greatest plum of world trade. I quote from the report of a committee appointed by the British Board of Trade (corresponds to our Department of Commerce) to study British shipping problems after the war:

I. Some misleading statements from England

The door has been left open to foreign enterprise which it may be difficult hereafter to combat with success. * * * Our findings and recommendations are based on two hypotheses, neither of which is likely to be controverted—the first, that the maritime ascendency of the Empire must be maintained at all costs, and second, that the grave wastage sustained by the mercantile marine during the war must, therefore, be repaired without delay. (The italics are mine.)

This opinion is so strongly expressed that I doubt that advice from this source as to our merchant marine policy would be exactly dispassionate and to our unquestionable best interests. Yet here is some advice on our war debts and shipping from Sir Alan G. Anderson, chairman of the Orient Steam Navigation Co., who is quoted as follows, December 1932:

* * * From the official reports of the United States Shipping Board it appears that during 5 years to June 1928, the United States taxpayer paid in operating losses and in laying-up expenses of merchant ships about £5,000,000 at par in each year—the total loss for the 12 years from 1920, including the operating loss named above, but excluding interest, has been about £600,000,000 at par.

* * * It is difficult to exaggerate the injury the United States of America does to world trade, and incidentally to herself, by devoting such a mass of wealth to rejecting payment by her debtors in the form of shipping services. It almost seems that the more the world in its anxiety to be honest pours its much-needed spending power into the United States of America, the more resolutely the United States of America applies that wealth to prevent the debtor from repaying or recovering his prosperity, which is as necessary for the prosperity of the farmer and industrialist and investor of the United States of America as for anyone.

I fail to agree with Sir Alan Anderson that we are "devoting such a mass of wealth to rejecting payment by our debtors." Moreover, I believe I have discussed sufficiently where our farmers would have been in 1924 and 1926 had we had no ships to operate when the British were unable to move our exportable produce and how much they are saved today on ocean freights. Another comment on our merchant marine comes from Mr. Walter Runciman, president of the Board of Trade, which I have already cited, in his address at the annual dinner of the British Chamber of Shipping, as quoted in the New York Times, February 16, 1933:

* * * Blaming the plight of world shipping on the subsidized overbuilding of foreign countries, Mr. Runciman said that the United States had three times as much tonnage as before the World War.

"I have underestimated the extent of the American mercantile marine", he said, "but I was thinking of those ships that were fit for trade."

Laughter swept the hall at this remark.

"If you count them all in, the Americans have nine times as much as in 1913, and a very costly luxury it has proven", the speaker added.

"I know that in some quarters it is regarded as very dangerous to say anything about America at the present time. I hope I shall exercise my native caution in not going too far, but I believe that much of the misfortune which has befallen the cargo fleets of the world comes from overbuilding, and that those who went the farthest have done the most harm.

"How can these nations continue subsidies on the present scale. Uneconomic subsidies have now become one of the vices of a great many powers. We in Britain do not go cap in hand to the Government and beg for artificial assistance. All we ask is that we should have fair play and no favor. * * *"

II. We are the only nation that is not overbuilding, and we are scrapping most Right here let me recall some of the figures I have given earlier in detail. In spite of our inferiority, Great Britain is outbuilding us 13 to 1. She has $472,000,000 in construction loans outstanding for this purpose—three times as much as we have lent. Then why does Mr. Runciman consider that "subsidies have now become one of the vices of a great many powers"? Is it a vice for us and a virtue for Britain? Are we overbuilding, or is Great Britain? Then I wish to repeat the figures I gave on scrapping. We have scrapped 3,210,000 tons and laid up 3,588,000 tons—in each case more than any other nation. We have not built a fraction as much.

I am informed that the world surplus of tonnage, for which we are held responsible by Mr. Runciman, is in the neighborhood of 14,000,000 tons. I understand that the total world over-age tonnage is also approximately 14,000,000. In other words, if all obsolete ships were to be scrapped, there would be no surplus. Where is this old tonnage? We are retiring ours. According to my information, Great Britain is selling many of her old ships, instead of breaking them up, to the minor nations at virtually scrap prices. This accounts for some of the surplus tonnage, and might even be construed as a sort of conspiracy against our own maritime progress.

III. Our competitors building uneconomical ships for naval use

The statement keeps recurring in foreign comments and in their echoes on this side of the water that we are building uneconomically. This is quite the reverse of the truth, which is that the other principal maritime powers are launching for our trade vessel after vessel that will never pay its way in operating expenses. This is not an act of philanthropy toward our shippers and travelers but rather a policy of having our ocean express business pay the main cost of potential naval auxiliaries. It will be remembered that at the Washington Arms Conference in 1922, naval competition in capital ships was checked by treaty, and a ratio of naval power was established. We paid for this by sacrificing our then naval supremacy and scrapping 850,000 tons of war vessels—more than was scrapped by the British and Japanese combined. Naval competition was transferred from armed ships to merchant vessels that could be armed in an emergency. Here are the ships which are uneconomical by reason of their size or their speed that have been built abroad during the past 8 years:

Vessels over 25,000 gross tons built in last 8 years

	Tons	Speed	Year built
Great Britain:
Princess Elizabeth	73,000	30	(1)
Empress of Britain	42,348	24	1931
Georgic	27,759	18	1932
Britannic	26,943	18	1930
Empress of Japan	26,032	21	1930
Total (5 vessels)	196,082
France:
Normandie	68,000	28	(1)
Ile de France	43,153	23	1926
L'Atlantique	42,512	21	1930
Champlain	28,912	19	1931
Lafayette	25,178	17	1929
Total (5 vessels)	207,755
Italy:
Rex	50,100	27	1932
Conte di Savoia	48,500	27	1932
Augustus	32,650	19	1927
Conte Grande	25,661	21
Roma	32,582	21	1926
Total (5 vessels)	189,493		1928
Germany:
Bremen	51,656	26	1929
Europa	49,746	26	1928
Cap Arcona (South America)	27,561	20	1927
Total (3 vessels)	128,963
Grand total (18 vessels)	722,293

[1] Under construction.

In the meanwhile we have not built a single vessel of this class for the reason that they are unprofitable to operate. They are merely potential war vessels. The following table gives for a ship of this class the approximate cost of speed in excess of 20 knots in terms of fuel consumed and of passenger and cargo space sacrificed to accommodate the engines.

Speed in knots	Indicated horsepower	Tons of oil consumed per round trip to Europe
20	45,000	6,000
22	55,000	6,600
24	71,000	7,900
26	92,000	9,420
28	120,000	11,400
30	160,000	14,200

Not only are we not building ships with excessive speed, high costs, and relatively small capacity for their size but we are deficient in smaller vessels that are useful in war, as well as in peace. In 1928 we had only 70 vessels of 15 knots or more that were suitable for naval use, while Great Britain had 227 ships of this type and in superior condition.

J. THE PERENNIAL DOMESTIC ATTACKS ON OUR POSTAL CONTRACTS

While our maritime competitors are gambling on our neglect of maintaining and developing our merchant marine, and hoping that they may continue to pay for concealed navies with the proceeds of carrying 70 percent of our trade, our merchant marine faces a constant sniping from enemies at home. Every year some attempt is made to cancel the mail contracts, or to reduce them. This year the independent offices appropriation bill contained an authorization for cancelation by the President of the United States, an altogether unnecessary and unethical power which, I am sure, the present occupant of the White House would be the last to invoke. Fortunately these attempts have not succeeded, but it is well to be warned of the misapprehensions under which some of the opponents of the postal contracts appear to be laboring.

I. Postal contracts and construction loans not "doles" to privileged few

The favorite general argument against our present merchant-marine legislation is that it bestows gifts upon private and presumably predatory interests to the detriment of other classes needing Government assistance. This point has now lost its strength, as the Government has, in fact, extended much greater financial assistance upon easier terms to practically every class in the country. Moreover, as I have shown, in this support of shipping the Government is saving itself and its taxpayers larger losses in the form of operating deficits of the Fleet Corporation. Finally, the figures show that the steamship companies under mail contracts are not making any appreciable profits and that they could not exist at all, least of all under present conditions, without this assistance from the Government.

II. The International Mercantile Marine not a Morgan company nor a foreign company

It is sometimes alleged that the International Mercantile Marine Co. is owned by the firm of J. P. Morgan and that there is no justification for awarding it an ocean mail contract. Others tell us it is essentially a foreign company. I am informed that the House of Morgan does not own a single share in the International Mercantile Marine. Moreover 96 percent of its stock is owned in this country, well distributed over the 48 States, and of the other 4 percent less than 1 percent is owned in Great Britain. This company and its predecessor, the American Line, have owned and operated ships under the American flag since 1870, and its present policy is to build up exclusively under the American flag. It has 30 offices throughout the United States, and it employs 9,000 agents and other employees in this country.

III. Misleading statements as to foreing-flag ships in contract lines

Corollary to the misinformation I have just referred to, is the statement sometimes heard to the effect that some of the contract lines, notably the International Mercantile Marine and the United Fruit Co., are using the proceeds of the subsidy to operate foreign-flag ships in competition with other American interests. As to the former, the facts are these: In view of the many disadvantages and popular indifference that were strangling American shipping, this company acquired, in the early part of this century, a large amount of foreign-flag tonnage. This was hailed as an important constructive step.

During and after the war it made strenuous efforts to Americanize its fleets, and entered into negotiations with a British syndicate for the sale of its entire British tonnage. As these were drawing to a successful conclusion, President Wilson made an urgent appeal that the sale be delayed until the Government might consider the advisability of disposing of such a large volume of shipping. Here is his letter to Mr. P. A. S. Franklin, president of the company:

WHITE HOUSE, November 18, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. FRANKLIN: With regard to the sale to the British Government of the International Mercantile Marine, may I not request no action be taken in the matter until the views of this Government are fully presented and considered?

Sincerely yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Negotiations were halted, and finally the following statement was published:

Announcement was made at the Shipping Board that the International Mercantile Marine Co. had today been advised of the Government's disinclination to give its approval to the proposed transfer to a British syndicate of the American ownership which has for years been vested in the International Mercantile Marine Co., of the latter's vessels now under British registry.

Bainbridge Colby, of the Shipping Board, stated that an offer by a British syndicate to acquire from the International Mercantile Marine Co. the tonnage in question had been under consideration for some time. The offer was expressly conditioned upon its approval by both the United States and the British Governments. The negotiations, he further stated, had been carried on by the International Mercantile Marine Co. with entire frankness, so far as the Government is concerned, and the decision now reached is due to the reluctance felt that an ownership which has so long been held in this country, covering so important a tonnage, should at this time and under the conditions now prevailing in shipping throughout the world be suffered to pass out of American hands.

The vessels immediately concerned in the syndicate's offer are approximately 85 in number, and aggregate 730,000 gross tons or, in their deadweight equivalent, about 1,000,000 tons. They include some of the most important vessels now engaged in trans-Atlantic service, such as the Olympic, and many other vessels of large type and familiar names.

The Government has announced its willingness to take over the ownership of these vessels upon the terms of the British offer, which is considered a fair price for tonnage of this exceptional character.

Notification has been sent to the International Mercantile Marine Co. of the Government's decision.

The Shipping Board promised to purchase these ships on the same terms as the British offer. This decision was later reversed, however, and the International Mercantile Marine was left holding this tonnage at a time when such a sale could not be effected.

Nevertheless, this company has succeeded in disposing of the bulk of its foreign ships through other means. In 1923 its foreign-flag ships numbered 92, with a gross tonnage of 1,175,243 representing an investment of $68,000,000. This has been reduced to 23 vessels of 314,123 tons, valued at only $15,000,000. These are ships it has been unable to sell. In the meanwhile the company's American tonnage has increased to 23 ships of 335,165 tons, valued at $35,000,000. At the present time most of the foreign-flag ships are laid up, owing to the depression, and in 3½ years they will have reached the retirement age. From these facts it is clear that there is no foundation for attacks on the International Merchant Marine on the basis of its foreign tonnage, and that it is loyally pursuing a policy of complete Americanization.

As for the United Fruit Line, it owns and operates a number of small ships under the flags of Central American Republics in conformity with their several laws for the encouragement of their merchant marines. This whole situation was thoroughly investigated by the House Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries before any contracts with the United Fruit Co. were entered into, and it was concluded that these ships, conforming with the admirable national aspirations of these neighbors of ours, were in no sense serious competitors of our merchant marine and that, moreover, it would be entirely impracticable for the company to divest itself of them.

IV. Americans have invested $132,235,000 in foreign companies

Finally, in discussing propaganda in this country aimed at crippling our merchant marine, it is worth while to mention the fact that there may be some significance in the great American security holdings in foreign shipping companies. American citizens have invested $43,575,000 in German companies, $23,000,000 in French, $14,400,000 in Italian, and $35,900,000 in British and Canadian shipping, to a total for all countries of $132,235,000. This means that there are in this country important interests that are necessarily hostile toward any measures by which our ships might gain a larger part of our lucrative carrying trade.

K. OUR FUTURE AS A MARITIME NATION

Few Americans realize the enormous stake they have in the future of American shipping. There are 15,000 miles of coastline whose 150 harbors and terminals used in foreign trade are valued by the Army engineers at $1,000,000,000 as result of an expenditure of $600,000,000 for their improvement. We have an ocean-going tonnage with an approximate book value of $628,000,000, and we have an investment of $100,000,000 in shipyards. When prosperity returns we may expect to have a normal foreign trade amounting to nearly $10,000,000,000 annually, of which more than half represents exports which give employment to our people. We have a great traveling public that crosses the ocean in the hundreds of thousands each year, and that demands the best of service and accommodations. And added to all these very tangible factors we have inherited a fine tradition as a Nation that need bow to no one in seamanship and maritime accomplishment.

Yet many commit the folly of waiving aside our merchant marine, of lending ear to the misrepresentations that are published on every side, and of favoring the vessels of foreign nations. As the Honorable Alfred E. Smith pointed out in his address on May 22 of this year, of the 20 or 25 percent of the travelers on the Atlantic who are foreigners, practically none patronizes American vessels. They travel on those that carry their own flag. The other 75 or 80 percent are Americans, and of these more than half travel on foreign ships, although our new ships are second to none in comfort and service. Mr. Smith continues, and I shall use his own words in conclusion:

In short, the German, French, and British steamers are invariably selected by their citizens, yet Americans are the chief support of these foreign-owned lines to the neglect of their own. The results of this neglect are not often felt at once, but in the long run they will rise up as a damper on export trade and an actual threat to security in case of war or other national emergency. * * *

It is the duty of every American to remember that now that we have at last consolidated our position again on the high seas—an achievement in which he has a direct and personal interest—he must lend his support and patronage to his country's shipping.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all those who spoke on the Hawaiian bill may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks of Monday on the proposal to amend the organic law of Hawaii to permit the President to appoint a Governor who is not a resident of the islands, I wish to call attention of the Members of the House to the fact that we are proposing here to undermine and destroy a principle which the Democratic Party, in my opinion, has always supported; that is, the principle of home rule.

The law as it now affects the Territory of Hawaii provides that the Governor shall be a resident of the islands for at least 3 years next preceding his appointment. This measure brought in here by the committee proposes so to amend the law that the Governor need not be a citizen of the islands, and consequently need know nothing about the problems of the people of the islands, for whom he is to administer the laws and regulate many of their living conditions. In the short time allotted me on the floor of this House to register my opposition to this proposal, I pointed out that the Democrats have always favored home rule, and that particularly in the South for more than two generations the Democratic Party has opposed carpetbag government in all its insidious forms. One of the gentlemen of the committee remarks that the President, in a communication to the committee, says:

It is particularly necessary to select for the post of Governor of Hawaii a man of experience and vision, who will be regarded by all citizens of the islands as one who will be absolutely impartial in his decisions on matters as to which there may be a difference of local opinion.

Now I am sure that the President did not mean to convey, either to this committee or to the House, that there is no citizen of Hawaii with experience and vision enough suitable for the Governorship, or that if he were to appoint a citizen of Hawaii to the distinguished office of Governor, that this appointee would be partial and would be influenced by local differences of opinion, and in the carrying out of his duties might so administer the government that it would be antagonistic to the welfare of the people of Hawaii and the people of the United States. I cannot believe that that is what the President sought to convey to this House, although the argument of those favoring this change in the law seems to me to be along this line.

For a good many years Republican politicians, campaigning in the Territory of Hawaii, have warned and threatened the people of this Territory that the election of Democrats would result in the loss of the justly cherished home rule which the Hawaiians have enjoyed since their annexation to the United States. Our good colleague, the Democratic delegate from Hawaii, made as one of the principal issues of his campaign in the last election, the true fact that the Democratic Party was in America, the outstanding champion of home rule and local self-government and that the election of a Democrat and of a Democratic Government in the Territory would assure the Hawaiians the retention of home rule. Now we find, for some reason which I am unable to understand, and upon which I have no information, a Democratic committee of this House bringing in a measure which proposes to destroy the home rule of the Territory of Hawaii, a measure which would change the law so that some man from the mainland, regardless of whether or not he would have either understanding of or sympathy with the problems of the people of this Territory, would be empowered to administer the laws of the Territory and govern its people. Only a short time past, as the lives of men go, this country engaged in a war; thousands of our youth shed their blood and gave their lives in a living hell of shrapnel and bullets in Europe, and one of the reasons for our descent into this hell of a European war, emblazoned before the American people, was that we were fighting for the self-determination of small nations and the right of a people to govern themselves and have a voice in the selection of their own governmental authorities, who would handle their problems.

Now, with this measure, we would deny to the citizens of the Territory of Hawaii the decent, fair, and truly democratic principle of having a Governor to administer their laws who is a citizen of their own Territory. I think this House should stand by its colleagues, should uphold the wishes of the Hawaiian people and their legislature, who have protested against this change in the organic law, and should vote down this measure which proposes to deprive the Hawaiians of the same measure of State rights, if I might so compare it, as the sovereign States of the United States have enjoyed since the drafting of the Constitution. It is a surprising anomaly to me that the Democrats and the Democratic Party, the living, vital proponents of State rights, should through this measure wish to deny to the Territory of Hawaii that great human right and great principle which they have so zealously and insistently approved and supported throughout the history of our great Democratic Party. It is a surprising, disconcerting, and somewhat disheartening thing that a true Democrat and believer in the right of home rule and local self-government, should be forced in this House, in an endeavor to save that small measure of justice to which I feel the people of Hawaii are entitled, to turn to the opposite side of the House for support. Now, I do not know the Hawaiians' problems. I have never been there. I do not know what their differences may be, but I do feel that just as we settle our local differences in our 48 sovereign States of the Union through elections and through the will of the people, that the people of Hawaii should be let alone to settle their own differences in the same manner.

As a good American and as a Democrat who is a Democrat because he believes in the principles of Jefferson and the Constitution, I should hesitate to say that I, as a Member of the House of Representatives, would cast my vote to change a law which might result in fastening upon the people and the citizens of the Territory of Hawaii a Governor who was not a citizen and who might impose upon them gross injustices. I hate to be a party to the theory that "might makes right" and that because we are in the majority in this House we should use our strength to override and defeat a principle of government for which the Democratic Party has always stood—home rule—and impose upon the citizens of this Territory of ours by the sheer weight of our numbers a change in the law which might or might not work ill on the rights of every individual citizen of Hawaii.

Carpetbag government in any form is obnoxious to a free people. No good Democrat can defend it under any guise, and if the principles for which the Democratic Party has stood for generations are worth anything at all, the Democratic side of this House should refuse by its vote to take away from the citizens of Hawaii that justly cherished right of having a Governor for their Territory who is a citizen of their Territory and who is familiar and in sympathy with their problems.

This is almost another proposition of "taxation without representation", a principle over which this country fought to gain its freedom from a foreign power; it is another proposition from which the people from whom I am descended have fought and bled for nearly 700 years. It is a proposition antagonistic in principle to everything a real Democrat has believed in and supported, and it rises above the mere question of patronage and the rewards of political victory, because it involves a change in a fundamental concept in which the kind of Democrats I have known have always believed. I trust that the Democratic side of this House will not countenance this proposition, because a principle is no longer a prnciple if we make an exception to it; and the principle of home rule and local self-government is a Democratic principle that we Democrats should have courage enough to support, regardless of minor considerations or momentary advantages of any kind.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY VERSUS VETERAN JUSTICE VERSUS THE ECONOMY LEAGUE

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks, and place therein a short letter that I received from a correspondent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, I am being flooded with letters from veterans and nonveterans throughout our Nation who write continually to protest the iniquitous applications of the present veterans' economy law and regulations. The various municipalities and political subdivisions which will be called upon to maintain our indigent veterans and their dependents are as vehement in their protest as is the veteran himself.

As a Democrat who voted against the national economy measure, I wish to insert in the RECORD an unsolicited letter which teems with pertinent facts of an informative nature.

The letter is as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY.

Representative J. H. HOEPPEL,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. HOEPPEL: Just a few lines to let you know how thankful I and a lot of other Spanish-American War veterans are to you for voting against this economy bill. It certainly causes untold misery. I have lost my home, after paying $5,400 on same. I have the papers to prove it. I don't know what I am going to do. I am too proud to ask for charity and we old fellows can't get work. Serving in two wars, and they take away my little pension! The Democratic Party is sure going to suffer for this and the Republicans know it and laugh at us.

Mr. HOEPPEL, about 6 weeks ago, the Democratic leaders for "Taylor for mayor" ticket, asked me and others to poll the precincts and see how strong Mr. Taylor (Democrat) is. I polled four precincts and 80 percent were for Mr. Taylor. Now, last week, they asked us again to poll the same precincts and God knows, every Democratic veteran told me they would not vote another Democratic ticket, either Government, State, or city. There are at least 200 votes lost in those four precincts, including the veterans, their families and friends, and I found out this is the same way all over the city. The veterans are sure terribly against this cut. They say: "Why does Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt and Mrs. Wilson, two idle rich women, get $5,000 per year and let us fellows starve? Why don't they tax the big, rich crooks and not take it away from us?" etc.

Well, anyhow, I quit polling precincts, for they might blame me for all this.

I still have hope that Mr. Roosevelt will not be too cruel with us old fellows. I am afraid this whole thing will lead to a bad end.

I will close, hoping you are in good health.

I wish we had a million in Congress and Senate like you. Good wishes,

Yours,

FRANK KOENIG,
729 South Sixteenth Street, Louisville, Ky.

SOME ASPECTS OF FEDERAL CONTROL OF DAIRY FOOD PRODUCTS

Mr. HENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and to include therein a speech I gave over the National Broadcasting System on certain aspects of the control of dairy products.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENNEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address recently delivered by me over the National Broadcasting System on certain aspects of the control of dairy products:

My friends, the spotlight of bacteriological research has long been focused upon the dairy products, such as butter, cheese, cream, and milk, as a fertile media for the transmission of many types of infections and diseases. I need mention only a few, such as tuberculosis, typhoid fever, septic sore throat, foot-and-mouth disease, undulant fever, and scores of others that are known to scientists, and I propose to address myself today to the most pernicious of all of these, namely, tuberculosis, which is largely a milk-borne infection. I shall also discuss the activities of the United States Government in dealing with this all-important subject. Leprosy is a disease in which the victim is usually infected 15 or 20 years before the malady manifests itself, and tuberculosis is held in the same category today by most scientific medical minds. Children are infected while they are young, even during infancy through association with their tubercular parents, relatives, or nursemaids, but just as frequently or more so in some countries by the drinking of milk from tubercular cows, and the disease may not become manifest until later in life.

In 1902 Prof. Robert Koch, the discoverer of tubercle bacillus, and who is considered one of the greatest bacteriologists of that time, advanced the opinion that the disease in cattle known as "bovine tuberculosis" was produced by an entirely different bacterium from that which had infected humans. This, of course, was hailed immediately by those who contended that the two diseases were distinct and separate as a final proof that human tuberculosis could not be contracted from cattle through milk. Professors Behring, Calmette, and others disagreed with him, and demonstrated that to all intents and purposes they are the same disease, and while there are some so-called "morphological differences", the resulting infection in each is much the same.

R. J. Harris, in the Canadian Health Journal of January 1932, in referring to this subject, stated that the immense amount of investigation it gave rise to has firmly established the fact that the germ in cattle will infect humans, and has demonstrated that for practical purposes the sole mode of infection is by means of infected milk. In later years Professor Koch retracted his statement and admitted the identity of the two bacteria. It is proven at autopsies on children with tuberculous glands that 25 percent show the bacillus to be identical with that of bovine tuberculosis in its staining and cultural characteristics. Professor Mitchell, of Scotland, found that the tubercular glands of the neck in children under 12 years were caused by the bovine germ and in joint and bone tuberculosis 61 percent was from the bovine germ. In Toronto, Canada, where the milk is all pasteurized and certified, Dr. Harris found no tubercular glands in children, but in the adjacent country, where these precautions were not taken, 13 percent of the children were tubercular. The percentages vary greatly in different countries, and bears a definite relation to the percentage of tuberculosis in cattle. Professor Whang, of Scotland, found 55 percent of children under 16 years of age suffering from bovine tuberculosis. Prof. Nathan Raws, discussing the relationship between infant feeding and tuberculosis, reached the following conclusion:

Tuberculosis of the lungs is produced always by the human type of germ, whereas tuberculosis of bones, joints, glands, skin, and tubercular meningitis is produced always by the bovine type and is the result of using milk products from tubercular cows. It is to be construed, therefore, that from 25 to 50 percent of tuberculosis in children under 12 years of age is of the bovine type and caused by infected milk. On this point nearly all authors are agreed, and many of them place it as high as 90 percent. I might state in passing that it is now an undisputed fact, shown by autopsy studies, that these bacteria after being taken into the stomach pass directly through the walls of the intestines and are carried by the blood and lymph streams directly to the glands or joints or meninges without producing any lesions or disease in the stomach or intestines. Professor Calmette believes that the bacilli may remain more or less dormant in the body fluids for years.

A study of tubercle bacilli in the raw milk of the Chicago dairy district and reports of observations in other locations and published by Tonney, White, and Danforth, of the Chicago Health Department, in the American Journal of Public Health in May 1927, is very enlightening. It covered the period from 1893 to 1925. Raw milk samples were taken from the market in each and every year. In all, 16,700 tests were made. Of these, 1,448 showed living and virulent tubercle bacilli or 8.66 percent were positive. In Germany, England, and Scotland, the percentage ranged from 20 to 61 percent. In Chicago in 1923, 1924, and 1925 it averaged 3.5 percent. At that time in Chicago, out of a supply of 1,350,000 quarts of milk per day, 43,750 quarts contained virulent living tubercle bacilli, or 15,000,000 quarts of infected milk per year. Carrying the hypothesis further, this would mean in Chicago, with its 3,000,000 population, that the average person would drink 5 quarts of milk per year that was infected with virulent tubercle bacilli. Illinois is now an accredited free State. Milk from tuberculin-tested herds is the best preventative. Pasteurization, of course, insures added protection and should be used, but at best it is an uneconomical and dangerous practice, for the security depends upon the thoroughness and carefulness of the processor, and it must be admitted that a certain amount of all types of vitamins are destroyed and all of certain types are destroyed. The Chicago Board of Health, after these exhaustive studies, came to the conclusions that pasteurization is never 100 percent efficient and it should not be relied upon, and recognition of this fact led to an ordinance requiring that all milk sold in Chicago must come from certified tuberculin-tested herds.

In the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture in 1927, when the Lenroot-Taber bill was up, it was shown that there had been expended $750,000,000 and an additional fifteen or twenty millions of dollars each year in the campaign to clean our herds of tuberculosis. Since then there has been expended several hundred millions more, making a total of over $1,000,000,000 that our taxpayers have paid to insure a sanitary and healthful milk supply. Besides this, the farmers themselves have been put to a heavy expense in having many cows condemned. Then again, in compliance with the regulations for the sanitary scoring of dairies, as laid down by the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture, and demanded by many States, these farmers have been put to many million dollars additional expense. This prompted the passage of the Lenroot-Taber Act in 1927, which made it mandatory that all milk and cream imported into the United States must be certified to as being free from tubercle bacilli and other dangerous germs. Infected milk that is excluded under the Lenroot-Taber Act can at present be made into butter or cheese and shipped in, although it would contain exactly the same proportion of bacilli as the milk, which was excluded, and 1 pound of butter or cheese will contain as many bacteria as 3 gallons of milk. I have, therefore, introduced a bill into the Congress to regulate the importation of butter and cheese into the United States for the purpose of promoting the dairy industry of the United States and protecting the public health. This is not an exclusion nor an embargo measure, but is primarily and in its finality a public health and sanitation measure, which I shall presently explain.

Epitomized, the bill is as follows:

First. All food products of milk and cream imported into the United States or its possessions must come from herds that are tuberculin tested and certified to by an accredited veterinary surgeon.

Second. The products must come from sanitary and clean dairies that shall be scored in accordance with the Bureau of Animal Industry; or Third. From pasteurized milk or cream, the bacterial count of which must be within certain limits and kept at a temperature of not over 50° F. at the time of importation.

Fourth. The Secretary of Agriculture will have charge of issuing valid permits to importers and to have inspections made whenever necessary to insure that the processors and importers of such products comply with the provisions of this act, and he is authorized to revoke or suspend such permits when he shall consider that they are being violated. As just stated, this is simply extending the Lenroot-Taber Act which has been in force for the past 6 years and which has been entirely satisfactory. It was enacted for the express purpose of preventing the importation of raw milk or cream from countries not complying with recognized health standards. There was no valid reason for not including butter and cheese in that bill, for it is scientifically known and admitted that these products can transmit tuberculosis, septic sore throat, undulant fever, typhoid fever, and other contagious and infectious diseases precisely the same as milk. I wish now to discuss briefly some of the testimony given by witnesses who appeared before the committee for and against the bill. Messrs. Ercole and L. Sozzi, of New York, representing the importers of cheese, in discussing the regulations of this bill, stated: "We have a very good example along this line—pork products are being imported under Government supervision and regulation and we understand they are allowed entry into the United States if they are properly inspected by a registered veterinarian abroad * * * only registered veterinarians can certify to the purity of a product offered for importation to the United States—if such a system can be evolved in the case of dairy products it will be perfectly acceptable to the importers."

I just wish to add an observation here. If pork products are prohibited because they may contain trichina, which are easily killed by thorough cooking, how much more important it is to prohibit foods coming from the tubercular milk of cows which is consumed in its raw state. We have an analogous restriction in the matter of serums and vaccines imported into the United States. In 1906 several cases of tetanus, or lockjaw, developed in St. Louis, with a number of deaths, caused by diphtheria serum that was not properly sterilized; and at that time our Government, through Dr. Woodward, who was then health officer of Washington, D.C., secured the enactment of a law requiring the strict supervision and certification of all serum imported or used in interstate commerce. This bill is exactly analogous. What difference does it make whether a disease is contracted by taking the bacteria in food or by injecting them in serum or vaccines? Dr. Harry W. Redfield, of Mendham, N.J., stated that the interest of others in tuberculosis was simply academic, but that his was real and personal. He developed a tubercular hip from drinking tubercular milk while a child and spent 7 years of his life in bed, all because of infected milk. He quoted the work of Alice Evans, of the United States Public Health Service, in which she said: "It is an important fact for us to keep in mind that the tubercle bacillus is the hardest, the toughest, and the most difficult to kill of all disease-producing organisms known to affect milk." Quoted further, Dr. Redfield, speaking in regard to butter, said: "As was proved by Dr. Schroeder in 1923, butter bought on the market which had been stored for 5 or 6 months still contains living tubercle bacilli which may affect the human being and cause disease, and therefore there is only one safe thing to do with butter, and that is to pasteurize the milk from which butter is made." He advised pasteurization of the milk that goes into the soft cheeses. It is a known fact that hard cheeses cannot be made from pasteurized milk. He believes that hard cheese kills its bacteria during the ripening process.

Professor Soberheim, of the Institute of Bacteriology, Berne, Switzerland, found the living germs in cheeses up to 60 days after their manufacture, and stated that in cheeses older than 2 months they found none. However, but 111 samples were tested, which is not a large enough number upon which to base absolute reliance. The professor attributed the absence of the germs to the lactic acid, the temperature used in processing Swiss cheese, and the lack of oxygen. These conclusions are erroneous, because, according to the doctor's further testimony, he quoted the work of Kankaanpaa, who examined 50 samples of Finnish Swiss cheese from 119 to 124, and in one case 200, days old which showed 14 percent to contain tubercle bacilli. This milk was taken from herds which showed 70 to 90 percent of the cows to be tubercular. The witnesses appearing before the committee admitted that in the countries importing cheese and butter the cattle ranged all the way from 15 to 50 percent tubercular. The witnesses representing the foreign interests implied that if Swiss cheese comes from Switzerland, it is O.K.; but if from Finland, not so good. But how is one to know from whence the importation comes? If every importer should, like the characters in Strange Interlude, speak his thoughts, and advertise thusly, "This cheese is made from the milk of tubercular cows" or "this cheese contains tubercle bacilli, but they are dead, or supposed to be dead." How many people do you suppose would purchase that cheese? I do not concede that the processing of cheese is sufficient proof that the TB. germs are killed, and every bacteriologist who is listening to me knows that the small amount of lactic acid in cheese and the temperature of 131° for 30 minutes used in making Swiss cheese nor the dimunition of oxygen would not kill tetanus or other spore-producing bacteria. Neither would it insure against septic sore throat, typhoid, undulant fever, the germ of infantile paralysis, or foot-and-mouth disease. I mention this latter only because of the necessity of dairy sanitation.

It was freely admitted by the witnesses that in many of the European countries the dairy herds, the cheese plant, and the family all live under one roof, and in winter the compartments communicate in order to conserve heat, and dust and foul air may be carried directly from the family or from the cows to the cheese vats and thereby infect the milk. Dr. Redfield gave an illustration, as known to him to be true, where the bed clothes, night clothes, and linens from a child acutely ill with infantile paralysis were washed in the cheese vat, and thereafter the vat was filled with milk and another batch of cheese started. It was his opinion that no matter how distasteful to our æsthetic sense, that the processing of the cheese would make it safe, and this statement came from the man who admitted that he had developed a tubercular hip from drinking infected milk. It was facetiously stated in the hearings that the TB bacilli were of value in the cheese because the dead bacteria gave it a good flavor. I do not believe that this is a convincing argument to an American who wishes to protect his family against this dread disease. Dr. Redfield admitted that butter made from unpasteurized milk may be potentially dangerous for 6 months after it goes to market, and also that TB bacilli live in cheese from 4 to 120 days, which latter would be nearly 4 months. Dr. W. H. Feldman, of the Mayo Clinic, Rochester, Minn., stated that the bovine bacillus will retain its virulence for unknown periods when incorporated in dairy products, and that the viability depends on the moisture and that they have been found to be virulent for 450 days, or 15 months. Therefore, my friends, I believe, in view of these conflicting statements, that the people of the United States who demand that our own producers expend millions of dollars to insure the consumers against infected milk will also demand and should have the definite assurance that dairy products imported from foreign countries must measure up to standards set by this bill. This means the exclusion from our markets of products that the American public demand should be excluded. It is not an embargo, it is not a trade restriction, but simply a public-health measure. In this it is not in anywise different from the exclusion of our fruit fly from European markets on the supposition that it is infested with the Mediterranean fly. It is the same as the proposed restriction on cheese by the British Minister of Agriculture, who, according to a recent press report from London, had advised that the English Government enact an exclusion law against the importation of cheeses into England in order to insure better prices to their producers, and this in the face of the proposed "tariff truce."

Fred Brenckman, a representative of the National Grange and a warm supporter of the Lenroot-Taber Act in 1927, gave as his reasons for supporting this act: First, there is a decreased consumption because of the depression; second, nearly all foreign countries have set up barriers against our products: third, cheese sold in the United States was 62,000,000 pounds in 1932, which represents nearly 100,000,000 gallons of milk. The average importation of butter and cheese from Europe for the past 10 years has been 76,000,000 pounds per year, equivalent to 210,000,000 gallons of milk yearly.

Now! Should not our dairymen who produce certified milk be entitled to this market which they have developed and which is now partially supplied by milk products that admittedly contain tubercle bacteria, and the only right to such market is the claim of the importers that the bacteria are dead. An estimated average price of 30 cents per pound was paid for this imported cheese during the last 10 years and it would mean about $20,000,000 yearly that should be in American dairymen's pockets. Our cheese is just as good or better than imported cheese. Dr. W. Dorner, of Berne, Switzerland, as quoted by Mr. Homer Sullivan, stated that "milk delivered at homes in his country is not free from infection and medical authorities advise that the milk be boiled before using." Dr. Dorner stated further, "I have seen in Wisconsin first-class cheese of the highest quality with very large holes, and with such goods one cannot compete. When everything is said and done America produces as good cheese as we do." The State of Wisconsin furnishes nearly 71 percent of all the cheese produced in the United States. Eighteen percent is produced by the States of Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, and North Carolina, and these States are all on the accredited list containing less than one half of 1 percent of tubercular cattle. Wisconsin, which was the first accredited State, contains less than two tenths of 1 percent. At present there are 11 States accredited with less than one half of 1 percent of tubercular cattle, and the percentage in the whole United States is less than 1.5 percent, which is far less than any European country, where as stated the percentage ranges from 15 to 50 percent. In Europe they do not observe the strict quarantine laws of the United States, and in a home where cheese is processed there may be a case of infantile paralysis, scarlet fever, diphtheria, or tuberculosis, and the cheese may be processed and sold without restrictions.

Professor Calmette, a noted French authority on tuberculosis in children, has recently made an observation that the epidemics of infantile paralysis seem to flourish in localities where there is a high percentage of tuberculosis in cattle, and he believes there may be some relationship between these two diseases. If this is true, it should be a most condemning argument against permitting products which are not properly certified from entering our country. Nearly 500,000,000 pounds of cheese was made in the United States in 1931, of which 30,000,000 was Swiss or Emmenthal. Our cows, particularly in the cheese and butter areas, are practically free from tuberculosis. Even Dr. Redfield, the expert representing the foreign governments, and who advocated permitting the continuing of importation of cheese and butter, believes that the TB bacilli in such cheese are dead, but advances the following reasons why herds should be tuberculin tested:

First. Raises the health level of the cows and makes better producers.

Second. Eliminates boarders (sickly, low-producing cows don't pay for their feed).

Third. Prevents the healthy cows from being infected by the sick ones, which thereby cuts down their production.

Fourth. Protects consumers of raw market milk and cream.

If foreign producers cannot and will not meet the restrictions that are imposed on our cheese producers, then this bill, if passed, will give a new market to approximately 210,000,000 gallons of milk in the United States yearly and will aid the dairy industry more than any other type of legislation. In the interest of saving the lives particularly of children and protecting them against ravages of such disfiguring manifestations, such as tuberculosis of bones, joints, and glands, and the always fatal complications of tubercular meningitis and miliary tuberculosis, I cannot too strongly urge your support of this legislation. I thank you.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, earlier in the day I got permission to revise and extend my remarks. I now ask to include therein a short letter from a constituent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENDING THE MINING LAWS TO DEATH VALLEY NATIONAL MONUMENT, CALIF.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H.R. 3659) to extend the mining laws of the United States to the Death Valley National Monument in California.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the mining laws of the United States be, and they are hereby, extended to the area included within the Death Valley National Monument in California, or as it may hereafter be extended.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "extended", insert "subject, however, to the surface use of location entries or patents under general regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MONONGAHELA RIVER, CALIFORNIA, PA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H.R. 4872) authorizing Farris Engineering Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near California, Pa.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. This is another bill authorizing a private corporation to construct a bridge over a navigable stream. I have had considerable to say in reference to the grants of Congress to private individuals to build bridges across navigable rivers, and have informed the House the result that followed the construction of bridges over the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers as a result of franchises granted by the Congress. I have before me an editorial from the St. Louis Star-Times headed "Costly Bridge Building." It reads as follows:

COSTLY BRIDGE BUILDING

Foreclosure sale ordered for the Mississippi River bridge between Cairo, Ill., and Birds Point, Mo., completes the financial tragedy of big bridge building in the vicinity of St. Louis. One after another the controlling interests of the fine structures across the river at Cape Girardeau, Chain of Rocks, Alton, and nearby across the Missouri at Bellefontaine have defaulted on their bonds, struggled, and given up the ghost. Careful engineering, and, at least in part of these enterprises, careful finance, were of no avail. The only ones actually to benefit seem to be those who got their profit from selling the bonds.

Nobody will deny that, sooner or later, these bridges would have had to be built. But the promoters overestimated traffic and hard times did the rest. The public will be forced to go on paying tolls over them for years unless State or Federal Government takes them over. In some instances even the engineers who planned and supervised the building have lost with the rest.

It is the old story of Merchants and Eads bridges, and the railroads. The Municipal Bridge investment might have gone the same way if St. Louis had thrown up its hands when the railroads failed to use it. All of these bridges are monumental structures. Those who put their money in deserved profit and not loss. The next generation and new owners will get the benefit. Meanwhile, when business resumes and the bridge-promotion industry starts again, there should be an end to the wholesale granting of permits by Congress. If promoters want to build bridges they should raise the capital among themselves, or get the Government to build and leave the bridges free.

That editorial bears out my statement that the construction of these bridges was not feasible from a financial standpoint. They were built for convenience, and they were promoted in practically every instance by a professional promoter, who sold the bonds for the construction of the bridge, secured his end, and then dropped out of the picture. Starting at the northern boundary of Missouri, all the way down to the southern boundary, they have constructed beautiful bridges across the Mississippi River. The bonds were sold to the people in the large cities—not to the people in the vicinity of where the bridges were to be constructed, because the people there did not have the money to construct the bridges; they were sold to people in the large cities at par, and there is not one of those projects where you cannot now buy the bonds for $5 or $10. The public holds the bag. The bridges are still open. There is practically no traffic over them. In some instances, because of the charge, ferries are still operating across the river, and the people use the ferries rather than the bridge. I am not afraid that any of the bridges provided for today is ever going to be constructed unless they get the money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. They just cannot sell the bonds in the open market, and responsible investment houses will no longer handle bridge bonds.

Mr. FADDIS. This is not a bond-selling proposition at all.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am talking about the subject generally, not about this individual bill. We have repeatedly asked the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House to revise the Bridge Act. I think it should be revised; but, as I said before, I am not afraid that any of these bridges is ever going to be constructed.

The promoters will be back here next year asking for an extension of time. So far as I am concerned, I am not going to object to the passage of this bill, but I call the attention of the House to the millions and millions of dollars that have been lost by your constituents and mine through the action of the Congress in permitting the construction of bridges when they should not have been constructed because the traffic was not there to make them a success financially.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman has been constantly on the floor here fighting these bridges and doing fine work. I agree with him. Has the gentleman ever made any effort to have the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House go into these cases carefully to determine whether or not they are stock-selling projects, whether their bonds are to be peddled around?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. For 5 years I have introduced bills in this House, and I introduced one in this Congress providing for a revision of the Bridge Act, but for some reason the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House has never seen fit to take up the bills and give them consideration.

Mr. JENKINS. It used to be a habit among a good many construction companies along the big rivers to select strategic points and get permission to build a bridge and peddle it around from place to place.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I have made that charge on the floor of the House and have shown beyond question of doubt by the evidence I have put into the RECORD, where franchises have been peddled. It is a bad practice. I know what a bridge bill means to a Representative, but, gentlemen, the Congress is a party to defrauding the people when we permit bridges to be constructed by bond issues that result, in the end, in a complete loss to those who buy the bonds. I think the securities bill will help some in stopping bridge bond issues.

Mr. JENKINS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what the facts are with reference to this particular bill.

Mr. FADDIS. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, this bridge in question is a bridge across the Monongahela River in the vicinity of California, Pa. The Monongahela River for miles and miles of its length is almost a continuous city, composed of coal mines and steel mills and steel plants. It so happens that at this city of California there is one of the largest State normal schools in Pennsylvania. A great many of the students in this great normal school come from the other side of the Monongahela River.

At the present time the nearest bridge in one direction is 7 miles down the river and in the other direction it is over 4 miles up the river. Students traveling back and forth to this normal school from the other side of the river are forced to go through almost a continuous town on either side of the river. Their only means of crossing the river at the present time is by ferry, which at many times of the year is very dangerous and in the winter time is decidedly inconvenient and quite often is out of commission due to high water.

The State cannot build this bridge, because it does not have control of the roads on each side of the river. The counties concerned are not financially able to build the bridge, neither will they be financially able for a great many years to come.

This bill proposes that the Farris Engineering Co. be granted permission to build this bridge and operate it as a toll bridge. It is provided that it shall be amortized within 20 years. It is also provided in the bill that if the subdivisions of the State, on either or both sides of the river, wish to acquire possession of the bridge, they may buy the same from the Farris Engineering Co. It also provides that they shall not have to pay the Farris Engineering Co. anything for goodwill or anything that would be in the nature of watered stock in connection with the bridge. The bridge is not going to cost the United States Government one dime, nor any subdivision of the State of Pennsylvania one dime. The Farris Engineering Co. is to build it. No bonds are to be sold or anything of the kind.

I think this is a worthy piece of legislation, and I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Did the gentleman say there would be no bonds sold?

Mr. FADDIS. No bonds sold to the public.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I want to compliment the gentleman, and I hope his statement is correct, that a toll bridge is to be constructed by private individuals with their own money across the Monongahela River, and it is going to serve 20,000 people.

Mr. FADDIS. That is correct.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. You are now served by ferries, I presume?

Mr. FADDIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Has the gentleman ever made a count as to how many automobiles or people are carried across on those ferries? Have any such statistics been secured?

Mr. FADDIS. No, I have no such statistics, and I do not know that that enters into the matter, because if this bridge is built it will relieve the congestion up and down the river on other bridges and other roads. The traffic on the ferries would vary a great deal from time to time.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. You say the Farris Engineering Co. is going to build this bridge without any issue of bonds. If they succeed, then they are entitled to a medal.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. What is the toll to be charged on this bridge?

Mr. FADDIS. I do not know. The toll generally on bridges in that vicinity is 25 cents for an automobile and 2 or 3 cents for foot passengers. I presume the toll would be along that same line.

Mr. ELTSE of California. The report states it will be a private toll bridge.

Mr. FADDIS. Yes, yes; certainly.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. This measure does not cost the Government any money?

Mr. FADDIS. This does not cost the Government one dime.

Mr. O'MALLEY. It just gives them the right to build the bridge?

Mr. FADDIS. It gives them the right to build the bridge, that is all, because it is a navigable stream under the control of the engineering department.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Are they not using ferries now and paying toll on the ferries at that particular place?

Mr. FADDIS. Yes; they are.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The toll question does enter into it, because it is out of the pockets of the people that tolls are paid. It is the traveling public which pays the tolls, and it occurs to me the gentleman ought to know what tolls will be charged, that we may know beforehand that they will not be excessive.

Mr. FADDIS. What difference does it make? They pay a higher toll now on the ferry than they would pay on the bridge.

Mr. BLANTON. That may be so. But they can avoid the ferry route if they desire. But after a toll bridge becomes a part of a public highway, it is too late then for travelers to change their route and they have to pay the toll that is charged.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have 1 additional minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman is recognized for 1 additional minute.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I have in mind a little bridge somewhere between here and Texas that I have passed over at various times, where they would charge a dollar, when 25 cents should have been sufficient.

Mr. FADDIS. The gentleman is speaking of Texas, not of Pennsylvania. I know of toll bridges that would charge more than that, even.

Mr. BLANTON. But the bridge I mentioned is not in Texas. It is in another State. I specially recommend a bridge to you in Wheeling, W.Va., which, I think, charges only 5 cents, and an adjoining bridge there in Ohio which also charges only 5 cents.

Mr. FADDIS. That is on account of the amount of traffic on the bridge.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, the gentleman ought to know what kind of tolls these people are going to charge, before they are authorized to make charges of tolls.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Those tolls are under the supervision of the War Department, and anyone can lodge a complaint with the War Department, and they will conduct a hearing and take up the matter of tolls.

Mr. FADDIS. And they will see that they are reasonable and just, certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. But that is a proceeding that takes much time, and it costs the Government much money. The War Department is forced to hold a hearing, and sometimes 6, 12, and 18 months elapse between the time complaint is made and the excessive charges are curtailed following the hearing. It is a wise policy to make bridge builders declare, before they get permission of Congress, just what tolls they expect to charge the helpless public.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote interstate commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes, Farris Engineering Co., its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Monongahela River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near California, Pa., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of Pennsylvania, any political subdivision thereof within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of such State governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 5 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interest in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion cost, not to exceed 10 percent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 3. If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the State of Pennsylvania, or by any municipality or other political subdivision or public agency thereof, under the provisions of section 2 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 4. The Farris Engineering Co., its successors and assigns, shall, within 90 days after the completion of such bridge, file with the Secretary of War and with the Highway Department of the State of Pennsylvania a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, and at the request of the Highway Department of the State of Pennsylvania shall, at any time within 3 years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge; for the purpose of such investigation the said Farris Engineering Co., its successors and assigns, shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 2 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 5. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to Farris Engineering Co., its successors and assigns; and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 6. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXPLANATION OF VOTE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the roll call on the Hawaiian bill today there be inserted the fact that I was absent attending a conference with the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Roosevelt, in respect to the Boston Navy Yard, with my colleagues, Mr. CONNERY, Mr. GRANFIELD, and Mr. HEALEY. If we had been present, I am authorized to say by them that they would have voted "yea", as would I.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who objected to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 118 says he still insists on his objection. Therefore I do not seek recognition.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5495, to amend an act entitled "An act creating the Great Lakes Bridge Commission and authorizing said commission and its successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich.", approved June 25, 1930.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of an act entitled "An act creating the Great Lakes Bridge Commission and authorizing said commission and its successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich.", approved June 25, 1930, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. The Commission and its successors and assigns are hereby authorized to provide for the payment of the cost of the bridge and its approaches and the ferry or ferries and the necessary lands, easements, and appurtenances thereto by an issue or issues of bonds of the commission, upon approval by the Michigan Public Utilities Commission, bearing interest at not more than 6 percent per annum, payable annually or at shorter intervals, maturing not more than 30 years from their date of issuance, such bonds and the interest thereon, and any premium to be paid for retirement thereof before maturity, to be payable solely from the sinking fund provided in accordance with this act. Such bonds may be registerable as to principal alone or both principal and interest, and shall be in such form not inconsistent with this act, and be payable at such place or places as the commission may determine. The commission may repurchase and may reserve the right to redeem all or any of said bonds before maturity at prices not exceeding 105 and accrued interest. The commission may enter into an agreement with any bank or trust company in the United States as trustee having the power to make such agreement, setting forth the duties of the commission in respect of the construction, maintenance, operation, repair, and insurance of the bridge and/or the ferry or ferries, the conservation and application of all funds, the safeguarding of moneys on hand or on deposit, and the rights and remedies of said trustees and the holders of the bonds, restricting the individual right of action of the bondholders as is customary in trust agreements respecting bonds of corporations. Such trust agreement may contain such provision for protecting and enforcing the rights and remedies of the trustee and the bondholders as may be reasonable and proper and not inconsistent with the law and also a provision for approval by the original purchasers of the bonds of the employment of consulting engineers and of the security given by bridge contractors and by any bank or trust company in which the proceeds of bonds or of bridge and/or ferry tolls or other moneys of the commission shall be deposited, and may provide that no contract for construction shall be made without the approval of the consulting engineers. The bridge constructed under the authority of this act shall be deemed to be an instrumentality for international commerce authorized by the Government of the United States, and said bridge and ferry or ferries and the bonds issued in connection therewith and the income derived therefrom shall be exempt from all Federal, State, municipal, and local taxation. Said bonds shall be sold in such manner and at such price as the commission may determine, such price to be not less than the price at which the interest yield basis will equal 6 percent per annum as computed from standard tables of bond values, and the face amount thereof shall be so calculated as to produce, at the price of their sale, the estimated cost of the bridge and its approaches, and the land, easements, and appurtenances used in connection therewith and, in the event the ferry or ferries are to be acquired, also the estimated cost of such ferry or ferries and the lands, easements, and appurtenances used in connection therewith. The cost of the bridge and ferry or ferries shall be deemed to include interest during construction of the bridge and for 12 months thereafter, and all engineering, legal, architectural, traffic surveying, and other expenses incident to the construction of the bridge or the acquisition of the ferry or ferries, and the acquisition of the necessary property, and incident to the financing thereof, including the cost of acquiring existing franchises, rights, plans, and works of and relating to the bridge, now owned by any person, firm, or corporation, and the cost of purchasing all or any part of the shares of stock of any such corporate owner if in the judgment of the commission such purchases should be found expedient. If the proceeds of the bonds issued shall exceed the cost as finally determined, the excess shall be placed in the sinking fund hereinafter provided. Prior to the preparation of definitive bonds the commission may under like restrictions issue temporary bonds with or without coupons, exchangeable for definitive bonds upon the issuance of the latter."

SEC. 2. That section 9 of said act, approved June 25, 1930, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. The commission shall have no capital stock or shares of interest or participation, and all revenues and receipts thereof shall be applied to the purposes specified in this act. The members of the commission shall not be entitled to any compensation for their services but may employ a secretary, treasurer, engineers, attorneys, and such other experts, assistants, and employees as they may deem necessary, who shall be entitled to receive such compensation as the commission may determine. After all bonds and interest thereon shall have been paid and all other obligations of the commission paid or discharged, or provision for all such payment shall have been made as hereinbefore provided, and after the bridge shall have been conveyed to the United States interests and the Canadian interests as herein provided, and any ferry or ferries shall have been sold, the commission shall be dissolved and shall cease to have further existence by an order of the State highway commissioner of Michigan made upon his own initiative or upon application of the commission or any member or members thereof, but only after a public hearing in the city of Port Huron, notice of the time and place of which hearing and the purpose thereof shall have been published once, at least 30 days before the date thereof, in a newspaper published in the city of Port Huron, Mich., and a newspaper published in the city of Sarnia, Ontario. At the time of such dissolution all moneys in the hands of or to the credit of the commission shall be divided into two equal parts, one of which shall be paid to said United States interests and the other to said Canadian interests."

SEC. 3. That the times for commencing and completing the construction of said bridge, heretofore extended by acts of Congress approved February 28, 1931, and June 9, 1932, are hereby further extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 4. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 6, line 11, strike out the language of section 3 and insert the following:

"That the times for commencing and completing the construction of said bridge heretofore extended by acts of Congress approved February 28, 1931, and June 9, 1932, are hereby further extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

"SEC. 4. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

Amend the title so as to read:

"To amend an act entitled 'An act creating the Great Lakes bridge commission and authorizing said commission and its successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich.', approved June 25, 1930, and to extend the times for commencing and completing construction of said bridge."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act creating the Great Lakes Bridge Commission and authorizing said commission and its successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich', approved June 25, 1930, and to extend the times for commencing and completing construction of said bridge."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, during the vote on the Hawaiian bill my colleagues, Mr. GRANFIELD, Mr. HEALEY, and I were in conference with the Secretary of the Navy in reference to the Boston Navy Yard. I am authorized to State that had we been here on that vote we would have voted "aye".

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER AT OR NEAR WASHINGTON, MO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5589, granting the consent of Congress to the city of Washington, Mo., to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Missouri River at or near Washington, Mo.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask my colleague the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], who introduced this bill, how close Washington, Mo., is to Hermann.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Somewhere between 30 and 40 miles.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. What was the result of the construction of the bridge over the Missouri River at Hermann?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. It has connected the road systems of north and south Missouri at that point and vastly increased the use and value of the north and south highway between No. 40 with No. 50. It has added materially to the value of farm lands throughout that section and to the business of the towns and communities which it serves. It is one of the valuable assets of the State.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I notice that the people of the city of Washington want to construct this bridge, and I am perfectly willing to let them do it if they desire to, but I hope they will go into it with their eyes wide open.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. My good friend the gentleman from St. Louis need have no apprehension on that score. There is no point on the entire river, from its source to its confluence with the Mississippi, where a bridge is more needed or where the convenience of the public and the welfare of the State will be better served than at Washington. It is one of the important trade centers of the State and is in a position to command river, rail, and highway traffic. A number of highways converge here, and while a ferry handles the situation with some degree of efficiency in summer, service is impossible much of the winter and impracticable in unfavorable weather at any season. The highway system of the State cannot be perfected without this bridge. It is the missing link in north and south service.

The bill provides for self-liquidation of the cost of construction through the application of the tolls collected from the bridge to a sinking fund which is to be amortized over a period of 20 years. The practicability of this plan is amply demonstrated by the record made by the bridge across this river at St. Charles, where the tolls collected paid in full the entire purchase price of the bridge and opened it to the public in the short space of 5 years.

The bill has been submitted to the War Department and the Department of Agriculture and is approved by both Secretary Dern and Secretary Wallace. It has the unanimous endorsement of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and I trust will pass the House this afternoon. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be read.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the city of Washington, Mo., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Washington, Mo., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. If tolls are charged for the use of such bridge, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of the bridge and its approaches, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the costs of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT OR NEAR THE JUNCTION OF THE IOWA AND MISSISSIPPI RIVERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5659, authorizing Charles N. Dohs, R. R. Hunt, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Mississippi River between the States of Iowa and Illinois at or near the junction of the Iowa and Mississippi Rivers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I object.

BRIDGE ACROSS LAKE CHAMPLAIN FROM EAST ALBURG, VT., TO WEST SWANTON, VT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5793, to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act authorizing Jed P. Ladd, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Lake Champlain from East Alburg, Vt., to West Swanton, Vt.", approved March 2, 1929.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved March 2, 1929, authorizing Jed P. Ladd, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct a bridge across Lake Champlain, between a point at or near East Alburg, Vt., and a point at or near Swanton, Vt., be, and the same is hereby, revived and reenacted: Provided, That this act shall be null and void unless the actual construction of the bridge herein referred to be commenced within 1 year and completed within 3 years from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS OHIO RIVER AT OR NEAR OWENSBORO, KY.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5830, to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Owensboro, Ky.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman who introduced this bill how many times an extension of time has been granted.

Mr. CARY. This is the first time and I shall be pleased to explain to the gentleman why the extension is being asked.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. This bill has been before Congress for 6 years, has it not?

Mr. CARY. No. This is the first bill that has been introduced to extend the time and I shall be pleased to tell the gentleman why the time was asked to be extended. This bill gives the Highway Commission of Kentucky and the Highway Commission of Indiana the right jointly to do this work.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But bills have been introduced to allow a bridge to be built across the Ohio River at Owensboro by private individuals.

Mr. CARY. No.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I remember the time when the Senator from Indiana, Mr. Watson, and a Representative from Indiana, representing the other side of the river from Owensboro, were in a controversy over this bridge for 2 years.

Mr. CARY. And the bridge they were talking about was 8 miles up the river at Rockford, not at Owensboro. That is the reason they could not get it, because they did not have it at the right place. This bridge crosses the river at Owensboro, a city with a population of 25,000 people. The other bridge was not at the right place.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But I am correct that there was a controversy about a bridge near this point.

Mr. CARY. No; not at this point; no.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But near it, 8 miles away.

Mr. CARY. It was 8 miles away.

Mr. ELTSE of California. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman if there is a report here from the War Department?

Mr. CARY. Yes. The chairman will explain that.

Mr. MILLIGAN. I have the report here. The report was late getting to the committee and was not included in the printed report.

Mr. ELTSE of California. Is this project agreeable to the War Department?

Mr. MILLIGAN. We have a favorable report from the Agricultural Department and from the War Department.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee how much attention he pays to recommendations from the Department of Agriculture? I notice in nearly all these cases the Department of Agriculture comes forward as opposed to these bridges. In the past I have never given a great deal of attention to them.

Mr. MILLIGAN. I may explain to the gentleman from Ohio that the Department of Agriculture, through the Bureau of Roads, is opposed to all private toll bridges.

The subcommittee and the committee feel that where there is no other way to build a bridge, the bridge should be built, although it is a private toll bridge, in order to give the people of the community the means of crossing the stream.

Mr. JENKINS. That has been the position I have always taken, and I should like to further inquire how the gentleman's committee construes the noble fight which our good friend from St. Louis has been putting up during all these years to protect the investors in these bridges.

Mr. MILLIGAN. My colleague, the gentleman from St. Louis, should have introduced sometime ago a blue-sky law to protect the people of St. Louis who are investing in bridge bonds. This was the only way he could protect his investors. We have passed the securities bill now, and this will give proper information to the investors of the city of St. Louis, so that they can inform themselves on the financial set-up of the company and the value of the bonds on the bridges that these people are to build.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman knows very well that Mr. Denison, a former Member of the House and a former chairman of the subcommittee on bridges, repeatedly introduced a blue-sky bill and I supported the bill on the floor of this House.

Mr. MILLIGAN. I agree with that.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But it was never passed and, of course, never became law.

Mr. MILLIGAN. That is correct.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If the people in the communities where these bridges are to be constructed would buy the bonds themselves and not come to my city and sell them to my constituents, they could build all the bridges they wanted to.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Of course, they cannot force the constituents of the gentleman's city to buy the bonds. They buy them of their own free will and accord.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report a similar Senate bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill (S. 1815), as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Owensboro, Ky., authorized to be built by the State Highway Commission of Kentucky by an act of Congress approved June 9, 1932, are hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from June 9, 1933.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS DEEPS CREEK, SUSSEX COUNTY, DEL.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1562, granting the consent of Congress to the Levy Court of Sussex County, Del., to reconstruct a bridge across the Deeps Creek at Cherry Tree Landing, Sussex County, Del.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Levy Court of Sussex County, Del., its successors and assigns, to reconstruct and maintain a bridge and approaches thereunto across the Deeps Creek, being a part of a navigable river from Concord, Del., to the Chesapeake Bay, at a point suitable to navigation, at or near Cherry Tree Landing, in the county of Sussex, State of Delaware, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "reconstruct and maintain a," and insert "reconstruct, maintain, and operate a free;" and in line 9, after the words "to", insert "the interests of;" and amend the title.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JUNE 6, 1933

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and most merciful Father, to whose compassion we owe our safety in days past, together with the blessings of this present life and the hope of that which is to come, enlarge our hearts with thankfulness for these Thy gracious favors, and grant that whatsoever Thou hast sown in mercy may spring up in abundant fruitage along the sacred path of duty.

Let Thy spirit interpret for each one of us the opportunities of this life of high vocation by lifting our souls above the weary round of care into the sanctuary of Thy presence, where, reposing in Thy love and being at rest from ourselves, we may thence return arrayed with peace to do only that which is well-pleasing in Thy sight. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal for the calendar day of Monday, June 5, 1933, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills of the Senate:

S. 604. An act amending section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes", approved December 29, 1916 (ch. 9, par. 1, 39 Stat. 862), and as amended February 28, 1931 (ch. 328, 46 Stat. 1454);

S. 687. An act providing for the establishment of a term of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida at Orlando, Fla.;

S. 1278. An act to amend an act (Public, No. 431, 72d Cong.) to identify The Dalles Bridge Co.; and

S. 1815. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Owensboro, Ky.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1562) granting the consent of Congress to the Levy Court of Sussex County, Del., to reconstruct a bridge across the Deeps Creek at Cherry Tree Landing, Sussex County, Del., with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1580) to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation, and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed bills of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 3511. An act to authorize the creation of a game refuge in the Ouachita National Forest in the State of Arkansas;

H.R. 3659. An act to extend the mining laws of the United States to the Death Valley National Monument in California;

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

EMERGENCY RELIEF OF RAILROADS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1580) to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation, and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

Mr. DILL. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives, ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. DILL, Mr. SMITH, Mr. WHEELER, Mr. FESS, and Mr. METCALF conferees on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining:

Senate Joint Resolution 23, relative to memorializing Congress in regard to mining claims

Whereas current economic conditions, and particularly conditions in the mining industry, are such that expenditures to maintaining mining claims constitute a distinct hardship on the claimants; and

Whereas a temporary suspension of the requirement of Federal law that "not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made each year" to maintain a mining claim will materially relieve the situation and permit the maintenance of many claims which would otherwise be allowed to lapse, to the detriment of claimants who have already expended considerable sums in the maintenance of such claims: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Congress be urged to provide for a 2-year suspension of such requirement; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent by the secretary of the senate to the Members of Congress from this State.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Senate Joint Resolution 24, memorializing Congress to provide relief for the oil industry

Whereas business generally, not only in California and the Southwest but throughout all the oil-producing States, affecting over 22,000,000 people, have been directly depressed by the long-distressed condition of the oil industry, and which depressed condition has now become very serious; and

Whereas excessive importations of foreign oils continue to flow into our country, constantly increasing in volume, until the flood has reached alarming proportions; and

Whereas in California in 1932 the total production of crude oil was over 115,000,000 barrels less than for the year of 1929, which tremendous loss would have been saved had there been a tax or tariff of $1.03 per barrel on crude oil, thereby placing domestic oil on a competitive basis with importations, as shown by the latest report of the Tariff Commission; and

Whereas prior to the year of 1928 there was a market for California crude oil, and particularly low-grade fuel oil, of which California has 100,000,000 barrels in storage, which market has been taken away from this State by the importation of foreign oil at a price that California producers cannot compete with on account of the oil being produced with cheap foreign labor; and

Whereas not only have the farmers and the schools sustained severe losses but also banking, transportation, manufacturing, industry, utility, and every type and character of business have been adversely affected by the distressed condition of the oil industry and by the great loss in purchasing power due to the taking of our domestic markets by the importations of cheap foreign oil; and

Whereas the general unemployment situation has been very greatly aggravated by the thousands of oil-field workers, geologists, land men, lease men, scouts, and office employees forced out of employment and by the thousands now unemployed but formerly employed by the businesses dependent on the oil industry, the third largest industry in the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of California (the assembly thereof concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, memorialized to give relief to the distressed oil industry, and thereby to the Nation generally, by immediately levying an adequate tax or tariff upon imported petroleum and its refined products that will enable our domestic oil industry to meet importations of foreign oil and its refined products on a competitive basis, as shown by the report of the Tariff Commission; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the presiding officers of the legislative bodies of the other oil-producing States, with the request that they transmit similar memorials to Congress, and that a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States and to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States and to each of the Members from California of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Concurrent resolution

Whereas, by the act of Congress of March 3, 1931, 46 Statutes at Large, 1494, it is provided, among other things, that every contract in excess of $5,000 in amount to which the United States is a party, which requires or involves the employment of laborers or mechanics in the construction, alteration, and/or repair of any public buildings of the United States within the geographical limits of the States of the Union or of the District of Columbia shall contain a provision to the effect that the rate of wage for all laborers and mechanics employed by the contractor or the subcontractor on the public buildings covered by the contract shall be not less than the prevailing rate of wage for work of a similar nature in the city, town, village, or other civil division of the State in which such public buildings are located; and

Whereas under said provisions the Territory of Hawaii is not included in the operation of said act; and

Whereas conditions in the Territory are not essentially different from those in the various States of the Union insofar as contracts of the nature mentioned in said act of Congress are concerned, and there is therefore no reasonable basis for discrimination against the Territory in respect to such contracts: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America be and it hereby is respectfully memorialized to extend to the Territory of Hawaii, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of said act of Congress of March 3, 1931, 46 Statutes at Large, 1494, to the end that the said provisions shall be applicable, to the same extent as in the States of the Union, to public contracts of the United States for the construction, operation, and/or repair of public buildings of the United States in the Territory of Hawaii; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the President of the Senate of the Congress of the United States of America, and also to the Secretary of the Interior and to the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, May 25, 1933.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted in the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii on March 6, 1933.

HERBERT N. AHUNG,
Speaker House of Representatives.
EDWARD WOODWARD,
Clerk House of Representatives.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, May 25, 1933.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted in the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii on May 25, 1933.

GEO. P. COOKE,
President of the Senate.
ELLEN D. SMYTHE,
Clerk of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

House Joint Memorial 5 (by Mr. Lingo)

To the President and the Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully represent:

That the construction and existence of a highway for automobile travel between Seattle, Wash., and Fairbanks, Alaska, passing through British Columbia and Yukon Territory, Canada, would be of inestimable benefit both to the United States and Canada and that in consideration of this fact the President of the United States, Herbert Hoover, appointed a commission of three members to study this project, and that the aforesaid commission has prepared a report that has demonstrated beyond all conjecture that the proposed highway is not only eminently feasible and practicable but its effects will even be in excess of those anticipated, and that it is not only of vital importance to the whole Northwest but to North America and perhaps the world as well.

That the labors of this commission have been interrupted by the recent change in the national administration, and your memorialists pray that this commission be continued with such change in personnel as may be deemed advisable, to the end that cooperation between the political entities involved is attained and that the construction of this great project may immediately ensue.

That since this project was first promulgated, a condition of depression has come about and industrial employment has failed, and that this condition has created a catastrophe of world proportions, and we respectfully submit that this project contains the elements of the solution for this condition, which may be made effective at very small expenditure, and that hence the need for the immediate construction of this highway constitutes an international emergency for—

1. It is a fact that expanding frontier markets have been a chief factor in the continuing prosperity of North America. It is also a fact that only in Alaska and the Canadian North does the opportunity for the development of such market exist. The per capita consumption is greater in Alaska than in any other country in the world.

2. It is a fact that an increase in gold production has, in all previous panics, provided the stimulus which restored normal conditions. It is well known that a mineral zone, highly auriferous, parallels the route of the proposed highway throughout British Columbia, Yukon Territory, and Alaska, and that this zone only awaits transportation to become productive. Alaska at present produces $330 in gold per annum for every white man, woman, and child in the Territory. There are 400,000 acres of known gold-bearing gravels and quartz within the Territory of Alaska alone.

3. The pressure of the unemployed in all previous depressions has been relieved by the natural employment furnished by free land and free natural opportunity. The proposed international highway renders accessible a continent of free opportunity.

4. Disturbed and turbulent conditions exist in the area of the Far East, the consequences of which no man can foresee. Alaska is in a highly critical and strategic position as an air base and thus the proposed projection of the international highway and airway is of transcendent importance. The ribbon of the highway not only furnishes an accurate guide, its series of connected air fields not only are an essential in the continuing development of aerial traffic, but in event of emergency the speed of surface transport cutting the travel time in half between the supply depots of the United States and Alaska may well be a deciding factor.

5. That this project will afford an immediate stimulus to the greatest producing and manufacturing interests of North America, the automotive, gas, oil, rubber, and accessory business, which exert the greatest economic influence in the world, is evidenced not only by the appeal of the mineral and agricultural resources of an undeveloped country, but by the stirring attraction of those immobile resources of scenery and game. The highway stretches north through the last frontier to the land of the midnight sun, passing back of the greatest mountain ranges on the North American Continent, peak after peak of transcendent beauty, tremendous glaciers still grinding out the Creator's work, smoking volcanoes still attesting that this is literally a land in the making; the game everywhere existing in its primitive abundance; caribou, moose, and sheep by the uncounted hundreds of thousands; myriads of lakes that are full of fish and have never known the touch of an artificial lure—all this would stir the minds of the adventurous and mobile population of the United States. Not only would the Alaskan problem be solved forever by bringing such a market to the country, but a great stimulus would be given the interests aforementioned.

6. As early as 1907, E. H. Harriman, the great American financier, proposed the construction of the Trans-Alaska-Siberian Railway Co., which contemplated the construction of a railroad through Canada, Alaska, and Siberia, with a tunnel under the Bering Strait. The justly famous J. A. L. Waddell, originator of the modern steel railway bridge, was chief engineer. This project was defeated, not because of the lack of economic resource, but because of international complications. It is submitted that there are many times the reasons for such a project now than there were at that early date. It is further submitted that the evolution of automotive traffic will continue. It is probable that in 10 years such transportation means will be as economically efficient as a railroad and that for a fraction of the expense such high form of transportation will result over the proposed highway. It is not to be forgotten that the international highway and airway contemplates the ultimate development of a world's highway.

7. That the total cost of this projected enterprise has been carefully estimated from reliable data to be $14,000,000. Of its total length of 2,000 miles, more than half is already built. Of this unconstructed length, less than 200 miles lie in Alaska. It is also apparent that Alaska would benefit out of all proportion to the length of line within her boundaries. It is also apparent that the financial requirement, when all the potentialities of the project are considered, does not constitute an obstacle. The obstacle arises in the distribution of the costs. The greatest length of line lies within the boundaries of the weakest member in point of financial resource.

It is submitted and most respectfully suggested therefore, that in view of the present emergency and the foregoing presentation of facts, that the basis of length of line between boundaries for prorating costs, be abandoned and that the project be considered as a whole, the benefits and costs to be shared equally by the political entities involved, viz, the United States, Canada, and British Columbia, this sum as estimated, being less than $5,000,000 apiece.

That we, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, feel that we offer, in this world's highway, and the successful solution of its problems, an historic opportunity to the Congress of the United States, and to its great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by a State-wide meeting of textile workers of South Carolina at Rock Hill, S.C., favoring an amendment to the so-called "national industrial recovery bill" abolishing the "stretch-out system" in the textile industry, also favoring the establishment of a minimum-wage scale of $12 per week for unskilled workers, 25 percent additional wages for semiskilled workers, and 25 percent greater wages for the skilled worker than for the semiskilled worker, and also favoring a senatorial investigation as to wages, hours of labor, and other conditions in the textile industry in South Carolina, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. COPELAND presented a memorial of sundry citizens of the State of New York, remonstrating against the imposition of additional income taxes on persons of the lower-salaried class who are without benefit of legal counsel, and favoring the equitable raising of additional taxes through the operation of a sales tax or similar method, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Middle Village Community Council, Inc., in the State of New York, favoring amendment of the home loan banking legislation so as to afford more adequate relief to home owners, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Veterans' Colony Camp, No. 128, Department of California, Pismo Beach, Calif., protesting against the curtailment of pensions and other benefits to veterans, their widows, and children, which were in force prior to March 20, 1933, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the National War Veterans' Association, Inc., of Jamaica, N.Y., favoring the passage of legislation to afford relief to nonveterans, residents of the State of New York, to the end that the unpaid balance of the adjusted-service certificates of World War veterans be used to alleviate conditions that might result in the possible loss of their homes, and also that all those who served in the armed forces of the United States in wars other than the World War be given proper consideration if they are in need of assistance, which were ordered to lie on the table.

TREATMENT OF JEWS IN GERMANY

Mr. COPELAND presented resolutions adopted by the Men's Club of Kehilath Israel, of the Bronx, N.Y., protesting against the persecution of, and alleged outrages committed against, members of the Jewish faith in Germany, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Men's Club of Kehilath Israel notes with increasing dismay and indignation the atrocities which have been and are being perpetrated against its brethren in Germany, wherein they are not only denied the pursuit of their daily undertakings but have in a very large number of instances been maligned, molested, injured, and even killed for the sole reason that they are Jews; and

Whereas the Men's Club of Kehilath Israel has learned with amazement and deep concern of the barbaric consignment to the flames, in Germany, of millions of copies of the Bible, the Talmud, and other Jewish works of religion, science, art, and belles-lettres: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Men's Club of Kehilath Israel express in this formal manner its sentiments as above outlined; and be it further

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of the club and a copy thereof be sent to the Senators for this State and to the Member of Congress representing this district in the House of Representatives.

Adopted May 23, 1933.

SUPPRESSION OF RACKETS AND RACKETEERING

Mr. COPELAND presented a telegram embodying resolutions adopted by the Crusaders antiracketeering mass meeting held in Carnegie Hall, New York City, and also an editorial from the New York American of the 6th instant entitled "United States Should Direct Racket Suppression", which were referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N.Y., June 5, 1933.

We, representative citizens of America in voluntary attendance assembled, do hereby wish to express through the Crusaders antiracketeering mass meeting held this night of Friday, June 2, at Carnegie Hall, our willingness to militantly support all public officials in local, State, and National Government in their efforts to restore law and order. We wish to commend our President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, in his fearless determination to get at the bottom of conditions which have been sucking the lifeblood of this country. We wish further to appeal to the millions of true Americans throughout America and any and all organizations of which they are a part to unite at once with the Crusader antiracketeering program to the end that an overwhelming force of numbers may be instantly established to eliminate and, if necessary, annihilate the forces of destruction which have so wantonly and brazenly been violating legitimate American business and decent American homes. This resolution shall serve notice to all in high places or low who have been traitorously betraying positions of public trust in the linking of public office with the multitudinous phases of this racketeering monster that now threatens to devour us. We call for the enlistment of the greatest army of American citizens ever organized to combat a menace within our borders far more serious than any danger ever faced from without. We, some thousands of American citizens in public mass meeting assembled, do hereby instruct copies of this resolution to be broadcast throughout the land; in particular, do we instruct this resolution to be dispatched to the President of the United States, Congress, and the Governors of each of the 48 States. This resolution presented and voted upon this 2d day of June 1933, at Carnegie Hall, New York.

THE CRUSADERS,
100 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

[Editorial from the New York American of June 6, 1933]

UNITED STATES SHOULD DIRECT RACKET SUPPRESSION

Each day brings new and convincing evidence that the country is at last awake to the menace and disgrace of the racket.

On Friday, in New York City, an impressive mass meeting was held under the auspices of the Junior Crusaders, a Nation-wide organization of patriotic youth. It was the first of a series of similar meetings to be held in 120 cities throughout the country.

The slogan of this excellent organization is "The Gangster and His Political Ally Must Go."

This states the issue adequately. Although it does not expressly mention the contributory factors of lax prosecutors and the occasional absence of proper zeal on the part of law-enforcement agencies, the inertness of pursuit and prosecution can fairly be said to be included in the alliance of politics with gangster crime. It is from the corrupt politician that the racketeer derives the immunity and protection which make possible his illegal operations.

A most significant note was sounded in a telegram addressed to the meeting by the United States Attorney General, Homer Cummings. In expressing regret that he could not be present, the head of the Nation's Department of Justice said:

"Racketeering must not be permitted to thrive in our land of ordered liberty. It must be put down as a national menace."

With the enlistment of the Federal power in the suppression of racketeering, the crusade started by the Hearst papers several weeks ago may be said to have achieved its first major objective.

The spread of the racket throughout the country, the ease with which underworld orders given in one city are executed in places far removed—the activity of numerous gangs and gang leaders operating in unison from widely separated points—present problems in detection and prevention that are beyond the power of local authority acting alone.

Only by a coordination of the Nation's law-enforcement agencies can an effective drive be made against this great body of widely dispersed crime and criminals.

Such unification of effort can best be achieved—perhaps only achieved—under the leadership and direction of the Federal Department of Justice.

It alone can bring into a combination of effort all the State and local authorities, as well as the Federal district attorneys.

With such a union, the task of uprooting racketeering from American life can be undertaken with high hopes of success.

Let no one underestimate, however, the necessity of determined effort on this great scale or the gravity of the danger which the country faces.

As Dr. Mather Abbott, the headmaster of the famous Lawrenceville School and a speaker at the mass meeting, put it:

"America is at war and the enemy is the most insidious, most destructive, most cunning, most brutal that an American has ever faced."

The people of the United States are at last aroused to the realities of the situation and see the problem clearly.

They will not tolerate this most repulsive form of crime!

They intend to purge American life of the racketeer and all his works, and in all the levels of society where he is encountered.

This work of cleansing must go on without slowing or stoppage until the task is done—and well done—once and for all!

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McCARRAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H.R. 5690) to legalize the manufacture, sale, or possession of 3.2-percent beer in the State of Oklahoma when and if the same is legalized by a majority vote of the people of Oklahoma or by an act of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 116) thereon.

Mr. NORRIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 752) to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended, with respect to the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States over suits relating to orders of State administrative boards, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 125) thereon.

Mr. AUSTIN (for Mr. STEPHENS and himself) submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary to accompany Senate bill 752, reported from that committee as shown above, which were ordered to be printed as part 2 of Report No. 125.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 1774) to provide for extension of time for making deferred payments on homestead entries in the abandoned Fort Lowell Military Reservation, Ariz., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 117) thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1745. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Umpqua River at or near Reedsport, Douglas County, Oreg. (Rept. No. 118);

S. 1746. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across Yaquina Bay at or near Newport, Lincoln County, Oreg. (Rept. No. 119);

S. 1747. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across Alsea Bay at or near Walport, Lincoln County, Oreg. (Rept. No. 120);

S. 1748. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across Coos Bay at or near North Bend, Coos County, Oreg. (Rept. No. 121); and

S. 1749. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Siuslaw River at or near Florence, Lane County, Oreg. (Rept. No. 122).

Mr. SHEPPARD also, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 1742) granting consent of Congress to Ernest N. Hutchinson, Otto A. Case, and A. C. Martin to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Deception Pass between Whidby Island and Fidalgo Island, in the State of Washington, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 123) thereon.

Mr. BYRNES, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (H.R. 5790) to provide for organizations within the Farm Credit Administration to make loans for the production and marketing of agricultural products, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, to provide a market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 124) thereon.

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 1808) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary in 1936 of the independence of Texas and of the noble and heroic sacrifices of her pioneers, whose revered memory has been an inspiration to her sons and daughters during the past century, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the resolution (S.Res. 86) directing the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia to investigate facts pertaining to housing in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 126) thereon.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on June 5, 1933, that committee presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 510) to provide for the establishment of a national employment system and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such system, and for other purposes.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. DILL:

A bill (S. 1841) for the relief of Alta Melvin and Thomas Melvin; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HASTINGS:

A bill (S. 1842) to amend sections 211, 245, and 312 of the Criminal Code, as amended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BULKLEY:

A bill (S. 1843) for the relief of Fred H. Buckman; and

A bill (S. 1844) for the relief of James Foy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. STEPHENS:

A bill (S. 1845) to prohibit the export of certain goods except in vessels of the United States; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WALSH:

A bill (S. 1846) authorizing the appointment and retirement of Fred P. Brown as a lieutenant (junior grade), United States Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. VANDENBERG:

A bill (S. 1847) to amend an act entitled "An act creating the Great Lakes Bridge Commission and authorizing said commission and its successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich.", approved June 25, 1930, and to extend the times for commencing and completing construction of said bridge; to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO INDUSTRIAL CONTROL AND PUBLIC WORKS BILL

Mr. BORAH, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. MCADOO, Mr. TRAMMELL, and Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to House bill 5755, the so-called "industrial control and public works bill", which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. VANDENBERG submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 5755, the so-called "industrial control and public works bill", which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H.R. 3511. An act to authorize the creation of a game refuge in the Ouachita National Forest, in the State of Arkansas; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

H.R. 3659. An act to extend the mining laws of the United States to the Death Valley National Monument in California; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

H.R. 4872. An act authorizing Farris Engineering Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near California, Pa.;

H.R. 5394. An act authorizing Charles V. Bossert, his heirs and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the East River between Bronx and Whitestone Landing;

H.R. 5495. An act to amend an act entitled "An act creating the Great Lakes Bridge Commission and authorizing said commission and its successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich.", approved June 25, 1930, and to extend the times for commencing and completing construction of said bridge;

H.R. 5589. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Washington, Mo., to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Missouri River at or near Washington, Mo.; and

H.R. 5793. An act to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act authorizing Jed P. Ladd, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Lake Champlain from East Alburg, Vt., to West Swanton, Vt.", approved March 2, 1929; to the Committee on Commerce.

H.R. 5645. An act to amend the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

H.R. 5884. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INVESTIGATION OF THE PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. President, I submit a resolution providing for a thoroughgoing investigation of the oil industry of the United States, which I request may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and referred as indicated.

The resolution (S.Res. 92) was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee consisting of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed to investigate the production, purchase, storage, transportation, refining, and sale of petroleum and its products, with particular regard to monopolistic practices. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations for legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-third Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $20,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

INVESTIGATION OF STOCK-EXCHANGE AND INVESTMENT PRACTICES—EXPENDITURES

Mr. COSTIGAN submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 93), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the limit of expenditures under Senate Resolution No. 84, Seventy-second Congress, agreed to March 4, 1932, to investigate the practice of "short selling" of listed securities upon stock exchanges and its effect on actual values, as continued in force by Senate Resolution No. 239, Seventy-second Congress, agreed to June 21, 1932, and further continued in force by Senate Resolution No. 371, Seventy-second Congress, agreed to February 28, 1933, and as supplemented by Senate Resolution No. 56, Seventy-third Congress, agreed to April 4, 1933, is hereby increased by $100,000.

INVESTIGATION OF AIR AND OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS—EXPENDITURES

Mr. BLACK submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 94), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the limit of expenditures under Senate Resolution No. 349, Seventy-second Congress, second session, agreed to February 25, 1933, creating a special committee of the Senate to investigate air mail and ocean mail contracts, is hereby increased by $75,000.

PAY OF PAGES DURING MONTH OF JUNE

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 95), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay the pages for the Senate Chamber, from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate allowed by law from and including the day following the adjournment of the present session of Congress to and including the 30th day of June 1933.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT (H.R. 5755)

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a statement in support of the National Industrial Recovery Act (H.R. 5755), by myself.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR DAVID I. WALSH IN SUPPORT OF THE NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY BILL (H.R. 5755)

The action of the Senate Finance Committee in favorably reporting the bill to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works will be followed by the Senate giving its approval to this important measure within a few days.

It is an unprecedented measure. It proposes to confer upon the President and agents and agencies of his own designation and creation unlimited authority over capital and labor. It gives the President virtually a blank check on the Treasury to pay for whatever job-making enterprises he elects to have the Government itself undertake, whether it be the building of a highway or post office, bridge, or battleship.

These are the powers of a dictator, ordinarily repugnant to the American people and contrary to the concepts of freedom and democracy upon which our Republic was founded. However, in our present economic adversity and peril, we are willing to resort to extreme measures if they hold promise of relief or recovery. It is self-evident that the reemployment of 12,000,000 men and women out of work is America's now all-paramount problem. That has been the underlying purpose and the ultimate objective of all that Congress has done or tried to do to avert a collapse of our financial and credit structure, to save our banks, our insurance companies and our railroads, to relieve prostrate agriculture, and to relieve debtors, public and private, and to lift prices and to promote industry and trade.

I am prepared, and I believe Congress and the American people are prepared, to acquiesce in the extraordinary proposals embodied in this bill. Success or failure, good or harm, will not depend upon the authorizations but rather upon the administration of this extraordinary grant of power.

Among other things, the bill creates a partnership between Government and industry. Minimum hours of labor and minimum wage scales, production, and prices are all within the President's authority. Industries will be permitted to agree upon these things for themselves, but only with the President's approval and consent. Industry may be licensed on such terms as the President lays down. He may prescribe "a limited code of fair competition." Antitrust laws are suspended. The control, however, is temporary and is limited to 2 years from the date of its enactment. The President, however, may at an earlier date declare the emergency as ended.

As to the labor features of the bill, I have long been a believer in the principle of a 5-day week. It is now more than 2 years since I offered a bill providing for a 5-day week in the Government service, with the conviction that the Government ought to blaze the trail and set an example for private business in this matter. I voted for the Black 30-hour week bill, which passed the Senate several weeks ago, though I recognized the serious difficulties in the way of the application of a rigid limitation of hours of work to all industries. I recognized further that a reduction in the hours of labor by legislative decree without any provision for the maintenance of a minimum wage, was fraught with grave danger to the wage earners.

There is no fixed limitation on hours of labor or on wages in the present bill (except as to public works). The President is given a free hand in the matter for the sake of flexibility and in order that hours of labor and wages may be accommodated to the varying necessities in different industries. With respect to public works, there is a 30-hour per week limitation and a provision that wages shall be "just and reasonable", and "sufficient to provide * * * a standard of living in decency and comfort." We have every reason to assume that the regulations respecting hours of labor and wages in private industry will have a similar objective.

I have long advocated legislation to modify the antitrust laws insofar as they operate to impede trade and to prevent proper limitation of production and to promote ruthless competition. As matters stand today, the antitrust laws, which were designed to prevent monopolies and to promote fair competition, actually operate to permit destructive competition, injurious to the legitimate producers and the organized employees. I have recognized, however, that if we were to lift the barriers against monopoly in order to permit trade agreements, we must substitute other safeguards for the public, to make sure that the trade agreements were in the public interest. I offered a bill for this purpose at the last session, and a few weeks ago introduced a similar but revised bill in the present Congress for the licensing of business.

The present bill offers to business and industry an escape during the depression from the antitrust laws but with full authority in the President to safeguard the public interest.

I find myself especially in full sympathy, therefore, with the main provisions in title I of the present bill, title I being the industrial recovery section.

Another important title to the bill is the authorization given the President to spend $3,000,000,000 for the carrying on of public works to relieve unemployment.

The bill provides new taxes to supply this required additional revenue for public works. Sound Government finance requires the levying of these additional taxes. While all taxes are burdensome, I think those provided in the Senate bill are preferable to the increase in income taxes levied in the House bill.

The tax features as framed by the House would mean at least a 50-percent increase in income taxes, on top of the tremendously heavy increases of last year, and for some people would mean a doubling of the taxes. This tax would be especially burdensome upon the people with modest salaries. The failure of the Government to receive income taxes from the rich by reason of their incomes being reduced and by reason of their being allowed to charge off their losses against their earnings has shifted the income-tax burden to the middle and salaried classes. The tax features of the Senate bill are decidedly preferable to the House bill.

THE USE OF SILVER AS MONEY

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by William A. Hesse, of Juneau, Alaska, entitled "Silver—Some Pertinent Facts Relating to Bimetallism."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SILVER—SOME PERTINENT FACTS RELATING TO BIMETALLISM

By William A. Hesse

The theory of bimetallism is not a fad. It was not an hallucination of William Jennings Bryan, nor was he by any means the father of the idea. There are many people who believe that bimetallism is sponsored by certain mining interests for the benefit of that industry. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Bimetallists agree that the restoration of silver as money would tremendously help the mining industry, yet that in itself is so insignificant that it might as well be neglected in the discussion of the subject.

There are 800,000,000 people of the world living outside of the United States who now use silver exclusively as money and who have always used silver exclusively as money, and who are unable to trade with us for the reason that their money as measured by gold is worthless.

These people would like to buy our wheat, our cotton, our salmon, and our manufactured articles, but by reason of their depreciated currencies are unable to do so.

This is but half the story. Since their money, compared with ours, is depreciated, it follows that their production costs are proportionately less, and here is the source of most of the world's trouble today. Japan, with her currency depreciated 50 percent, as compared with ours, is able to send her products to our shores, pay the freight and the duty, and still undersell the American producer. Other countries are enabled to do the same thing, so that apart from their being able to undersell us in the world market, they have now invaded our domestic market. This not only goes merrily on but increases as the gold dollar appreciates, so that our gold instead of being an advantage is now proving to be a curse.

Some people believe that because we have silver coins we still recognize silver as money. A man recently said, "Can I not take a silver dollar to the store and get 100 cents worth of goods for it?" Assuredly you can; but melt the dollar into bullion and see what you get for it. The Government stamp on the silver dollar is the pledge of the Government to honor it the same as any other money that bears that stamp. In the case of the silver dollar, 80 cents represents the faith and credit of the Government and 20 cents the value of the bullion in the coin.

This is not, however, so with gold coins. Any gold coin, unless it is abraded, is worth exactly its face value when melted into billion. Each 5-, 10-, and 20-dollar gold piece has exactly 5, 10, and 20 dollars' worth of pure gold, respectively, in it at the time it is minted. The cost of the minting and the cost of the alloy are borne by the Government, and that is what is meant by free coinage.

The records show that in 437 years the ratio of production of silver to gold was 14.14 to 1 and the records also show that while there have been variations in the production of the metals from time to time, the monetary ratio fixed by law was not disturbed by the variation in production. For example, from the year 1801 to 1850 the monetary ratio of silver to gold remained at 15.7 to 1, notwithstanding the fact that during that period 28 ounces of silver were produced to 1 ounce of gold, while from 1851 to 1873 there were 6.7 ounces of silver produced to each ounce of gold, and the monetary ratio of silver to gold stood at 15.5 to 1. In other words, the variation in the monetary ratio covering two periods of extreme variation in production was slightly less than 2 cents on the ounce of silver.

History confirms the statement of Aristotle, the great Greek philosopher, who said 300 years before Christ that "Money by itself has no value, only by law and not by nature."

If William Jennings Bryan's position on the question of bimetallism was untenable, if those who followed him on that proposition were likewise misguided, let us examine history and see where some of the other illustrious Americans stood on that subject.

Thomas Jefferson at first wanted silver as the basis of monetary value, for he said that he believed that silver was less liable to fluctuation than gold since it represented the money of by far the largest group of mankind. But Alexander Hamilton, the greatest financial genius of his time, pointed out reasons for believing that silver and gold should both constitute the money base, and Jefferson became convinced and yielded.

Listen to what Hamilton had to say about the matter. "To annul the use of either metal is to abridge the quantity of the circulating medium and is liable to all the objections which arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full with the evils of a scanty circulation."

Daniel Webster was never accredited with being a fanatic and this is what he said: "I am certainly of the opinion that gold and silver at the rates fixed by Congress constitute the legal standard of value of this country, and that neither Congress nor any State has the authority to establish any other value or to displace this standard."

Hon. John G. Carlisle, one of the most brilliant men of his time, said: "I know that the world's stock of precious metals is none too large, and I see no reason to apprehend that it will ever become so. Mankind will be fortunate, indeed, if the annual production of gold and silver shall keep pace with the annual increase in population, commerce, and industry. According to my view of the subject, the conspiracy to demonetize silver, which seems to have been formed here and in Europe, to destroy, by legislation and otherwise, from three sevenths to one half of the metallic money of the world, is the most gigantic crime of this or any other age. The consummation of such a scheme would ultimately entail more misery upon the human race than all the wars, pestilence, and famine that ever occurred in the history of the world. The absolute and instantaneous destruction of half of the movable property of the world, including houses, ships, railroads, and all other appliances for carrying on commerce, while it would be felt more sensibly at the moment, would not produce anything like the prolonged distress and disorganization of society that must inevitably result from the permanent annihilation of half of the metallic money of the world."

No one would say that the clear-thinking James G. Blaine was a crank, and this is what he had to say about the demonetization of silver: "On the much-vexed and long-mooted question of a bimetallic or a monometallic standard, my own views are sufficiently indicated in the remarks that I have made. I believe that the struggle now going on in this country and in other countries for a single standard would, if successful, produce widespread disaster in and throughout the commercial world. The destruction of silver as money and establishing gold as the sole unit of value, must have a ruinous effect on all forms of property except those investments which yield a fixed return in money. These would be enormously enhanced in value, and would gain a disproportionate and unfair advantage over every other species of property. I believe gold and silver coin to be the money of the Constitution; indeed, the money of the American people anterior to the Constitution, which the great organic law recognized as quite independent of its own existence. No power was conferred upon Congress to declare that either metal should not be money. Congress has, therefore, in my judgment, no more power to demonetize either, any more than to demonetize both. * * * If, therefore, silver has been demonetized, I am in favor of remonetizing it. If its coinage has been prohibited, I am in favor of having it resumed. If it has been restricted, I am in favor of having it enlarged."

In the year 1840, during the monetary debates in Congress, the illustrious Henry Clay made the following observations: "The proposed substitution of an exclusive metallic currency to the mixed medium with which we have been so long familiar is forbidden by the principles of eternal justice. All property will be reduced in value to one third of its present nominal amount, and every debtor would, in effect, have to pay three times as much as he contracted for. The pressure of our foreign debt would be three times as great as it is; while the six hundred millions, which is the sum now probably due the banks from the people, would be multiplied to eighteen hundred millions! If currency be greatly diminished, how is this debt to be extinguished? Property, the resource on which the debtor relied for his payment, will decline in value, and it may happen that a man who honestly contracted a debt, on the faith of property which had a value at the time fully adequate to warrant the debt, will find himself stripped of all his property and his debt remaining unextinguished. * * * But if this policy of money be injurious to the debtor class, it is still more disastrous on the laboring classes."

On the 3d day of October 1873, nearly 8 months after he had signed the fraudulent demonetization bill, unconscious of what he did, President Grant wrote to his friend, Mr. Cowdry:

"I wonder why it (silver) is not already coming into the market to supply the deficiency in the circulating medium. * * * Silver will gradually take the place of currency and, further, will become the standard of values, which will be hoarded in a small way. * * * I confess to a desire to see a limited hoarding of money, but I want to see a hoarding of something that is the standard of value the world over. Silver is this." It was felt at the time by President Grant that the country which was burdened with an immense debt and prostrate from the effects of the Civil War would soon resume a specie basis and recover rapidly as a result. He did not dream that he had signed a bill destroying the very thing that was our only hope for salvation.

On October 2, 1893, Hon. James H. Kyle, on the floor of the United States Senate, said: "There is almost a revolution today, Mr. President, through tampering with the monetary standards. The people protest against the attempt to bring the country and the world to a gold standard. * * * It has been proven, I think, that silver is less variable than gold, and therefore should be preserved as a measuring standard."

It has been asked, if the demonetization of silver threatened disaster in 1893, why then did that disaster not overtake us? The answer to that question is very simple. The discovery of the great South African gold mines, the discovery of the Klondike gold fields, the discovery of the gold ores of Cripple Creek, to say nothing of the discovery of the cyanide process for the recovery of gold from ores, turned a stream of gold into the channels of trade. It was this alone that averted a disaster at the time. Bimetallism is not an American institution. Silver and gold together have served mankind efficiently and faithfully as standards of value for 5,000 years.

Let us see what some of the world's greatest thinkers outside of America have had to say about this.

In 1868, when the first gesture was made by the bondholding class to destroy silver as money throughout the world and to establish gold as the sole measure of value, Count Wolowski and Mr. Ernest Seyd made the following remarkable prophecy:

"The demonetization of silver by any great civilized nation must produce the following results:

"(1) The international trade of the world will instantly show signs of decline, to the special injury of countries having the greatest international trade.

"(2) The spirit of public enterprise will be immediately checked and the general progress of civilization will suffer.

"(3) The decline of prices will compel countries internationally indebted to depart more and more from the principle of free trade toward a policy of protection.

"(4) Nations of the world will be divided into two groups—one trading in gold, the other in silver—and this condition will render commerce between them unsafe and precarious.

"(5) Throughout the world a decline in prices will follow, injurious alike to the owners of real property and the laboring classes, and advantageous only, and unjustly so, to the holders of State bonds and similar securities.

"(6) One of the principal difficulties in this period of depression will be that people will look for its causes in all possible directions. The advocates of the gold standard will offer all possible groundless and fantastic excuses or reasons of a secondary nature only, and the real cause, the demonetization of silver, will be overlooked until the perspicuity of the phenomenon and dire necessity shall force thinking men to point it out."

What do we find today? Has not the spirit of public enterprise been checked? Has not commerce between gold-using nations and silver-using nations become precarious? Have not the holders of real property and the laboring classes been adversely affected, and finally has not everything from beer to technocracy been ascribed to the cause?

Let us face the facts impartially. Silver cannot be ascribed to be the cause of this breakdown because it is debased and degraded; and if its restoration would bring the world any nearer to disaster than the present gold standard already has, then nobody wants to see it restored.

Let us see what a famous advocate of the gold standard has to say in defence of that monstrous system. This is Mr. Gladstone speaking in support of his beloved country and the gold standard:

"England being the chief creditor nation of the world, it is to her interest to keep the volume of money as small as possible in countries from which debts are due to her citizens."

Of course, speaking for the creditor classes Mr. Gladstone's position was right. What did Mr. Gladstone care, or what does the creditor class care how much humanity suffers? But there were other Englishmen those days as there are today who did not share Mr. Gladstone's selfish view. Let us first hear what Sir H. Houldsworth, delegate of Great Britain to the Brussels conference in 1892, had to say:

"In the first place, I am, from my position and antecedents, more peculiarly identified with industrial and commercial life than any of my honorable colleagues, and I need scarcely remark that it is industry and commerce in their widest aspects which are more vitally interested in, and will be most profoundly affected by the decisions at which this conference arrives. In the second place, I have had the honor and responsibility of sitting upon both of those important commissions in England which were appointed to examine into the question intimately connected with that which we are called upon to discuss here. All available statistics were brought before us and a large amount of evidence was taken. Conflicting opinions were expressed both as to the extent and the causes of the depression; but at least five definite conclusions were arrived at:

"(1) The depression dated from the year 1873 or thereabouts.

"(2) That it extended to nearly every branch of industry, including agriculture, manufacturing, and mining, and that it was not confined to England, but had been experienced to a greater or less degree in all of the industrial countries of the world.

"(3) That it appeared to be closely connected with a serious fall in general prices.

"(4) That the duration of the depression was most unusual and abnormal.

"(5) That no adequate cause for this state of things was discoverable unless it could be ascribed to some general dislocation of values caused by currency changes.

"In consequence of this report, and at the express recommendation of the commissioners themselves, the Gold and Silver Royal Commission was appointed. It was the sense of that commission that the serious consequences had resulted from the destruction of that par of exchange between silver and gold at about 15½ to 1 which had practically existed uninterruptedly for 70 years before 1873, the disruption of which had dislocated, embarrassed, and to some extent destroyed the trade between silver-using and gold-using countries, and turned legitimate commerce into little better than gambling."

Just listen to what Sir Guilford Molesworth, delegate of British India to the Brussels Monetary Conference, had to say:

"Now this state of things was clearly predicted by Ernest Seyd in 1871 when the severance of the link between gold and silver was first contemplated. His prediction has been so remarkably fulfilled that I must quote his words. 'It is a great mistake to suppose that the adoption of the gold valuation by other states besides England will be beneficial. It will only lead to the destruction of the monetary equilibrium hitherto existing, and a decline in prosperity over all the world.

"'The strong doctrinarianism in England as regards the gold valuation is so blind that when the time of the depression sets in there will be this special feature: The economic authorities of the country will refuse to listen to the cause here foreshadowed; every possible attempt will be made to prove that the decline of commerce is due to all sorts of causes and irreconcilable matters; the workman and his strikes will be the first convenient target; then speculation and overtrading will have their turn. Many other allegations will be made, totally irrelevant to the real issue, but satisfactory to the moralizing tendency of financial writers.'

"In fulfillment of this prediction we find that the difficulties under which we labor have been attributed to all sorts of irreconcilable causes. It has been necessary to invent a theory that progress in manufacture, improved transport, inventions, and banking have caused a species of economic revolution, which has created a new state in the conditions of trade and commerce differing from that which previously existed. But they overlook the fact that the alleged causes have been in active operation during the greater portion of the century. * * * It is obvious, therefore, that such a revolution if it existed, should have arisen at an earlier period, and that it should have developed gradually instead of setting in suddenly at the exact moment when the link was broken between silver and gold. It is absurd to suppose that a revolution of this character could have affected gold pieces so seriously and yet should have left silver prices uneffected. Silver is the standard of value for more than half the world, yet silver prices have remained stable, whilst gold prices have fallen from 40 to 50 percent. Whilst shutting their eyes to these facts, the advocates of such a theory are blind to the following facts:

"(1) The depression which has occurred as a consequence of the suspension of the free coinage of silver in France was predicted, and the prediction has been fulfilled to the letter.

"(2) That since 1871 the population demanding gold has quadrupled, and the foreign trade demanding gold has trebled.

"(3) That the annual supply of gold scarcely exceeds the amount required for industrial purposes.

"(4) The demonetization of silver for international monetary purposes in Europe has caused gold to perform, single-handed, the work previously done by gold and silver combined.

"It follows as a necessary consequence of these facts that with the increased demand for gold its value must rise, or what is the same thing, the gold prices of commodities must fall. The judicial blindness must be great which, ignoring this strong evidence of facts, seeks an explanation in irrelevant theories.

"A very distinguished member of this conference has likened silver to a sick man whose state has been but aggravated by medicines which have been administered to cure him; but I think that this is not surprising, inasmuch as the physicians have not merely mistaken the character of the illness, but have mistaken the invalid. It is gold who is the sick man, not silver. They have mistaken the bloated condition of gold for symptoms of health, whereas it is the symptom of a dangerous disease which now threatens to develop into a fearful crisis, one which is frightful to contemplate.

"I am not one of those who believe in the efficacy of simple purchases of silver to relieve the situation. I have for years past publicly expressed the opinion that the purchases of silver under the Bland Act and similar bills were opposed to the first principles of monetary science, and must, unless the true remedy be eventually applied, end in disaster."

The last paragraph of the above quotation is significant and goes to the heart of the monetary question. No true bimetallist wants silver as a commodity. The purchase of silver as a commodity is class legislation that affects nothing but the mining industry, and can never cure our economic ills. The restoration of silver at an agreed value ratio with gold, with the money function attached to both, is the true remedy that the above speaker had in mind and the only solution of the problem.

It has been said that the remonetization of silver will result in a flood of the cheap metal. How can one metal be more valuable or less valuable than the other when the price has been fixed by law? And what other agency for fixing the price of money exists but the legislative agency? The price of no commodity can be fixed by law, but the price of money can only be fixed that way.

It has been said that if we adopt bimetallism the United States will be flooded with silver. Just where is this silver to come from? There are less than 4,000,000,000 ounces of coin and bullion silver in the whole world. Is it reasonable to suppose that the silver-using nations are going to divest themselves of all their silver? Is it reasonable to suppose that those whose only money for the past 5,000 years has been silver are going to get rid of it? Why did they not do so before when we had bimetallism? The records show that they increased their holdings of silver during that period.

The only flood that America need fear is a flood of orders for American products. Assuming that every country is going to dump its money upon us, would that not come through the purchases of our products and is that not what we want?

If all the available coin and bullion silver in the whole world was sent to the United States and coined on a basis of 16 to 1, it would hardly more than pay the national deficit for the past 3 years.

The statement has been made that there is an abundance of money. If this is true, why then was it recently increased by more than a billion dollars? On March 29 there was $6,353,000,000 of all classes of money in the United States, and on April 3 there was $7,538,000,000 because of the expansion of the Federal Reserve notes in a desperate effort to save a total collapse of the financial structure of the Nation.

The amount of actual money in the country must not be confounded with bank deposits or credit, which is not actual money. In 1929 bank deposits in the United States amounted to $60,000,000,000, while in 1932 they had shrunk to $45,000,000,000.

It has been proved that money is as essential to modern civilization as oxygen is to animal life, and that every major panic of the world has been caused by a contraction of money and nothing else. Does anyone claim that there is a shortage of food with which to feed mankind, or a shortage of wool and cotton with which to clothe mankind, or a shortage of lumber and building materials with which to house mankind?

In the year 1820 Hon. William H. Crawford, United States Secretary of the Treasury, said: "All intelligent writers on currency agree; that when it is decreasing in amount, poverty and misery must prevail."

In the year 1874 Hon. Isaac Buchanan, of Ontario, Canada, said: "It seems that the question of money and the question of labor are one and the same question, the solution of one being the solution of the other; plentiful money being a convertible term for plentiful and well-paid employment."

John Stewart Mill, famous English economist, said: "If the whole money in circulation was doubled, prices would double. If it was increased one fourth, prices would increase one fourth."

A report from the United States Monetary Commission in 1877 says in part: "As the volume of money shrinks, the prices fall. When money is decreasing in volume, prices have no bottom except a receding one, and they are inexorably ruled by the volume of money. In the whole history of the world every great and general fall in prices has been preceded by a decrease in the volume of money. At the Christian era the metallic money of the Roman Empire amounted to $1,800,000,000. At the end of the fifteenth century it had shrunk to $200,000,000. During this period a most extraordinary and baleful change took place in the history of the world. The people were reduced by poverty to the most degraded condition of serfdom and misery. The disintegration of society was almost complete. The conditions of life were so hard that individual selfishness was the only instinct consistent with self-preservation. All public spirit, all generous emotions, all noble aspirations of man shriveled and disappeared as the volume of money shrunk and prices fell. That the Dark Ages were caused by decreasing money and falling prices and that the recovery therefrom and the comparative prosperity which followed the discovery of America were due to the increasing supply of precious metals and rising prices will not be surprising when the vitally important functions of money are understood. Without money civilization could not have had a beginning; with a diminishing supply it must languish and, unless relieved, finally perish."

Sir Archibald Alison, the great English historian, corroborates the foregoing testimony to the fullest extent, and says:

"Two great events in the history of mankind have been brought about by a successive contraction and expansion of the circulating medium of society. The fall of the Roman Empire, so long ascribed in ignorance to slavery, to heathenism, and to moral corruption, was in reality brought about by a decline in the silver and gold mines of Spain and Greece. And as if Providence intended to reveal in the clearest manner possible the influence of this mighty agent in human affairs, the restoration of mankind from the ruin this cause had produced was owing to the direct opposite set of agencies being put in operation. Columbus led the way in the career of renovation; when he spread his sails to cross the Atlantic, he bore mankind and its fortunes in his bark."

Since the whole world recognizes metallic money of some sort, we must approach the question by examining the metallic money reserves. It is well known that the monetary gold stock of the world on January 1, 1930, was less than $12,000,000,000, and that the total silver coin and bullion stock of the world at that time computed at $1.29 per ounce (the price representing the value ratio with gold of 16 to 1) was $4,099,914,000. Here we have, or would have, if silver was worth $1.29 an ounce, but $16,000,000,000 of monetary metals.

It is probably true, and it is to be hoped, that considerable silver would come out of hiding if the price were fixed at $1.29 per ounce. It is also probably true, and it is likewise to be hoped, that the production would be increased, but no flood of silver could occur for the reason that it does not exist. The world has not yet abandoned the metallic money base, and it is obvious to any thinking man that this money base is woefully inadequate. The world debt is estimated at $750,000,000,000, while our own internal debt is estimated at $200,000,000,000. This is not all. This debt was $200,000,000,000 at the time it was contracted, but by the appreciation of gold it has been swelled to $320,000,000,000, and this gulf between gold and debts that are payable in gold continues to widen. The advocates of bimetallism not only assert that the available supply of gold is totally inadequate to meet the requirements of the trade and commerce of the world estimated at $400,000,000,000 annually but that it has failed and collapsed as a result of its impotence.

Our Government now concludes that the safe course to follow is to lock up the gold and call in the paper redeemable in gold. What is the difference whether John Jones hoards gold or whether Uncle Sam hoards it? Some people seem to think that the answer to this question is $10,000 fine or 10 years' imprisonment.

Advocates of bimetallism further assert that such legislation as has been enacted during the past 3 years did not and could not afford any relief, and it is believed that the results of such legislation have fully substantiated this assertion.

Does anyone have the temerity to claim that conditions have improved or that prosperity has turned that phantom corner? The so-called "farm relief bill" admittedly enacted in good faith has cost the American taxpayer half a billion dollars, and the farmer is worse off than before. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, authorizing $3,800,000,000, has failed up to this time to produce any visible results. As to some of the other legislation which might be properly included under the head of "noble experiments", the less that is said the better.

The remonetization of silver at an agreed ratio with gold would cost nothing. It is the most important question that confronts mankind today. Those who are responsible for the gold standard and all the suffering that has resulted from it for everyone but themselves have told us for the last 3 years what is wrong and how to correct it. Is it not time to call another doctor, or shall we let the patient die from the effects of an operation that was technically successful?

The advocates of bimetallism have no case to prove. Silver and gold have been in honorable companionship as monetary standards from the dawn of history and until, through a conspiracy and human greed, that monetary standard was upset. If the gold standard is a good thing, why all this human suffering? If gold is the proper monetary standard, why then are all the nations of the world abandoning it? If the single gold standard is workable, let those who believe so prove it.

If you believe in the money of our ancestors, the money of Washington, Jefferson, and Hamilton; if you believe that Jefferson, Hamilton, Clay, Webster, Blaine, Carlisle, and scores of illustrious Americans, to say nothing of the great men of other countries, were right; if you are interested in seeing this Nation and the world come out of this morass in which we are now floundering, then write to your representatives in Congress today and ask them to give their earnest consideration to the Wheeler bill for the remonetization of silver now pending before Congress.

INVESTIGATION BY BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I am somewhat concerned because of reports being circulated these days with reference to the Morgan inquiry. I notice, for instance, in the Washington Herald this morning this headline:

Senators halt tax phase of Morgan quiz.

Then again:

The majority of the Banking Committee members sought to have Pecora and the Morgan counsel, John W. Davis, reach a "stipulation" as to the facts to be developed with respect to the personal-tax returns of the Morgan partners.

Mr. President, that is the most amazing suggestion I have ever heard during my service in this body—that a Senate investigating committee would undertake a stipulation on any subject. The general impression in the Senate and among the people at large has always been that a Senate inquiry would be thorough; that if we went into a question we would go to the bottom of it; but now, to some of us, it looks as if this industrious prosecutor, who is undertaking to unearth the scandals connected with the House of Morgan which have cost the American people so dearly, is being interfered with on all sides.

I do not desire to criticize any committee of the Senate or any member of any committee of the Senate, but I think it is due the Senate, since all of us are interested and since by implication any derelictions of a Senate committee affect us all, that some one in authority on the committee tell us why this man Pecora is not permitted to go full speed ahead in this investigation and bring out all the rottenness connected with these international bankers.

I note, for instance, in this morning's Herald this sentence:

Halted in his efforts to reveal the Morgan tax matters, Pecora directed his public inquiry into the entangled and hitherto mysterious transactions whereby the Van Sweringen brothers of Cleveland built up their amazing railroad empire.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Halted in his efforts to reveal the Morgan tax evasions. Mr. President, I would like to know why Mr. Pecora should be halted in this matter. Why not let the public know why Mr. Morgan and his 19 partners have paid no income taxes during the past 2 years, and if they are guilty of any fraud and tax dodging, why they should not be sent to the penitentiary? Why not, regardless of the fact that they have preferred clients in high places in the Government, both here and abroad?

I yield now to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely want to make the observation, of course, that Senators generally know that the Banking and Currency Committee is meeting now or has just had a meeting, as I understand it, this morning. If the Senator really wants an answer to his question from members of that subcommittee, I would suggest that he forego his speech and let them be on the floor of the Senate when he submits these inquiries.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. One of the members of the committee probably having knowledge of the proposed stipulation is now on the floor. I wish to propound an inquiry to him. I refer to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT]. Before the Senator rises to respond to my inquiry, however, I should like to read this additional paragraph with reference to the proposed stipulation:

A resolution to this effect was introduced by Senator WALCOTT, of Connecticut, in an effort to placate the Morgan counsel, who raised violent protest against Pecora continuing this line of questioning of the Morgan members. Davis even questioned the authority of the committee to proceed on this line of investigation, but Senator FLETCHER, chairman of the committee, belittled the Morgan counsel's claims on this score.

I would be glad to have the Senator from Connecticut state what are the underlying reasons for proposing a stipulation to placate the Morgan interests.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, the meeting of the committee was an executive meeting and no facts regarding the meeting are supposed to be divulged to the press. I do not propose to state what occurred there. The press may surmise whatever it pleases; but I will say we have just concluded an executive session of nearly 3 hours and the result of that discussion was——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. LONG. There is so much noise and confusion in the Chamber and in the galleries that we cannot hear what is being said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana makes the point of order that the Senate is not in order. The Senate will be in order and audible conversation must cease. This admonition applies equally to occupants of the galleries.

Mr. WALCOTT. I was making a statement with reference to the executive session of the committee just concluded. I think I am entirely within my rights in stating that a resolution was adopted as a result of two and a half or three hours of discussion, part of the time Mr. Davis was present and part of the time not. The discussion resulted in a resolution which will shortly be made public by the chairman of the committee, which I think will entirely satisfy the Senator from Indiana. It took time to thrash the thing out. It is a complicated matter. It involves a question of the committee's authority to go into the tax question and also a question of policy as to whether we should in any way postpone the present investigation. I believe that not a single member of the committee was in favor of any such postponement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let me remind the Senator that the Senate committee went into the question with Mr. Mitchell of the National City Bank of New York City. He was not shielded in the slightest degree with reference to his income taxes. Why this mystery and these secret sessions and executive sessions about a tax matter in which the public certainly is interested today? There is another thing about it. Why should Mr. Davis, counsel for the Morgan interests, be in an executive session of the Senate committee when other Members of the Senate cannot even find out what went on in that executive meeting?

Mr. WALCOTT. The Senator has a perfect right to know everything that went on there, but I think the Senator for his own protection ought to refrain from making charges against a senatorial committee until he ascertains the purport of the resolution that resulted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is just the point. I am not making charges against the senatorial committee, but the newspaper writers are making charges by implication against every Member of the United States Senate, because we are all responsible to a degree for what is done in committee. Therefore, I, as one Member of this body, am anxious to know what goes on in these executive sessions with Mr. John W. Davis, counsel for Mr. Morgan, in attendance while other people cannot attend. Let us find out what it is all about.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why does not the Senator get on the subcommittee? Then he would know.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is the Senator complaining because the committee has made all these revelations?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No. I am complaining because apparently there is an effort to hamstring the counsel of a committee of the United States Senate who is trying to show up the rottenness of these international bankers, to disclose it to the American people.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator sat here for 4 years under his own administration and did not do a thing to bring it out. Now that we empower a committee to investigate the situation and get the facts and develop them for the American people, what is the Senator kicking about?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. There is no politics in this. [Laughter.] I repeat, there is no suggestion of politics here at all. I understand that members of both parties have had their names brought into this investigation, Republicans and Democrats alike having been disclosed to be on the "preferred lists." I do not hold a brief for any of them regardless of the party to which they may belong. If wealthy men have been dodging taxes, they should go to the penitentiary. That is my position. We do not hesitate to send the little fellows to the penitentiary. We do not shield the little fellow in the slightest degree. But here is the House of Morgan apparently being shielded. Not one single member of that partnership, 20 in number, as I remember, has paid one cent of income taxes as a contribution to the cost of running the Government during the past 2 years. They have dodged their income taxes completely, and yet Mr. Morgan, the magnificent, has had a yacht built, costing $2,500,000, and launched with great ceremony right during this period. The National Economy League and these same people insist that we shall take food out of the mouths of the hungry veterans who have made untold sacrifices for the flag. These wealthy bankers dodged their taxes, and yet they seem to have plenty of help to shield them, even to a slight degree on the floor of this body.

It is high time the American people were permitted to know just how rotten the situation is. These men control more than 40 percent of the utility power of the country and of the industries of the country. I am trying to find out why and wherefore there should be any attempt to thwart the purposes of the inquiry. My opinion is that Mr. Pecora is very able—in fact, too able to satisfy the House of Morgan—and they are trying every way in the world to discredit him because he is able and because he is bringing out the facts of all their disreputable operations and bring them to public attention.

I have heard that the distinguished chairman of this committee, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], asked for $70,000 to continue this investigation. That was reported in the press, and I am quoting from that authority, and that somehow or other, through various means and channels, the amount was reduced to $20,000. I should like to know if that is true.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, it is not true. The fact is the only resolution introduced by the Senator from Florida asked an appropriation of $25,000. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate felt, because at that time the subcommittee having charge of the investigation had a balance on hand of $10,000, that instead of an appropriation of $25,000 it might well be made $20,000. No resolution providing an appropriation of $70,000 was ever referred to the Committee to Audit and Control.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the Senator from South Carolina believe $25,000 is enough to carry on this investigation through the vacation period?

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from South Carolina is Chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That committee is not called upon to express any view of that kind. The Banking and Currency Committee, at the time they introduced the resolution through their chairman, asked for $25,000. It appeared to us that that amount could not carry on this investigation for any long time, but whenever, under the rules of the Senate, the Banking and Currency Committee authorizes its chairman to introduce a resolution which shall be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, that committee will certainly give due consideration to the matter and to the amount requested.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. There is a rumor now that this investigation is to end today. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], or any member of the committee who is able to inform the Senate, if that be true or not?

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I have never even heard a suggestion of that. I beg the Senator to desist from making charges against the committee, which has been as impartial as it could possibly be and as anxious to be honest and thoroughgoing as any committee that I have ever seen could be when engaged in a work of this kind. If the Senator from Indiana will wait until we get the resolution, which we will have in a few minutes, he can have the benefit of its contents, which I think will answer most of his questions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I read again from the editorial in this morning's Washington Herald, and I should like to have the Senator's comment:

> Only two Senators—the chairman, Senator FLETCHER, and the absent Senator COUZENS—cast their votes for a wide-open, unlimited investigation.

I should like to know if that is true or not.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I am not going to stand here and disclose what occurred in an executive meeting of a committee of which I am a member.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Davis was present, was he not?

Mr. WALCOTT. No; he was not. There was no one present but the members of the committee when the vote was taken. It was strictly an executive session, and I do not propose to be called upon here to disclose what happened in an executive session of the committee.

I will say, however, that what we did yesterday was in line with thoroughness and in order to reach a mature and fair judgment in the matter. We spent 2 or 3 hours yesterday and 2 or 3 hours today going into all phases of the very complicated legal question of the authority of the committee, and it was that matter which took so much time.

If the Senator, instead of using rumors and editorials in newspapers written by men who know nothing about the matter, would wait for the resolution to be disclosed and then discuss it, I think he would change the trend of his remarks very materially.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator does not doubt that the Senate committee has unlimited power, does he?

Mr. WALCOTT. The committee doubts it. We propose immediately to find out exactly what authority we have, and, if we have not sufficient authority, to get it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let me ask the Senator if any stipulation has been entered into as to the scope of the inquiry, that it is to go no farther than a certain point.

Mr. WALCOTT. No; no stipulation of any kind.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Is the committee going into the income-tax phase of this question?

Mr. WALCOTT. We cannot decide that until we have found out whether we have authority. If we have no such authority, we propose to ask the Senate for it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I am not only myself interested but I am sure every Member of the Senate is interested in that phase of the inquiry; and I know the American people are, beyond any question of the shadow of a doubt.

There is an editorial in the Washington Herald this morning entitled "Is the Morgan Inquiry Being Stifled?", which I think ought to go in the RECORD; and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Herald of Tuesday, June 6, 1933]

IS THE MORGAN INQUIRY BEING STIFLED?

Since when must a Senate committee seek "stipulation" from the House of Morgan as to the extent of revelations which may be made concerning this private banking firm?

Does the power of the House of Morgan still awe Washington? Do the vast Morgan power and influence, already partially exposed, still bend political leaders to its beck and call?

These questions, the Senate must recognize, are being raised today throughout the United States because of the hesitancy of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency to permit its counsel to expose to the limit the income-tax transactions of individual Morgan partners.

The very action of the Senate is certain to arouse suspicion as to the nature of possible revelations.

The House of Morgan, through its counsel, is making a determined fight to prevent the Senate committee from sifting these transactions. Why?

Certainly the excuse of the Morgan counsel that the committee would sit "until the snow flies" if it attempts such an inquiry is no reason to prevent the investigation.

If there is nothing wrong with the tax transactions, why fear a public inquiry to establish the facts?

The same Senate committee did not hesitate for a moment to bring out into the light the tax transactions of Charles E. Mitchell, which produced Federal indictments on the charge of tax evasion.

A rather remarkable decision was made by the Senate subcommittee in secret confab yesterday when it refused for the present to grant its own counsel permission to go ahead with the tax phase of the present inquiry.

The Senate committee endeavored to encourage its counsel and the Morgan counsel to agree upon "stipulations" with respect to the potential revelations of the income-tax investigation.

What an amazing performance by the Senators who comprise the Banking and Currency subcommittee.

Only two Senators, the chairman, Senator FLETCHER, and the absent Senator COUZENS, cast their votes for a wide-open, unlimited investigation. Ten Senators voted for delay in reaching a final decision as to whether or not the present inquiry will go into the taxes of the individual Morgan partners.

Nothing pleases the Morgan camp more than delay at this moment.

It already has been announced that the Morgan inquiry would be terminated with Tuesday's session.

Does the Senate subcommittee dare to end the inquiry without permitting its counsel publicly to reveal the Morgan partners' tax transactions which have raised such a storm of protest from the Morgan counsel?

For the good of the entire country, for the education of the Senate and the Congress, the Morgan income-tax investigation must be pursued to the limit.

Otherwise there will properly arise Nation-wide suspicion that the wand of the House of Morgan can still be successfully waved in the face of the public, that preferential treatment prevails for Morgan partners.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has been a Member of the Senate about 7 years, according to the Congressional Directory. As far as I recall, he has never introduced any resolution or taken any action with reference to the matter of international bankers or income-tax evasions or any of the wrongs against which he now declaims so loudly.

The transactions about which he has been talking took place at a time when the Senator from Indiana and his party were in complete control of all branches of the Government.

Now that we have had, in pursuance of party promises, a real investigation—not a reference to some commission, where the matter would be buried, not the sidetracking of some matter to a hand-picked Presidential commission of the old administration—but when we have a real investigation and it has revealed the tax evasions, what does this side of the Chamber do?

We bring in a bill, which has already been reported to this body, to stop those evasions and to plug up the income-tax holes which the Senator from Indiana never attempted, in the past 7 years, to correct when his party and he were in control.

Now the Senator is complaining. What is he complaining about? The Committee on Banking and Currency is performing a distinct public service. It is bringing these ugly facts out into the daylight. It is undertaking to correct such abuses; and yet the Senator from Indiana stands here on the floor of the Senate and complains and declaims against the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not declaiming against the committee in the slightest degree; and there is no politics in what I have said. I think I have made that very clear, as the Senator will see if he will read what I have said as it appears in the RECORD tomorrow. But since the Senator assaults me so violently now for asking for this information, I should like to ask him whether he takes issue with me on this question.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator will listen to my remarks he will be able to arrive at some conclusion as to what I intend. I do not think it is necessary to explain.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then I assume the Senator approves the other side of the controversy.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no; the Senator does not assume anything of that kind. If he will listen to what I say, he will have no doubt about what views I expect to convey to the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator can assault me all he pleases personally——

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no, Mr. President!

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But I shall continue to insist that these facts be brought out in broad daylight, so that the people may see them.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator will just wait and keep calm awhile, the facts will be brought out. They are being brought out, and that is evidently what is exciting the Senator from Indiana.

He speaks about Mr. Pecora. Mr. Pecora has been in New York ever since the Senator from Indiana has been in the Senate. If he wanted Mr. Pecora to get on the trail of the banking and income-tax wrongdoers, why has he not done something in the past 7 years to get Mr. Pecora down to Washington, and show him the trail and the tracks, and put him on them? He did nothing. He never dreamed of it. Now that somebody else has got Mr. Pecora and put him on the trail, and the hounds are hot on the track of the culprits, the Senator from Indiana complains and objects about the committee. He wants to impede it, he wants to embarrass it, he wants to hamstring it, in order to get some favorable publicity for himself.

If the Senator from Indiana does not understand that language, I shall be glad to yield again.

Mr. President, the Senator disclaims any politics. I decline to make any comment with reference to that. Any Senator on the other side or on this side may draw his own conclusions.

What is the Senator's purpose if it is not some petty partisan propaganda, either for personal glorification or for some partisan advantage? The committee is at work. The committee is delivering the goods. He says it sits behind closed doors. Why, of course, every committee of this body at times has executive committee hearings; but the Senator is unfair to the committee. The committee had public hearings, where all the world might sit and look and listen. Was the Senator from Indiana there, aiding the committee, giving it information, making it suggestions; or was he sitting up in his office reading the Washington Herald, seeing a great, glaring headline, and wondering how he could get one of those headlines for himself in the next issue?

Mr. President, if the Senator wants to get the facts, he will let the committee alone, and it will get them. It is getting them. This side of the Chamber condemns the evasion of income taxes by anyone, whether it be Morgan or whether it be anybody else. This side of the Chamber has already reported to the Senate yesterday a bill making it impossible in the future for Mr. Morgan or any other private banker or any international banker to evade or avoid his income taxes under the law. That is this side's answer to these revelations. The Senator from Indiana is the answer on the other side.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I hope we shall not have a prolonged discussion of the Morgan investigation from a partisan standpoint. It is not a partisan matter.

Neither the Senator from Texas nor the Senator from Indiana has stated all the facts.

This investigation was begun under the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], under the Republican administration. The Senator from South Dakota began it with Mr. Pecora as counsel, and I think it was carried along in a very nonpartisan manner. It was continued by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] as the chairman of the same committee when the Democratic Party came into power, with the same counsel, and, I believe, in a nonpartisan manner.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] this morning, from the other side of the Chamber, showed very conclusively to my mind that the Republican Party is just as anxious for these exposures to be made as the Democratic Party is. Unfortunately, Mr. President, it smeared both of us up pretty badly. As far as this investigation has gone, it looks pretty black for both of us. It is no case now for the pot to call the kettle black, because we find our own gang there, and we find our brethren of the Republican Party listed there in about the same number and proportion; and we find pretty conclusively, according to our ideas, that the affiliations of Mellon are just about the same as those of Woodin.

Instead of getting into a partisan tangle, I hope if the Committee on Banking and Currency wants any more money it will not hesitate to come in here and ask for it. As the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] so well says, the committee's disposition to carry forward, on all the power that it now has, and to ask for all such other power as it doubts it has at this time, is such that if the committee comes in with any resolution or request for additional funds it will be granted.

I hope we will not have a partisan tangle and snarl intertwined with this investigation that all of us want.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I do not desire to get into any political argument with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], nor do I propose to do so.

I stood here a moment ago as a Senator in my own right, representing one of the sovereign States of the Union, to protest against certain things that apparently are going on. That I shall continue to do as long as I remain a Member of this body.

I was amazed at the outburst of the Senator from Texas. Why he should undertake to abuse me personally because I was pointing my finger at the most notorious tax dodgers of the century I cannot imagine; but he did, and flung the charge of politics.

There is no politics in what I said. I can mention the names, if the Senator from Texas desires them, of those who have been branded by this committee. I do not desire to do that. The Senator from Texas will find illustrious Democratic names in that list, and he will find Republican names just as illustrious. If anything, in trying to be fair in the matter, I think any unprejudiced judge of the controversy would be bound to say I was harsher with members of my own party than I was with members of the party of the Senator from Texas.

Now, however, I propose to say something about politics, since the Senator from Texas has injected it.

You have a Secretary of the Treasury down there who ought to be removed, and immediately; and the American people have no confidence in him. I am speaking of Mr. Woodin.

Why should he be removed? Because time after time in recent years he has accepted gratuity after gratuity from the House of Morgan. They gave him stock at $20 a share when they were selling the same stock at $35 to $40 a share to the poor, gullible lambs they expected to fleece. That meant that for every single share they gave Mr. Woodin at $20 they made him a present of $15, then and there. That meant, with 1,000 shares, at least a $15,000 gratuity.

Was he on one list only? No; he was on list after list.

Is he beholden to the House of Morgan? Of course he is, or else he is an ingrate.

How could a man accept gratuity after gratuity, money which he never earned and knew he never earned, from these international bankers, without being under terrific obligations to them? He cannot serve two masters. He cannot serve the people of the United States in the Treasury, that powerful office, and at the same time serve the House of Morgan. Therefore, he should get out; and if he does not get out, the President of the United States should remove him; and if he does not remove him, the Senate should impeach him. There is not any question about that, Mr. President—no question about that. Any fair-minded man will say as much.

Here is the House of Morgan. Neither Mr. Morgan nor any of his partners, during the past 2 years, has paid one cent of income taxes. The income taxes go through the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury is a catspaw, a tool of the House of the Morgan; and he is permitted to remain there by the administration in charge of the Government! He should get out. He should have been removed long ago. Instead of that, the President of the United States flaunts him before the American people and takes him on a cruise on his yacht down the Potomac River!

Powerful! There he is in the Treasury right now. How can he deal with these tax dodgers?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Just one second.

Then there is Mr. Norman H. Davis, on the other side of the sea, undertaking to overturn sound American policy in every utterance, agreeing, so far as he can agree as a mythical ambassador, to consultative pacts that would involve us in every war of the future. He is heavily obligated to the House of Morgan—the House of Morgan!—now; not last week, not last year, but now, this minute; and still he remains over there, representing not the country, thank God! He never was confirmed as ambassador. He is an ambassador of nothing. He represents Mr. Roosevelt over there, as Colonel House represented Woodrow Wilson. If Colonel House and a few others of these mythical ambassadors had not been roaming all over Europe in those days, we never would have gotten into the World War, with all the vast consequences that have come therefrom.

Mr. Davis also is one of the Morgan pets. He is on the list. He has been receiving these gratuities. Whom does he represent over there? Does anybody doubt for a moment that at least partially he represents the House of Morgan, composed of tax dodgers? Not one member of the firm paid a cent of taxes during the year 1931, though they were asking—demanding, even—that the Budget be balanced, and that we drive the disabled veterans from the hospitals of the United States in order to balance the Budget, when these tax dodgers were refusing to pay one cent toward balancing that same Budget, though they were building yachts costing two and a half million dollars. Of course Mr. Davis should be removed.

The most recent disclosure is that remarkable speech of Mr. Bingham, newly appointed Ambassador at London. What a mess we are getting into. He undertakes to say that a 10-year-old child could find the aggressor in any world conflict, and historians for 15 years have been doing their best to decide the war guilt of the great conflict, who was the aggressor in the World War. Yet blithely, magically, without the slightest effort at all, this remarkable Ambassador of ours, Mr. Bingham, waves aside the question and says that a 10-year-old child can always tell the aggressor.

We have overturned the policy of Washington, said he, and the policy of the founders. Imagine that! That policy, I think, will be the American policy long after Mr. Bingham and Mr. Davis are dead and in their graves. But think of the infinite harm they do to our international relations over there because someone may believe them. We know them and we discount all they say, but someone over there may believe what they say, and it may do violence to our friendly relations with other lands. So all of them ought to be brought back, and Mr. Woodin should be kicked out of the Treasury.

I say to the Senator from Texas that if that is politics, make the most of it. I will continue to talk politics along that line so long as I am in this body.

I am sorry not to have yielded before. I am glad to yield to my friend from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I undertook to interrupt the Senator when he was speaking about our friend the Secretary of the Treasury, and the policy of keeping one like the present Secretary in charge of our financial affairs. I am not disagreeing with the Senator; I have previously expressed those views. However, Mr. Mellon, who has just gotten out of office, had the same attachments Mr. Woodin has. They were what you might call "cooked in the same skillet." When Mr. Mellon's name came before the Senate when he was appointed Ambassador to rove all over Europe, or rather England—that is enough—the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] and myself were the only two Senators who voted against his confirmation, as I remember. There may have been others, but we were the only ones who expressed ourselves at the time.

We have rather become what might be called "acclimated"—I think that is the proper word—to this kind of a situation. We are like the rooster that has been whipped so long that he has his head down, and the other is pecking him from the top. We have become accustomed to it, we have been trained to it.

I might say that I know frankly that the thing has gone on long enough so that it is going to take the work of a lot of people to get the public conscience trained to anything else. We do not understand anything else, and the Senator's side of the aisle is just as culpable in that respect as is our side. The thing has been going on for a long time.

If the Senator will bring in a resolution to the effect that men who are affiliated with these institutions ought not to be named to govern and to rule the people of this country in these tax matters, I, for one, shall be very glad to support the resolution. And I hope there will be no partisanship in the matter, that we will go through with the measure brought in here. We are going to have a tax bill before us pretty soon, and I believe the Senator from Indiana supported the amendment which I offered some days ago, which was rejected by the Senate. The only way we will ever cure the trouble is to so arouse the consciences of the two sides of this Chamber so they will not allow control of this country by unlimited wealth. It is controlling the Democratic Party when it is in power, and it has been controlling the Republican Party when it has been in power. Unless we dig up and eradicate the system, it does not make any difference who is in power—the practice is going to be the same. It is the system which has to be uprooted and thrown out, the system of unlimited wealth being allowed to control the Treasury of the United States, and providing no curb whatever against their power in accumulating. That is at the bottom of everything about which the Senator has complained.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator. It is a vicious system, which must be uprooted. I would have the Senator know, too, that I hold no brief for Mr. Mellon. I have not hesitated, in the years gone by, to vote against measures recommended by him, and I have voted for increased income taxes in the high brackets every time the matter has been presented. It seems, however, that the legislation is defective. The law itself must be amended.

I have noticed very recently in the press that investigations were now being conducted with reference to Mr. Mellon himself in connection with alleged failure to pay income taxes. I hope that inquiry will be prosecuted to the last degree, and that anybody who refuses, regardless of his station or the amount of wealth he possesses, to pay his fair, just, legal share of the cost of Government as prescribed by legislation will suffer the full penalty of the law, no matter to what party he may belong.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that our policy of government is against that. Whenever a man evades the payment of income taxes and goes broke, we sue him, indict him, but not until he goes broke. Mr. Mitchell was a man worth several million dollars, we are told, and when Mr. Mitchell went broke we sued him for his income taxes and indicted him. The policy of the Government is that the dead lion must alone be shot at, nobody but the dead lion. Certainly the Senator, having had this long-recognized knowledge and experience, will understand that as long as the power remains with the powerful they are immune from any such thing as indictment; that is nothing but the common, customary course. But if Morgan should lose his money, then of course he would be susceptible to indictment and prosecution. Therefore the case of Mitchell is explained on the ground that the American Government prosecuting authorities are rampant and hell-bent after the lion when he is dead, but not until he is dead.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, it has been said on this floor time and again that a million dollars cannot be convicted. I hope the time may come soon when that suggestion will be thoroughly disproven.

I have nothing more to say except this: Let it be remembered that Morgan & Co. are the fiscal agents of the British Government, as well as of the French Government. They represent Great Britain and they represent France. And Britain and France are now conducting a vigorous campaign to persuade the United States to cancel foreign debts due the American people. Mr. Morgan has not hesitated to pay income taxes in England, while throughout the same period he was dodging payment of taxes in the United States.

I hope the committee will go to the bottom of the whole wretched mess, and if any of these men are culpable, let them be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law and suffer the full penalty of the law. I have confidence in the committee and trust it will be diligent. I certainly hope it will be.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think it is rather regrettable that the Senate should be called upon to suspend its proceedings in order to listen to a debate of the character of that which has taken place this morning. Under our rules of procedure and under the practice which prevails, Senators are at liberty to take the floor and discuss any subject they choose.

I have not yet become convinced that the courts of the country are corrupt; that the agencies of the Government cannot be relied upon to do justice. Mark my words, whenever we lend our influence and devote our efforts to breaking down public confidence in the American system of justice, we may ourselves climb to a temporary pedestal; but in the end we do ourselves more harm than good, and, what is of real importance, we do harm to millions of people who must, in the last analysis, rely upon our institutions of justice as sound and moral.

We have witnessed the spectacle this morning of a Senator criticizing and condemning a great committee of the Senate, the Committee on Banking and Currency, because it has pursued a course which is common to all committees of both Houses of the Congress. Because the committee has seen fit to hold an executive session to discuss among the members of the committee questions of procedure and probably the admissibility of evidence, the Senator from Indiana has raised the question of the honesty and the sincerity of the members of that committee.

High standards of morality are not the peculiar property of any one Senator, and it is observed that he who most often boasts his own virtues usually enjoys the least confidence from his associates. I make the statement now that the membership of the Committee on Banking and Currency has been treated unjustly and unfairly by the Senator from Indiana. Before me is a list of the members of that committee. Some of them have enjoyed long public service. Some of them are distinguished for the efforts they have made in behalf of public reforms.

Now, because the Committee on Banking and Currency goes into executive session to discuss matters among the members of the committee, it is charged that that committee is deliberately withholding information to which the public are entitled, deliberately whitewashing men whom the Senator from Indiana believes to be guilty of crime. Certainly there is nothing in the work of the committee heretofore performed that constitutes the slightest basis for any such charge or innuendo. The committee has developed facts which are important in connection with its legislative functions; it has whitewashed no one.

Persons not in public life whose names appear on so-called "preferred lists" as having been permitted by the House of Morgan & Co. to purchase stocks at advantageous terms are condemned as being unworthy. Certainly the correct rule is that anyone who has a public function to perform must receive no favor from those who may become the beneficiaries of his public actions; and if he does so, he properly subjects himself to criticism and suspicion. The attack on the Committee on Banking and Currency is not justified by the facts stated on the floor, and I think that the membership of that committee are entitled to just as much respect and confidence as is any man, whether he wears a toga or a hickory shirt, who takes advantage of his position to bring upon them opprobrium and censure.

Oh, yes; the Senator from Indiana is free from political motives; he is so virtuous, so unselfish, and so impartial that nothing except a speech from the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] could induce him to refer to political considerations in the Senate of the United States. The Senator from Indiana never had a thought in his life, and never uttered a sentiment in his life, that was not based on partisan considerations. One has a right to be a partisan, but when he is a partisan, and everybody knows it, it does not add to his reputation for virtue to deny it or to assert impartiality.

Oh, yes; the President must remove his Secretary of the Treasury at the pleasure of the Senator from Indiana, and he must call back from Europe his traveling ambassador at the pleasure of the Senator from Indiana. He need not take any action regarding the policy pursued during the last administration by the Department of Justice of whitewashing and covering up transactions by great so-called "international" bankers. There was no politics in that. Notwithstanding it was well known that a great banker had evaded his income tax, or had apparently evaded his income tax, the Department of Justice, during the administration which the Senator from Indiana sponsored, covered it up, did not bring it to light, refused to institute a prosecution, and justified its action on the ground that it was not good public policy, that to proceed with the prosecution might result in bank failures. Now, however, when a committee of the Senate, composed of Democrats and Republicans alike, go forward fearlessly in the performance of their duty, because they do not tell the Senator from Indiana the object of an executive session, because they hold an executive session, he becomes greatly indignant and denounces the committee.

Then, he wants to tell President Roosevelt how to run his administration. Well, I do not assume to be a spokesman for President Roosevelt, but there is one thing I do know, and that is that the Senator from Indiana is the last man in the Senate of the United States whose advice the President would seek or act upon.

This committee and its members are just as honest as is the Senator from Indiana; they will do their duty just as fearlessly as he does his; and they will perform their functions more effectively than he can perform his.

Of course he can make trouble; of course he can say what he pleases; but there is a day of reckoning coming to those who abuse their power and prominence to bring into ill repute honest men. Crooks ought to find support nowhere; racketeers ought to be confined in jail; but it is not a high conception of public duty to besmirch the reputation of fellow workers in the manner that has been attempted here this morning. Everyone charged with responsibility is liable to make mistakes. Anyone who fails to recognize that fact is an inexcusable egotist and will work his own condemnation.

The Senator from Indiana has referred to a speech made by the American Ambassador to the Court of St. James, and has belittled and ridiculed that speech. I do not feel called upon to express my approval or my condemnation of all the speeches that I read or hear, and probably the public would not be greatly concerned in the viewpoint I might express; but, after all, our great country is moving forward in spite of the effort to retard its progress; after all, we have a great country in spite of tax dodgers, whom we all denounce.

For my part I do not subscribe to the declaration made on the floor this morning that the little criminal only is pursued and that the big criminal is immune. I think that is a dangerous doctrine. Once you make the masses of the people of the United States believe that to be true, they will rise in open rebellion, and they ought to rise.

What have we done to carry forward the exalted standards of duty and of service, which have glorified the leadership of this Nation in the years gone by? What are we doing to accomplish that great aim? In spite of all that is said and done, in spite of the mistakes that we public men make, in spite of the speeches that we make, our country is still the best land on this earth. It is our duty, of course, to make it better and freer, but we will never accomplish that end by misconstruing the motives and purposes of our fellow beings or by arousing unfounded suspicion in the hearts of the masses.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I do not care to say anything at length. I resent what the Senator from Arkansas said about me; there was no occasion for his saying it. I made my observations in good faith; and I wish to remind the Senator from Arkansas that we have just gotten through robbing the disabled veterans of the Nation. We have driven them out of the hospitals like dogs, and into the streets and into the night, in their underwear, the clothes being taken from their backs. Men who were disabled on the battle front have been maltreated and put to death, for that is what it amounts to. Tubercular patients have been kicked out right and left from the hospitals throughout the land.

I question nobody's motives. I just know that the President of the United States, according to rumor, has been generous enough to the American public to reduce his earnings 15 percent, but he still draws 85 percent of his salary. We in this body are still drawing 85 percent of our salaries, but we take 50 percent and more away from the totally disabled American veteran who is in the condition he is physically and mentally because he went out and, with his life, defended the Nation and the flag.

Not only that, Mr. President, but it is currently reported that Members have attached to their pay rolls here in the Senate their own relatives, people who never come near the place—the grossest sort of nepotism—and yet we say it is a great country, Mr. President; perfectly wonderful, we say. Three percent of the people own 80 percent of the wealth of the land. The system is fine, so think some of our people. To hear the expressions on this floor one would think everything is lovely, with 14,000,000 men walking the streets looking for jobs and bread, while some of us in this very body have people attached to the pay roll who do no work at all, who have no business being there, and who are not even in the city of Washington.

Criticized? "Let him who is without sin cast the first stone." I say to my friend from Arkansas, with all respect, that he has no right to criticize me for doing my duty. I am not playing politics. I am trying to bring this matter to the surface so the people may know and, knowing and in full possession of the knowledge, they can take such action in orderly fashion as may be necessary to correct the evils that exist—not part of the evils but all the evils; not only great, gross evils but petty evils as well.

Mr. President, I do not care how many executive meetings the Committee on Banking and Currency may hold. That is all right. But if one of their meetings is executive, and the public is excluded, then they should keep out J. P. Morgan's lawyer. That is what I ask. He has no business in an executive meeting if the people are barred. All I ask is that the committee give a square deal to the American people.

Mr. WALCOTT subsequently said: Mr. President, in order to have the proper juxtaposition for the resolution which I am about to read, I ask that it may appear immediately following the discussion of the activities of the Banking and Currency Committee. It is the resolution adopted this morning to which I have referred. I ask permission to read it. The resolution reads as follows:

Resolution adopted by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee Tuesday, June 6, 1933:

"It is the sense of this committee that it should inquire into the practices of buying and selling securities, as such practices may affect the taxing powers of the Government; but inasmuch as the legal right of the committee to proceed along this line of inquiry is challenged, the committee should proceed immediately with railroad, public-utility, and all other phases of the investigation, and the subcommittee charged with the investigation be directed to report a resolution enlarging the powers of the committee as soon as possible, in such manner as may be deemed necessary to enable it to inquire into the above practices."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Connecticut that the question involved has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of United States against Dougherty. There ought not to be any question whether the committee has authority. That question was decided in the case to which I have referred. There is no doubt at all that any committee of the Congress has the right to inquire into almost any matter when it relates to or involves the possible enactment of legislation affecting the matter into which inquiry is to be made.

While I am on the subject, may I say that information has come to me that the committee is asking for only $20,000 with which to carry on the investigation; that it really needs in the neighborhood of $75,000, and that if it gets only $20,000 the committee would have to suspend the investigation by the 1st of September. I do not know what there is to the rumor, but I do think when that story is being circulated it ought to be cleared up by some member of the committee. If the committee thinks it is necessary to have $50,000, if it is necessary to have $75,000, if it is necessary to have $150,000, or any other sum, it should be appropriated, because the greatest service that any committee of the Senate can render the Congress or the Government or the people at this time would be to make a thorough investigation into the whole matter.

I agree with much the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] said this morning. It must not be permitted to be thought by the people of the country that rich criminals can get off without prosecution while poor criminals are to be prosecuted. For that reason, if for no other, the committee ought to go to the very bottom of the Morgan situation, the Chase National Bank situation, and others of the same kind. If there is any disposition on the part of the committee to stop the investigation—though I cannot conceive that there is in any way—but if there is any inclination not to go through with it to the very bottom, then I think the committee ought to be given further directions from the Senate of the United States.

Mr. FESS obtained the floor.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. FESS. Not just at this moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator let me submit a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, what is the order of business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

Mr. FESS. The order of business is the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WALSH. With all respect to the Senator from Ohio, he cannot take the floor to make a speech under the head of presentation of petitions and memorials.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield for a short interruption?

Mr. FESS. No; I cannot yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. If the Senator from Mississippi will wait a moment, I will be through. I shall take only a moment.

I share very much the views expressed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] in reference to making matters of the kind being discussed political. I hardly think the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] could be charged with making it primarily a matter of politics.

I rose only to say, and I would feel that I was not doing my duty unless I did say in reply to the reference of the Senator from Arkansas to some case that was whitewashed, that I have no doubt he referred to the case known as the "Harriman Bank case", in which the bank was not closed at an earlier time because it was thought if the Department went to the extent of closing it at that time very bad results might follow. I think the Senator from Arkansas was hardly fair when he would lead the country to believe that what was done under the direction of the Attorney General was political in its nature. I think everybody knows the attitude of the Attorney General politically. That is the only point I rose to mention, not to oppose in the main what the Senator from Arkansas said. In fact, I have a great deal of sympathy with what he said, as to the effect of charges at a time like this; but that particular reference, it seemed to me, was quite unfair.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I did not make the statement that that was political action. I said that it was justified by the Department on the ground that it would result in the closing of the bank.

Mr. FESS. I misunderstood the Senator then. I thought it was criticism of the past administration on the basis of political favor from the former administration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It was a criticism for failure to prosecute, but I explained the justification in effect was that to proceed with the prosecution would result in closing the bank. The object in the reference was to point out to the Senator from Indiana that he had complained that proof of this kind in the pending investigation is not turned to advantage by the Committee on Banking and Currency, whereas during the preceding administration these fraudulent banking transactions were withheld from the public and prosecution deferred for the purpose of preventing the frightening of bank depositors. But I do not wish now to be understood as saying or thinking that the action of the preceding administration in declining to prosecute in those cases for violation of the law, which the Senator has in mind and which are pretty much the same as those to which I had reference, is to be approved. I think that policy would give discretion to executive officers and law enforcement which would lead to all forms of abuses. In fact I think it was an abuse then.

Mr. FESS. I do not disagree with the Senator that that might have been a mistake. I think probably it was in the light of subsequent disclosures; but the Senator used the term "whitewash."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think that is as apt a term as can be used.

Mr. FESS. I thought——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. FESS. Let the Senator from Ohio make his statement. I thought the Senator meant, by using the word "whitewash", that the administration was trying to cover up something in favor of the rich violator of the law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think it was a whitewash proceeding pure and simple, that it could not be designated as anything else. In its effect it was a covering-up of facts that ought to have been revealed, a suspension of proceedings that ought to have been carried forward.

Mr. FESS. But the action was taken because it was thought that if they proceeded summarily it would create a very bad result in that many innocent people would suffer.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I stated that that was the justification that was given for it.

ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to submit a series of resolutions adopted in my State. Before presenting them I invite attention to a remarkable speech made by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] last week, a speech which in its inferences is very unfair. He called attention, as appears on page 4505 of the RECORD, to the opposition of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York to the building of the St. Lawrence waterway, and in his speech said that an analysis demonstrates that the pending St. Lawrence treaty is being blocked and resisted today by the support of the leading partners of J. P. Morgan & Co. In the next paragraph he proceeds to make an analysis of the New York Chamber of Commerce, indicating or inferring at least that all the opposition in New York to the treaty comes from that organization. He draws the conclusion that it must be a wicked organization, and I suppose by inference the project is a wicked project, because it is backed by these men.

I hold in my hand a series of resolutions adopted by the American Legion, of Albany, N. Y. I am wondering, of course, if this American Legion post is dominated by J. P. Morgan & Co., and if it is a wickedly controlled institution, because the American Legion says that the St. Lawrence Treaty ought not to be ratified until there has been made the economic survey which I have suggested.

There are thousands of citizens of my State who have no more relation to J. P. Morgan & Co. than I have. There are thousands of citizens in my State who, of their own accord and without interjection or interference of J. P. Morgan, might form independent conclusions. The majority of the people of my State want to know, before we spend $90,000,000 as our immediate contribution to the waterway, plus our share of the cost of construction, whether or not the State of New York will be benefited proportionately. So I have made bold, Mr. President, to let the Senate know what the American Legion of a leading county of my State thinks on this subject.

I ask that the newspaper article containing the resolutions to which I have referred be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Albany Knickerbocker, May 27, 1933]

ST. LAWRENCE HIT BY LEGION GROUP—COUNTY COMMITTEE OPPOSES TREATY UNLESS SURVEY SHOWS IT PRACTICAL

The Albany County committee of the American Legion last night adopted a resolution opposing ratification of the St. Lawrence Treaty unless "an official economic survey" proves the proposed Canadian water route practical.

The committee instructed County Commander Otto de Heus to send copies of the resolution to United States Senators WAGNER and COPELAND and Representative PARKER CORNING.

Winthrop Robinson, of Nathaniel Adams Blanchard Post, in Elsmere, introduced the resolution. It follows:

"Whereas in carrying out the ratification of the St. Lawrence Treaty it has been estimated that it will cost in excess of $1,350,000,000 for the entire project; and

"Whereas 90 percent of the St. Lawrence River lies wholly within Canada; and

"Whereas we believe in United States money for United States projects wholly within the United States, and to be used for the employment of United States labor: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Albany County committee, American Legion, in meeting assembled, feels that this treaty should be given no further consideration until an official economic survey has been made by a competent, unbiased United States commission, and until it can be proven beyond doubt that there will be an adequate return on the gigantic investment that would be required."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1094) to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to subscribe for preferred stock and purchase the capital notes of insurance companies, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5240) to provide emergency relief with respect to home-mortgage indebtedness, to refinance home mortgages, to extend relief to the owners of homes occupied by them and who are unable to amortize their debt elsewhere, to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, to increase the market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. STEAGALL, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, and Mr. LUCE were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 604. An act amending section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes", approved December 29, 1916 (ch. 9, par. 1, 39 Stat. 862), and as amended February 28, 1931 (ch. 328, 46 Stat. 1454);

S. 687. An act providing for the establishment of a term of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida at Orlando, Fla.;

S. 1278. An act to amend an act (Public, No. 431, 72d Cong.) to identify The Dalles Bridge Co.; and

S. 1815. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Owensboro, Ky.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to bring before the Senate the conference report on the electrical-energy tax.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. What is the order of business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is proceeding under the head of presentation of petitions and memorials. The Senator from Mississippi is now moving to take up the conference report on the electrical-energy tax.

Mr. McNARY. Just a moment. I think the Senator from Mississippi is anxious to conclude the routine morning business.

Mr. HARRISON. The trouble is that everybody is speaking on every other subject. I want to get this matter out of the way some time.

Mr. McNARY. I assure the Senator that I shall object to anyone intruding on the routine morning business, so that he can get his conference report before the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I will withhold my motion for the moment. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] is anxious to make some remarks, and he can do it under the conference report if I can get it up.

AGREEMENT TO CONSIDER THE CALENDAR

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent.

After the Senate shall have disposed of the conference report, if it shall take it up, and at the conclusion of the routine morning business, I ask that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DEEPS CREEK BRIDGE, DELAWARE

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1562) granting the consent of Congress to the Levy Court of Sussex County, Del., to reconstruct a bridge across the Deeps Creek at Cherry Tree Landing, Sussex County, Del., which were, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "reconstruct and maintain a" and insert "reconstruct, maintain, and operate a free highway"; on page 1, line 8, after "to", to insert "the interests of", and also to amend the title so as to read: "An act granting the consent of Congress to the Levy Court of Sussex County, Del., to reconstruct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Deeps Creek at Cherry Tree Landing, Sussex County, Del."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF GASOLINE TAX—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 5040.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for one year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 6. (a) Effective September 1, 1933, section 616 of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 616. TAX ON ELECTRICAL ENERGY FOR DOMESTIC OR COMMERCIAL CONSUMPTION.

"'(a) There is hereby imposed upon electrical energy sold for domestic or commercial consumption and not for resale a tax equivalent to 3 percent of the price for which so sold, to be paid by the vendor under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary shall prescribe. The sale of electrical energy to an owner or lessee of a building, who purchases such electrical energy for resale to the tenants therein, shall for the purposes of this section be considered as a sale for consumption and not for resale, but the resale to the tenant shall not be considered a sale for consumption.

"'(b) The provisions of sections 619, 622, and 625 shall not be applicable with respect to the tax imposed by this section.

"'(c) No tax shall be imposed under this section upon electrical energy sold to the United States or to any State or Territory, or political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia. The right to exemption under this subsection shall be evidenced in such manner as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulation prescribe.'

"(b) Despite the provisions of this section the tax imposed under section 616 of the Revenue Act of 1932 before its amendment by this section on electrical energy furnished before September 1, 1933, shall be imposed, collected, and paid in the same manner and shall be subject to the same provisions of law (including penalties) as if this section had not been enacted."

And the Senate agree to the same.

PAT HARRISON,
WILLIAM H. KING,
WALTER F. GEORGE,
DAVID A. REED,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

R. L. DOUGHTON,
SAM B. HILL,
ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
ISAAC BACHARACH,
Managers on the part of the House.

ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to address my remarks to the conference report.

It is becoming more apparent each day that it is not likely that we shall reach the St. Lawrence Treaty at this session of Congress. So many speeches have been made upon the other side presenting misinformation in regard to this treaty by those who favor its ratification that I feel, on account of the tremendous interest my State has in the subject, as well as the entire Middle West, that the viewpoint and the picture of those who are opposed to the ratification of the treaty in its present form should be presented to the Senate and to the country at this time.

As an instance of some of the misinformation that has been broadcast from this Chamber, on yesterday my friend the able Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] made the statement that the entire cost of the St. Lawrence project was officially estimated at $168,000,000.

Mr. President, there is no warrant for any such statement as that. I think it is conceded by every one who has given any thought or study to the question that the estimated cost of the project is approximately $543,000,000, some of which already has been expended. The estimated amount of new money that is required for the project is approximately $400,000,000, of which the United States will be required to expend the sum of $258,000,000, and Canada the sum of approximately $142,000,000. However, so far as Canada is concerned, there is no contractual obligation upon its part to expend more than approximately $22,000,000.

The statement has been made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and it has been intimated by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], that those who oppose the ratification of this treaty are actuated by a desire to serve the power interests of this country.

Mr. President, no such reason impels the people of my State to oppose the ratification of the treaty. We are favorable to a seaway by way of the St. Lawrence, with proper restrictions, with a proper safeguarding of the interests of our country, and with an equitable division of the expense; but the people of my State interested in waterways are opposed to this treaty, and they have strong, cogent, and impelling reasons for opposition thereto.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a remark?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. When the charge is made that the power interests are influential in the opposition to this treaty, I desire to say for the people of my State in the most solemn manner I can that that has nothing to do with the opposition of the two Senators from New York.

We have no objection to this treaty so far as power development is concerned. If it were possible for a treaty to be made between the United States and Canada which would permit the building of dams for power purposes, we would give it our enthusiastic support. It is because of our opposition to the expense involved and the probable destruction of our seaport economically that we are in opposition.

So I want to join with the Senator in resentment against the charge, the insinuation, or the intimation that the Power Trust has anything whatever to do with our opposition to the treaty; and I thank the Senator for expressing the view of his State regarding the same matter.

Mr. PATTERSON. I thank the Senator very much for his contribution to this subject.

Mr. President, on August 14, 1914, the Panama Canal was opened for navigation. The completion of the Canal was celebrated as one of the world's greatest engineering feats. It added to the strength of our national defense. It shortened the sea voyage between the eastern and western coasts by thousands of miles. It brought the cities upon our eastern and western seaboards in closer proximity to each other; but it imposed a tremendous handicap upon the great landlocked interior of the United States.

Since the Canal was completed the products of industry in the Mississippi Valley cannot compete in the markets of the west coast with products from the Atlantic coast cities, because of the low water-transportation cost which the Canal has made available to the products of these competitors of the Midwestern States; and the same thing is true in the markets of the eastern seaboard. Because of the high cost of transportation in the Middle West, the products of the farm and factory in that section cannot compete in the markets of Central and South America and the Orient.

Mr. President, in order to overcome this handicap Congress more than 20 years ago undertook to improve the inland river system of the United States in order to make available low-cost water transportation for commerce, industry, and the products of agriculture of the great interior of our country. We have expended more than $200,000,000 toward carrying out this program; and while much of the work has been done, the project has not been completed. We have expended approximately $155,000,000 in improving the Great Lakes waterway system. In order that the interior may enjoy the full benefits of the low-cost water transportation which these two great systems will provide, it is necessary to have an adequate flow of water from Lake Michigan in order to insure for all time a commercially successful waterway between the Great Lakes and the Mississippi Valley waterway system.

If the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway is improved as planned by the treaty, and an adequate trunk-line waterway is not provided connecting the two systems, then the disadvantage which the Mississippi Valley States have suffered because of the Panama Canal will be tremendously increased. As evidence of the extent to which Valley States have suffered because of lack of available low-water cost transportation which would enable them to utilize the Panama Canal, new industries are locating along the seaboard and the lake shores, and many of the older industries in the Middle West are compelled to establish branch factories in sections where low-cost water transportation is available. Pay rolls follow industry, and population follows pay rolls, with the result that the interior States are unable to keep pace with the rest of the country. You can move your factory to the seashore, but you cannot move the farm to the seashore; and if agriculture in the great interior is to succeed, it must be provided with low-cost water transporation which will enable its products to pass down through the valley and out to the sea and to utilize the Great Lakes-St. Lawrencc system.

It shall be my purpose to show that the amount of diversion from Lake Michigan permitted by the terms of the treaty is insufficient for a commercially successful waterway connecting the Great Lakes and Mississippi systems. I propose to show that the division of the cost for the completion of the St. Lawrence Waterway is inequitable and to the disadvantage of the United States, as well as the division of power developed by the system.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER AND WATER TREATY

Mr. President, it is estimated that the St. Lawrence power and water project provided for in this treaty will produce approximately 5,000,000 horsepower of electricity, 1,000,000 of which will belong to the United States and 4,000,000 to Canada. Under the terms of the treaty a waterway is to be constructed down the St. Lawrence from the Lakes to the sea adequate for ocean vessels with 27-foot draft. This waterway is to be available for merchant ships of Canada, Great Britain, and the United States, as well as the merchant fleets of other nations. This treaty is so comprehensive in its terms and far-reaching in its effect that it should be approached with caution and considered with care, and before ratification we should make sure that its terms are fair and just and that the interests of the United States have been protected.

It is estimated that the waterway and initial power developments provided for will require new money to the extent of approximately $400,000,000; that of this sum $258,000,000 is to be paid by the United States and $142,000,000 by Canada. It is important to note that the cost of this treaty is only an estimate, and it may be assumed that this estimate was made by the proponents of the treaty, who are anxious to have it ratified. It should be remembered, however, that the treaty does not limit the cost to the estimate of the engineers, and its ratification binds the United States to pay for certain specified works in the international section, whatever that cost may be.

The engineers estimated the cost of the Panama Canal at $145,000,000, but before it was completed it cost $380,000,000. The cost of the New Welland Canal was estimated at $50,000,000, but before it was completed the cost of its construction actually amounted to $128,000,000. Whatever the ultimate costs may be, the United States undertakes to complete works which involve, under the present estimate, almost twice as much in the way of labor, equipment, and material as those which Canada undertakes. Our risk in this matter of future costs is therefore almost in the ratio of 2 to 1 compared with Canada's. In times such as these, when the public debt has already reached staggering proportions, when business is stagnant, when the tax burden is already unbearable, and while millions of our people are hungry, we should hesitate before assuming this vast liability, especially when the limit of that liability is not definitely known.

Article III of the treaty is interesting and should be scrutinized with care. It reads in part as follows:

> The high-contracting parties agree to establish and maintain a temporary St. Lawrence International Rapids Section Commission * * * and to empower it to construct the works in the International Rapids section * * * out of funds which the United States hereby undertakes to furnish as required by the progress of the works.

The international section of the St. Lawrence is estimated to cost the United States $215,000,000, but this is only an estimate, and if the cost of this improvement exceeds the estimate as much as did the cost of the Panama Canal or the New Welland Canal, then the cost to the United States before it is finished will exceed $500,000,000, and with interest charges covering the period of construction, the cost to the United States will exceed $600,000,000 in the international section alone.

Under the provisions of article III of the treaty, the United States is bound to expend an estimated sum of $55,000,000 in Canadian territory, for Canadian labor, engineers, and materials. If this estimate is as far short as was the case of the Panama Canal, then our cost for Canadian labor, engineers, and materials will exceed $145,000,000. This presents a disturbing and distressing picture to the millions of unemployed in our own country. Is it any wonder the Canadian Premier should have been so enthusiastic in his statement of July 18, 1932, when he said:

> The United States will meet the entire cost of these river works. But in respect to river works lying on the Canadian side of the boundary Canadian workmen and Canadian material alone will be employed. Upon completion all river works on the Canadian side of the international boundary will be owned, maintained, and controlled by Canada. * * * Compatible with the paramount obligation to safeguard our (Canada's) sovereign rights, the treaty insures a minimum of financial outlay by Canada. The estimated cost to the Dominion arising out of new capital expenditures will be less than $40,000,000, * * * very small compared with the enormous advantages which will accrue to Canada from the completion of the waterway.

While the Canadian minister makes the statement that the cost will be less than $40,000,000, the real fact about the matter is that Canada, under the terms of this treaty, are obligated only to spend a little more than $22,000,000.

The skill and genius of Great Britain in the diplomatic field has long been recognized. They have again demonstrated their ability in trading amiable assurances for valuable assets. Our own representatives have again demonstrated their usual diplomatic incapacity. It has been said that the United States has never lost a war nor won a diplomatic victory, and this treaty is in keeping with that record.

Why is the estimated cost of this improvement to Canada $142,000,000 while the estimated cost to the United States is approximately $258,000,000? It is because Canada gets credit for the improvements she has already made on the Welland Canal and other improvements upon the St. Lawrence, while we receive no credit whatever for the millions we have spent in improving for navigation purposes the Great Lakes, which are a part of the same system. The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway includes the rivers and connecting channels of the Great Lakes, and why should we not receive credit for the millions we have expended and the millions more we are required to spend, by the terms of this treaty, in widening and deepening the rivers and connecting channels of the Great Lakes? As evidence that we intend to improve the rivers and connecting channels of the Great Lakes to a width and depth that will conform to the St. Lawrence waterway, and that such rivers and connecting channels are to constitute a part of the St. Lawrence waterway, I call the attention of the Senate to a paragraph in the preamble of the treaty, which reads as follows:

Taking note of the declaration of the Government of the United States of its intention to provide not later than the date of the completion of the deep waterway in the international section of the St. Lawrence River for the completion of the works in the Great Lakes system above Lake Erie, which will provide essential links in the deep waterway to the sea.

We have already expended in the improvement of the Great Lakes, its connecting rivers and channels, $154,070,288. We must now expend an additional sum of approximately $38,800,000 to make the rivers and harbors and connecting channels of the Great Lakes to conform to the 27-foot depth which this treaty provides for the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway.

As evidence of the rights Great Britain will have in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway, I call the Senate's attention to the provisions of article VII of the treaty, which specifically grants to Great Britain and her Provinces the full and free right for all time to use the rivers and harbors and connecting channels of the Great Lakes. There could be no doubt but that tramp steamers and other merchant vessels under the British flag, because of the greatly superior numbers of the British fleet, will make more use of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway than will ships flying the American flag. The British and other foreign ships, which we have no power to regulate, will bring freight to the lake cities at rates which will disrupt every rate structure in the United States. Not only have we declared our intention in the preamble of the treaty to make these Great Lakes improvements at our own expense but we propose to complete them before the International Rapids section of the waterway is finished.

If Canada is to have credit for all the expenditures she has made on the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway, then why should we not have credit for the millions we have already spent and the millions we are required to spend upon this waterway? If it is fair for Canada to have credit for the money she has expended upon this waterway, why should we not have credit for the money we have expended and will be required to expend upon this waterway, which will be open for all time to the unlimited use of both countries and, if the past is any criterion of the future, will be utilized far more by ships flying the British and Canadian flags than by ships flying the Stars and Stripes?

Fort William and Port Arthur together constitute the largest wheat port in the world. This port is located in Canadian territory on the northern shore of Lake Superior. It is near the great Canadian wheat fields. Into this great port the grain of Canada is gathered for shipment to Liverpool and other markets of the world. Grain from this port must be moved through the channels of Lake Superior, down into the St. Mary's River, through the locks of the Sault Ste. Marie, thence through the channels of Lake Huron, through the St. Clair and Detroit Rivers, and through the channels of Lake Erie, before it reaches the Welland Canal. These Great Lakes improvements have cost and will cost the United States hundreds of millions of dollars before the 27-foot channel is completed. For foreign commerce they are much more useful and essential to Canada and Great Britain than to the United States. They are a part of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway, which is made free for all time for the use of British flagships; and if Canada is to have credit for the money she has expended on one part of this great system, why should the United States not have credit for the moneys which she has expended upon another part of the same system?

Before sea-going vessels of Canada and Great Britain can dock at the great wheat port on the north shore of Lake Superior, the United States must build a new lock in the St. Mary's River, at an estimated cost of $6,500,000. If the Panama Canal is any criterion, this new lock may cost us $17,500,000. But, whatever the cost of the lock may be, we have declared our intention, by the terms of the treaty, to build it.

By the opening of a waterway for sea-going vessels direct from the wheat fields of Canada to the world markets of Europe, we are giving to the Canadian farmer a tremendous advantage over the farmers in the grain section of the United States. The great Canadian wheat port on the northern shore of Lake Superior is approximately 1,000 miles nearer to Liverpool than the port of New Orleans, and therefore the most direct route from the wheat fields of Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, and southern Illinois is over the Great Lakes and down the St. Lawrence, but over a route that puts the American wheat grower at a much farther distance from foreign markets than is his Canadian competitor.

The only way these American wheat farmers could in a measure meet the new competition of their Canadian neighbors in the world markets is by the use of facilities for low-cost water transportation over the Missouri, Mississippi, and Illinois Rivers to the sea-going vessels at Chicago, which have been promised by the St. Lawrence improvements. Yet while this treaty provides for a great waterway direct from the Canadian wheat port to the world market, it shuts down the diversion at Chicago to a point where it renders a commercially successful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway impossible, and thereby denies to the American wheat farmer an opportunity to utilize the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway.

As another evidence of the unilateral features of this treaty, I call the Senate's attention to article VI, which reads as follows:

The high contracting parties agree that they may, within their own respective territories, proceed at any time to construct alternative canal and channel facilities for navigation in the international section or in waters connecting the Great Lakes, and that they shall have the right to utilize for this purpose such water as may be necessary for the operation thereof.

Under this provision of the treaty Canada will be authorized to construct an all-Canadian waterway from the Georgian Bay to Lake Ontario, and to take as much water as she may desire for the operation of this canal. This enables Canada to divert as much water as she likes out of the American watershed in order to build an all-Canadian canal, while the treaty prohibits us from taking more than an annual average of 1,500 second-feet from Lake Michigan for use in an all-American waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf.

Georgian Bay is in Canadian territory but is tributary to Lake Huron. Lake Michigan is in American territory but is tributary to Lake Huron; and if Canada is given the right to divert unlimited water out of the Canadian watershed for the purpose of building a Canadian waterway, why should we be limited to a diversion of 1,500 second-feet out of an all-American lake to build an American waterway?

Mr. President, let me reiterate that the only way for the Middle West to overcome the disadvantage created by the Panama Canal, and the only way to enable industry in the Mississippi Valley to compete in the markets of the east and west coast, of the Orient and of Central and South America, is by the development of a commercially successful waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf and by improving the tributaries of the Mississippi system.

The seriousness of this problem to the interior is shown by the fact that the average growth of population in the country during the past 20 years has been 33 percent, while St. Louis, including the territory covering a radius of 150 miles, has actually lost 6 percent in population. If equal opportunity is to be given to the whole country, then this treaty must be modified so that the diversion from Lake Michigan, which has been in effect for more than 80 years, may be continued in a sufficient quantity to insure a commercially successful waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf.

SUPREME COURT DECISION

Article VIII writes into the treaty a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered on the 21st day of April 1930. This decision requires a periodical reduction of the diversion at Chicago until 1938, at which time the flow is to be reduced to 1,500 second-feet annual average for navigation purposes in the Chicago River, and the United States is prohibited for all time from diverting a greater amount, regardless of the future necessities of our country.

The incorporation of this decision into the treaty is unfair and misleading, because it conveys the impression that the question of diversion for navigation to meet the needs of the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway has been adjudicated by the Supreme Court, when as a matter of fact this question was not considered by the Court.

There was good reason why the Supreme Court should not have considered a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway. As heretofore indicated, the decision of the Court was rendered on April 21, 1930. Congress did not adopt a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway until July 1930, so that at the time the question was before the Court no Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway had been adopted.

The Supreme Court decision dealing with diversion was based upon a suit brought by the Lakes States to prohibit the Sanitary District of Chicago and the State of Illinois from further diverting any water from Lake Michigan. The Supreme Court appointed the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, Hon. Charles Evans Hughes, as special master to take testimony and report his findings to the Court. The Supreme Court instructed the special master to determine what diversion, if any, of water from Lake Michigan would be necessary to maintain navigation in the Chicago River. This case was twice referred to Mr. Hughes.

Upon the first reference of the case the special master permitted evidence bearing upon the question of the amount of water necessary for a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, and in his first report to the Court he concluded:

> That Congress has power to regulate the diversion; that it is to determine whether and to what extent it should be permitted; that Congress has conferred authority upon the Secretary of War to regulate the diversion; that the permit of March 3, 1925, is valid and effective; according to its terms, the entire control of the diversion remaining with Congress; that in the light of these conclusions the bill of the petitioner should be dismissed.

The Supreme Court apparently came to the conclusion that, inasmuch as no Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway had been adopted by Congress, the question of diversion for the purpose of such a waterway was not open for consideration by the Court, whereupon the Court rereferred the case to Mr. Hughes as special master, with instructions "to determine what diversion, if any, of water from Lake Michigan will be necessary for the purpose of maintaining navigation in the Chicago River as a part of the port of Chicago after the sewage-disposal works are in full operation." Acting under these instructions, the special master upon the rereference refused to permit evidence showing the amount of diversion from Lake Michigan necessary to insure a successful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, and in his report to the Court upon the second reference the master said:

> Under the opinion of this Court in the present suits, the question of the allowance for diversion of water from Lake Michigan in the interest of a waterway to the Mississippi is not deemed to be open for consideration.

This is conclusive proof that the Supreme Court did not consider a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway when it rendered its decision of April 21, 1930. The special master, Mr. Hughes, now Chief Justice, concluded that Congress had the power to regulate the diversion and to determine what extent it should be permitted; that Congress had conferred authority upon the Secretary of War to regulate such diversion; and that the permit of March 3, 1925, was valid and effective. That permit authorized the diversion of 8,500 cubic feet per second.

If the act of July 3, 1930, authorizing and adopting a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, had been in effect at the time the Supreme Court had the question of diversion under consideration and the question of water for that waterway had been considered by the special master and by the Supreme Court, there might be some ground for incorporating the Supreme Court decision into the treaty. However, I contend that treaties should be specific in their terms and that it is bad practice to incorporate the decisions of courts into treaties.

It is well to consider the real purpose for which the 1,500 second-feet for maintaining navigation in the Chicago River was authorized. As a matter of fact, the evidence shows that this water was not necessary for the purpose of giving sufficient volume or depth upon which to float transportation equipment. The primary purpose was to divert a sufficient amount of fresh water from the Lakes through the Chicago River to wash the impurities out of that river and make it sufficiently sanitary to protect the health and comfort of the navigator. Another purpose was to prevent the impurities constantly accumulating in the Chicago River from being carried into the lake, thereby polluting the fresh waters of the lake and endangering the lives of those whose water supply is taken therefrom.

It is apparent that the Supreme Court concluded that, in the absence of action by Congress, it had no authority to consider a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway and limited its consideration to the necessities of navigation in the Chicago River. Had the act of July 3, 1930, authorizing and adopting a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, been in force when the matter was before the Supreme Court, so that evidence showing the amount of diversion necessary to insure a commercially successful waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf could have been presented, and so that the Court had authority to pass upon that question, its decision would probably have been different from the one which was rendered.

ACT OF JULY 3, 1930

We must assume, by the act of July 3, 1930, that Congress intended to create and insure for posterity a commercially successful waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf. Since there is a fall of approximately 125 feet between Lake Michigan and the Illinois River, and since a waterway from Lake Michigan to the Illinois cannot be created without diversion from Lake Michigan, it must be assumed that Congress intended that the diversion from Lake Michigan, which has been in effect for many years, should at least continue to such extent as would insure the commercial success of such waterway. In adopting a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, Congress, in the act of July 3, 1930, provided an orderly procedure whereby the amount of diversion necessary to insure the success of such waterway should be determined.

At this point I may digress to say that the provision of the law which I am about to read became a part of the law by way of an amendment introduced by the then junior Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Blaine. The language of that provision is as follows:

As soon as practicable after the Illinois waterway shall have been completed, in accordance with this act the Secretary of War shall cause a study of the amount of water that will be required as an annual average flow to meet the needs of a commercially useful waterway as defined in said Senate document, and shall, on or before July 31, 1938, report to Congress the results of such study, with his recommendations as to the minimum amount of such flow that will be required annually to meet the needs of such waterway, and that will not substantially injure the existing navigation on the Great Lakes, to the end that Congress may take such action as it may deem advisable.

Now, Mr. President, before that waterway is opened—and the opening of the Illinois waterway will be celebrated on June 22, 1933—it is proposed to foreclose any further investigation upon the subject. Now it is proposed by the provisions of article VIII of the treaty to nullify this solemn provision of an act which was duly considered, passed by each branch of Congress, and approved by the President, and at the same time to apply to the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway the provisions of a court decree which purported to meet the sanitary requirements of navigation interests in the Chicago River Harbor only. It is perfectly apparent that the amount of water necessary to insure a commercially successful waterway cannot be determined until after such waterway is completed and in full operation, and after proper and adequate tests have been made at the different seasons of the year, and under the varying conditions which will be encountered by the navigators of such waterway.

The distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who is now advocating ratification of the treaty, supported the Blaine amendment in very forceful language and had this to say upon the subject:

We who disagree, Mr. President, with the contemplated form of the warrant for federalization are ready to join in taking over the canal: we are ready to relieve Illinois of its unfinished and temporarily insolvent task; we are ready to complete it as a commercially useful waterway in all respects and as defined in Senate Document No. 126; we are ready to order a new survey to determine what changed flow, if any, from Lake Michigan is necessary to make a commercially useful waterway; and in the event that these prior reports prove to be inadequate, and in the event that this necessity is greater than the flow now legally available, we are ready sympathetically to let a subsequent Congress determine this subsequent issue insofar as it may have the constitutional right. All this we are ready and willing to do, and it is so set forth in the substitute offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, a substitute which, I am told, is not entirely unacceptable to some of the Illinois waterway leaders themselves.

Mr. President, for more than a century the United States has consistently contended, and Canada has repeatedly recognized, that Lake Michigan is an American lake. It is entirely within American territory; it does not touch the Canadian border, and its entire watershed is on American soil; and now, for the first time in the history of the country, this treaty proposes to nullify this long-established doctrine and to take away from Congress the right to control the uses of the waters of this American lake, and to surrender to Great Britain the right to say what shall be done with the waters of Lake Michigan.

DIVERSION NECESSARY FOR A SUCCESSFUL WATERWAY

Mr. President, no one can now calculate how important a successful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway may become to the people of the Mississippi Valley and to the United States as a whole 100 or 500 years hence. Congress, recognizing the importance of protecting the interests of the United States, not only for the present but for future generations, made ample provision in the act of July 3, 1930, to have this question carefully and intelligently determined by study and experimentation after such waterway is completed and in full operation. I respectfully submit that for the Senate now to ratify this treaty with article VIII included would be unwise and unsafe and jeopardize the interests of generations yet to come.

IT IS AN INADEQUATE DIVERSION

As an evidence that 1,500 second-feet authorized in the Supreme Court decision is not adequate to meet the needs of a successful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, I call the Senate's attention to the conclusions upon this question of some of the great engineers of our Army. In 1920 Col. J. G. Warren, one of the great hydraulic engineers of the Army, recommended a diversion of 10,000 second-feet as necessary to meet the needs of a successful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway. In 1921 Col. W. D. Judson, another eminent hydraulic engineer of the Army, recommended a diversion of 7,500 second-feet as necessary for a successful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway. In 1929 Gen. Edgar Jadwin, then Chief of Engineers, and one of the great hydraulic engineers of the country, testified that an annual diversion of at least 5,000 second-feet would be necessary to maintain a commercially successful waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf.

Major Gotwals testified before Commissioner Hughes in the Lake level case that a diversion of 10,000 cubic feet per second increased the depth more than 1 foot at Alton. He also stated that it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to make a dependable 9-foot channel at low-water mark between the mouth of the Illinois River and St. Louis with a diversion of less than 10,000 cubic feet per second. This is so, because of the unusual fall in that section of the river, coupled with the rock formation of the stream at and above the Chain of Rocks.

On May 3, 1926, Col. Rufus W. Putnam, of the United States Army, recognized for his experience and ability as a hydraulic engineer, in a report to the Chief of Engineers stated that a diversion of 10,000 second-feet made a difference during low water of 18 inches in the depth of the river at St. Louis.

Mr. President, it is reported that Gen. Lytle Brown, Chief of Engineers, in August 1932, stated that a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway could be maintained with a diversion of 1,500 second-feet plus the domestic pumpage at Chicago. We should not overlook the fact, however, that in May 1930, while the question of a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway was under consideration by the Commerce Committee of the Senate, Gen. Lytle Brown appeared and testified as follows:

Senator VANDENBERG. What is your present judgment as to the smallest flow of water necessary to develop a commercially successful waterway at this point?

General BROWN. The indications are with everything in view that something like 5,000 feet per second should be held available for that purpose.

It certainly cannot be contended, in the face of reports of such eminent engineers of the United States Army, that the interests of the United States will be protected if the Senate ratifies the proposed treaty, including article VIII, without first giving the Secretary of War and the Congress the time and the opportunity, as provided by law, to determine by study and experimentation the amount of diversion necessary to insure a commercially successful all-American waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf.

THE EFFECT OF THE SUPREME COURT DECISION

The committee hearings upon the Canadian treaty contained evidence to the effect that under the Supreme Court decision, there will be available for use in a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway not only the 1,500 second-feet authorized for use in the navigation of the Chicago River, and in addition the domestic pumpage, amounting to an additional 1,800 second-feet, making a total of 3,300 second-feet.

As a matter of fact, the city of Chicago is now metering its water for domestic use, and expert engineers advise that this will result in domestic pumpage being reduced to approximately 1,200 second-feet. The 1,500 second-feet for use in the Chicago River, authorized by the Supreme Court decision, will not be a continuous flow, but will be taken in varying volumes and will be calculated on an annual average.

The evidence taken before the special master in the Supreme Court case, as well as the decision which followed, showed that the one purpose for allowing 1,500 second-feet diversion was to prevent the polluted waters from the Chicago River from flowing into Lake Michigan. The evidence further shows that during the rainy season, when the polluted flood waters carrying the surface waste of Chicago's streets are at their height, it will require at times as much as 12,000 second-feet diversion from the lake in order to force such polluted waters down through the Chicago Drainage Canal, and thus prevent lake pollution.

These flood periods sometimes last for days, with the result that such diversions of water from the Lakes must be taken during such flood periods that in order to keep the annual average diversion down to 1,500 second-feet, it will be necessary to reduce the diversion during the heavy navigation season of the summer and fall to a point ranging from 350 to 400 second-feet. Thus it will be observed that for the use of the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway during the heavy navigation season the total amount of diversion for all purposes will not exceed 1,600 second-feet, and the overwhelming testimony of the Army engineers shows that this is not sufficient for a commercially successful waterway.

THE EFFECT OF POLLUTION

Two very serious handicaps will result from navigation so limited. In the first place, it will necessitate an increased number of locks and dams, requiring much delay in breaking up the tows for the purpose of locking the barges through, which will greatly increase the cost of transportation on the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, thereby depriving the shipper of the economy which an adequate waterway would afford.

The special master found from the evidence that the most modern purification works were about 85 percent effective. The Chicago sewerage area contains a population of approximately 4,500,000 people. This means that after Chicago's purification works are completed, as required by the Supreme Court, a pollution equivalent to the raw sewerage of 675,000 people will be pouring into the pools of the Illinois waterway, which must be held stagnant and inactive, because the flow of water will not be sufficient to maintain adequate depth in the pools and at the same time keep the foul pollution in such pools moving.

The Supreme Court was careful to provide sufficient diversion to purify the waters of the Chicago River to the point where healthful navigation is assured. But imagine, if possible, navigating the foul, stagnant pools of the Illinois waterway during the hot months of July, August, and September. Imagine the operators of cargo vessels trying to eat their food surrounded by the pollution and the stench of such an environment.

Mr. President, why should the opponents of this treaty be unwilling to provide sufficient water for a healthful and commercially useful waterway through our own country, especially so when we are spending hundreds of millions of dollars to provide a great waterway from the Great Lakes through Canada and out to the sea? While we are providing this great seaway through foreign soil, why not provide an adequate diversion for a successful and healthful waterway through the heart of our own country?

THE HISTORY OF DIVERSION AND THE MICHIGAN-ILLINOIS WATERWAY

Mr. President, in 1822 Congress passed an act authorizing the State of Illinois to open a canal through the public lands connecting the Illinois River with Lake Michigan. In 1826 the Legislature of Illinois passed a resolution reading in part as follows:

> The memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois respectfully represents: That the construction of a canal uniting the waters of Lake Michigan with the Illinois River will form an important addition to the great connecting links in the chain of internal navigation, which will effectually secure the insoluble union of the confederate members of this great and powerful Republic. * * * To effect so great and desirable an object, your memorialists believe it to be of sufficient importance to engage the attention and awaken the munificent patronage of a Government whose principle of action is the promotion of the general welfare. (See S.Doc. 49, 19th Cong., 1st sess.)

In 1827 Congress passed an act authorizing the State of Illinois to open a canal connecting Lake Michigan with the Illinois River, said act containing the following provision:

> For the purpose of aiding the said State in opening a canal to unite the waters of Illinois River with those of Lake Michigan, a quantity of land * * * on each side of said canal is granted to the State of Illinois, and the said land shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature of the said State for the purpose aforesaid and no other: Provided, That the said canal, when completed, shall be and forever remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from any toll or other charge whatever for any property of the United States or persons in their service passing through the same.

This grant conveyed 284,000 acres of land to the State of Illinois. (See Annual Report, Chief of Engineers, 1887, p. 2141.) Congress took this action with full knowledge that a canal from Lake Michigan to the Illinois River could not be operated except by the use of water diverted from Lake Michigan. On January 9, 1836, the Legislature of Illinois passed an act entitled "An act for the construction of the Illinois and Michigan Canal." In 1848 this canal was completed at a cost to the State of Illinois of $6,557,681.50. Thus diversion from Lake Michigan for the purpose of making a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway was begun in 1848.

In 1861 the Illinois Legislature passed an act for the improvement of navigation in the Illinois River by dredging or by supplying water from Lake Michigan through the enlargement and deepening of the Illinois and Michigan Canal or by opening a channel from Lake Michigan sufficient to secure a flow of water, ample and never failing, for the navigation of the Illinois River at all seasons and times when not obstructed by ice. (See Laws of Illinois, 1861–3, p. 277.)

General Wilson, of the United States Army, pursuant to the Rivers and Harbors Act of June 23, 1866, presented a report in which he said:

> The Illinois River seems to have been especially designed by nature as the line by which the waters of Lake Michigan are to be connected with those of the Mississippi. * * * A moment's consideration will show that at no remote period the waters of the lake must have been carried off by these streams as well as by the St. Lawrence. * * * The data herein contained demonstrate beyond doubt that the waters of the lake may be carried into the Illinois River through a navigable channel of any required dimensions and at a cost which cannot be regarded as excessive when the objects to be obtained are duly considered.

The annual report of the Chief of Engineers of 1868 contained the following:

> There are but two ways in which we can thoroughly protect our inland frontier in times of war, and relieve ourselves of a continuous menace in times of peace. * * * As a military measure, the construction of a canal will be effective, and, fortunately for the country, this can be done at an expense which must be regarded as insignificant when compared with the objects to be obtained. But great as are the military reasons which favor the establishment of steamboat navigation between the Lakes and the Mississippi, they are vastly transcended by those of a commercial and political character. (Annual Report, Chief of Engineers, 1868, p. 450.)

In 1887 the annual report of the Chief of Engineers contained the following provision:

> The United States and the State of Illinois have long been committed to the project of opening a water communication between the Mississippi River and the northern lakes of capacity sufficient for the wants of commerce and for the exigencies of our national defense. (Annual Report, Chief of Engineers, 1887, pp. 21–22.)

In November 1889 the Sanitary District of Chicago was formed by a vote of the people, and the district was—

> Authorized to construct a channel in the Michigan-Illinois Canal sufficient to produce a depth of water from Lake Michigan of not less than 18 feet * * * and a width of not less than 160 feet.

On August 9, 1893, Captain Marshall, United States Army engineer at Chicago, made a report to the Chief of Engineers which was by him transmitted to Congress with the annual report of the Chief of Engineers, informing the United States that the work of constructing the Sanitary District Canal had begun. (See Annual Report, Chief of Engineers, 1893, app. LL, p. 2794.)

In 1895 Captain Marshall, United States engineer at Chicago, reported to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, as follows:

> The city of Chicago expects to turn into the channel of Illinois at some future time 5,000 cubic feet of Lake Michigan water per second; at some more remote period there may be 10,000 cubic feet per second. (See Annual Report, Chief of Engineers, 1895, app. JJ, p. 2715.)

On May 8, 1899, the Secretary of War issued a permit to the city of Chicago to open its canal, permitting the water of Lake Michigan to flow through the canal into the Illinois River and permitting a diversion of 4,167 second-feet. For more than 30 years a diversion from Lake Michigan through the Chicago Drainage Canal, down the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers, ranging from 4,000 to 8,500 second-feet, has gone on under permits issued by the Secretary of War.

EFFECT OF DIVERSION

It is generally agreed among hydraulic engineers that a diversion of 10,000 second-feet from Lake Michigan lowers the levels of the lake between 5½ and 6 inches; that such lowering is complete in approximately 4 years after the diversion begins; and that no further lowering will result if such diversion continues forever, and this is true because the level of any lake depends upon the amount of water which gathers from rain and melting snow and the size of the channel draining such lake. The average annual amount of water flowing into Lake Michigan is approximately 180,000 second-feet, and so long as the amount of water flowing out through the Detroit and St. Clair Rivers equals the amount coming into Lake Michigan and Lake Huron the level of these lakes remains steady.

When the canal is opened at Chicago which diverts 10,000 feet of water for use in making a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, the level of Lake Michigan and Lake Huron is lowered until the amount of water passing out of the lake at Chicago, plus the amount passing out through the Detroit and St. Clair Rivers, equals the amount of water coming into such lakes, and the level of such lakes remains steady forever after insofar as such diversion is concerned.

The records of lake levels kept by the War Department for more than half a century show that the level of the Lakes fluctuates 4½ feet over cycles of approximately 10 years, depending upon the amount of water during such periods resulting from rainfall and melting snow. These cycles, of course, have their effect upon navigation and property along the lake shore—infinitely more effect than a diversion of 10,000 second-feet, which lowers the lake levels approximately 6 inches.

During the past 50 years Congress, at the expense of the whole country, has expended $154,000,000 in constructing harbors and deepening channels for the accommodation of navigation upon the Lakes. When this improvement began, navigation upon the Lakes was limited to boats of 6-foot draft. Today boats drawing 21 feet, carrying 10,000 to 12,000 tons of cargo, can enter the harbors and navigate the channels of the Lakes. Thus, our Government, at the expense of the whole country, has created channels for navigation overcoming many times the lowering resulting from a diversion of 10,000 second-feet at Chicago.

Mr. President, the Rivers and Harbors Act of July 3, 1930, provides that the War Department, at the expense of the United States, shall construct compensating works which will raise the levels of the Lakes approximately 18 inches, and which will regulate the cycles now damaging to navigation. The treaty now before the Senate contains the approval of Canada for the construction of such works. Thus, provision has been made not only for overcoming a lowering resulting from a diversion of 10,000 second-feet but for raising the levels of the Lakes 1 foot in addition thereto. When our Government, at the expense of the taxpayers of the whole country, provides such improvement in the navigation upon the Lakes, what right has any city or State bordering the Lakes, or any navigator using the Lakes, to complain of such diversion as may be found necessary to insure a commercially successful waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf?

By the improvement of the St. Lawrence waterway, largely at the expense of the United States, the depth of the waterway will be increased from 14 to 27 feet, even though a diversion of 10,000 cubic feet per second at Chicago shall continue permanently. As evidence that the compensating works are practical and feasible, and that a diversion of 10,000 second-feet from Lake Michigan for a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway can be overcome, I call the Senate's attention to the testimony of Gen. G. B. Pillsbury, Assistant Chief of Engineers, when he appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate. With reference to the limit of diversion which can be overcome by compensating works, the following testimony of General Pillsbury is most instructive:

Senator VANDENBERG. At what point would you say you reach a mechanical limit beyond which you cannot hope to compensate?

General PILLSBURY. When you get to a diversion of around 30,000 to 40,000 cubic feet per second, compensating works would cease to become feasible. (Hearings before subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, 72d Cong., 2d sess., p. 342.)

This is conclusive proof that a diversion far in excess of the requirements of a commercially successful waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf can be compensated for without injury to navigation upon the Lakes or navigation down the St. Lawrence.

POWER

If a diversion sufficient to insure a commercially successful all-American waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf can be permanently provided for without injury to navigation either upon the Lakes or down the St. Lawrence, then it is pertinent to inquire as to the source of opposition to such diversion. The answer is simple. The water from the Lakes necessary to make a successful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway cannot be used to turn the turbines of the power companies down the St. Lawrence. If an annual average flow of 10,000 second-feet or less is sufficient to insure for all time a commercially successful waterway through the great agricultural interior of our country, then 206,000 second-feet ought to be sufficient for the needs of a St. Lawrence waterway.

The great power interests along the St. Lawrence, however, are more concerned about the revenues which they hope to derive from the use of this water for power many years hence than they are about protecting the immediate interests of the United States. It is vital that we provide in this treaty for an adequate Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway sufficient not only to meet the needs of the present but to fulfill the requirements of generations yet to come. If we fail to protect American interests now, we cannot complain after the door is closed. Unfortunately, our diplomats think only of the needs of today, while the British look far into the future. Who can forecast the value to the United States of an adequate diversion 100 or 500 years from now?

It is easy to understand the selfish interests of the power companies, but it is difficult to understand why any American city or State bordering upon the Lakes should be more interested in Canadian power than in American navigation. How can they afford to sacrifice the rest of the country in order to serve their own selfish interests?

CANADA HAS LONG RECOGNIZED AMERICAN CONTROL OVER LAKE MICHIGAN DIVERSION

Mr. President, we have been diverting water from Lake Michigan for more than 80 years. For 10 years we have diverted approximately 8,500 second-feet. Lake Michigan is an American lake. It is in American territory. Not one drop of Canadian water has ever flowed into this lake. Our forefathers have ever maintained that diversion from this lake was an American question and that its entire territory was under American sovereignty.

That Canada has recognized this diversion and that she sought by the terms of the treaty in 1910 to limit such diversion to 10,000 second-feet is shown by the records of the International Waterway Commission, appointed in 1902 to study the question of diversion.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. The other day the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] made considerable reference to the Supreme Court decision relative to the use of water from Lake Michigan by Chicago. That, however, is strictly a domestic matter, is it not? We do not have to bother with Canada at all about that.

Mr. PATTERSON. I agree with the Senator absolutely upon that subject. There is not any question about it.

Mr. LONG. If we see fit in America, whether through Congress or otherwise, to deal with that subject, that is our own domestic question. Canada has not anything at all to do with that.

Mr. PATTERSON. Entirely so.

This Commission consisted of 3 Canadians and 3 Americans. On April 25, 1906, the Canadian section of this Commission made a report to the Canadian Government, in which it used the following language:

At Chicago the Americans have built a drainage canal, which when in full operation will use about 10,000 cubic feet of water per second * * *. As a diversion from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi is of a much more serious character than the temporary diversion from the Niagara River, it is felt that the amount of water taken on the American side of the Niagara River should be limited to 18,500 cubic feet per second * * *. It is exceedingly important in the interest of navigation, both to ourselves and the people of the United States, that the diversion by way of the Chicago Drainage Canal should be limited * * *. If our proposal is carried out, the diversions will be about as follows:

Diversions on the American side:	Per second cubic feet
Niagara Falls	18,500
Chicago Drainage Canal	10,000
Total	28,500

This, Mr. President, is the report of the Canadian Commission to the Canadian Government. They recognized our right to take the 10,000 second-feet.

	Per second cubic feet
Diversions on the Canadian side: Niagara Falls and on the Niagara Peninsula	36,000

Evidently, they took into consideration the fact that we were diverting 10,000 second-feet from Lake Michigan, and they were given upon their side a larger diversion than we received.

On January 4, 1907, the members of the International Waterways Commission reported to their respective Governments, as follows:

A careful consideration of all the circumstances leads us to the conclusion that the diversion of 10,000 cubic feet per second through the Chicago River will, with proper treatment of the sewage from areas now sparsely populated, provide for all the population which will ever be tributary to that river. * * * Incidentally it will provide for the largest navigable waterway from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi River which has been considered by Congress.

We therefore recommend that the Government of the United States prohibit the diversion of more than 10,000 cubic feet per second for the Chicago Drainage Canal.

Again recognizing our right to absolute dominion, they recommend to us—they do not attempt to assert any right in the premises, but they recommend to us—that we limit the diversion to 10,000 second-feet.

On May 5, 1910, Great Britain and the United States entered into a treaty, article VIII, of which contained the following provision:

The high contracting parties shall have, each on its own side of the boundary, equal and similar rights in the use of the waters hereinbefore defined as boundary waters.

The following order of precedence shall be observed among the various uses enumerated hereinafter for these waters, and no use shall be permitted which tends materially to conflict with or restrain any other use which is given preference over it in this order of precedence:

First. Uses for domestic and sanitary purposes.

Second. Uses for navigation, including the service of canals for the purpose of navigation.

Third. Uses for power and for irrigation purposes.

The foregoing shall not apply to or disturb any existing uses of boundary waters on either side of the boundary.

If Canada construes the waters of Lake Michigan as boundary waters, then she specifically authorized the diversion of 10,000 second-feet at Chicago in the treaty of 1910, which treaty is still in force. Our Government, however, has never conceded that Lake Michigan is boundary water. We have always contended that it is an American lake, under complete American sovereignty. As an evidence that Canada recognized our position with reference to Lake Michigan, I call the Senate's attention to the following from the treaty of 1910:

PRELIMINARY ARTICLE

For the purposes of this treaty boundary waters are defined as the waters from main shore to main shore of the lakes and rivers and connecting waterways, or the portions thereof, along which the international boundary between the United States and the Dominion of Canada passes, including all bays, arms, and inlets thereof, but not including tributary waters which in their natural channels would flow into such lakes, rivers, and waterways, or water flowing from such lakes, rivers, and waterways, or the waters of rivers flowing across boundary.

Lake Michigan is not adjacent to the international boundary, but is a tributary body of water which in its natural channel flows into the other lakes. It is purely an American lake, and as such was excluded from the treaty of 1910. As to the interpretation of the language of the preliminary article, I quote from Elihu Root, the then Secretary of State, who negotiated the treaty, and who appeared before the Senate on January 20, 1909, for the purpose of explaining the provisions of the treaty of 1910. The Senate record is as follows:

The preliminary article was read.

Secretary ROOT. The definition of boundary waters was carefully drawn in order to exclude Lake Michigan.

While the treaty of 1910 made no specific reference to diversion at Chicago, it is instructive to note that the Chicago diversion was under consideration by the International Joint Commission for approximately 8 years prior to 1910; that in 1906 the Canadian section of the Commission recommended to their Government that the Chicago diversion be limited to 10,000 second-feet; and that in 1907 the full Commission jointly recommended to their respective Governments that the Government of the United States limit the diversion at Chicago to 10,000 second-feet. Clearly the Canadians heretofore have recognized the American sovereignty over Lake Michigan.

If the Canadian commissioners did not recognize American sovereignty over Lake Michigan, then why did they recommend that "the Government of the United States prohibit the diversion of more than 10,000 cubic feet per second for the Chicago Drainage Canal"? Why did they not require that such prohibition be written into the treaty of 1910?

As a further evidence that both the Americans and the Canadians took into account the diversion at Chicago and the fact that this diversion took water out of the watershed, which is a diversion of a more serious character, I call the Senate's attention to the fact that under the treaty of 1910 Canada was allowed to divert 36,000 second-feet on the Canadian side, while the diversion on the American side was limited to 28,500 second-feet. Article II of the treaty of 1910 contained the following significant provision:

Each of the high contracting parties reserves to itself, or to the several State governments on the one side and the Dominion or Provincial governments on the other, as the case may be, * * * the exclusive jurisdiction and control over the use and diversion, whether temporary or permanent, of all waters on its own side of the line which in their natural channels would flow across the boundary into boundary waters.

As evidence that this language of the treaty of 1910 was intended to refer to the diversion at Chicago and that such diversion was considered as a domestic question under the protection of American sovereignty, and was so recognized by the officials of our Government at the time the treaty was ratified, I call the Senate's attention to a memorandum prepared by the Honorable Chandler P. Anderson, legal adviser of the State Department, and submitted to the Foreign Relations Committee as an official document of the State Department. In this memorandum Mr. Anderson said:

Attention is called to the express provision in this article II that it shall not apply to cases already existing, which would seem to cover, and was certainly intended to cover, the canal system at Chicago. * * * The treaty, therefore, recognizes that the settlement of the question of the use of waters of Lake Michigan is purely a domestic question and leaves undisturbed the governmental rights of the United States with respect to it.

As further proof that during the hearings and deliberations which were consummated in the treaty of 1910, Lake Michigan was considered an American lake, under exclusive American sovereignty, and that a diversion of 10,000 second-feet was taken into account in that treaty, I quote from a statement of Secretary Root, who appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate. Speaking of Niagara Falls, he said:

The great bulk of water goes on the Canadian side, and the Waterways Commission that was appointed some time ago to deal with the question of lake levels reports that 36,000 feet can be taken out on the Canadian side and 18,500 feet on the American side without injury to the falls. I thought it wise to follow the report of the Commission * * *; we are now taking 10,000 cubic feet per second out of Lake Michigan at Chicago, and I refused to permit them to say anything in the treaty about it. I would not permit them to say anything about Lake Michigan. I would not have anything in the treaty about it and, under the circumstances, I thought it better not to kick about this 36,000 feet. They consented to leave out of this treaty any reference to the drainage canal and we are now taking 10,000 cubic feet per second.

Senator BACON. You think there can never be any international question as to whether the term "tributary waters" includes Lake Michigan? You think it perfectly sure that Lake Michigan is excluded?

Secretary ROOT. I am perfectly sure of it. Article II of the treaty makes it perfectly certain that Lake Michigan is not to be regarded as boundary waters.

Thus, it will be observed that the Canadian commissioners in two reports to their Government recognized Lake Michigan as purely an American lake, and that diversion therefrom was an American question. This position was taken by Secretary Root and Mr. Anderson, and no responsible American official before the signing of this treaty ever proposed to surrender American sovereignty over this lake or to concede to Canada the right to any jurisdiction over this American territory.

Mr. President, Canada is ever vigilant in guarding the sovereignty of her territory. In support of this statement I beg leave to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Mail and Empire on July 19, 1932:

Those who have been nervous about Canadian sovereignty should read article 5 of the treaty, which provides that each of the high contracting parties shall retain complete ownership of, and complete legislative and administrative jurisdiction over, all works lying on its own side of the international boundary, irrespective of the agency by which such works are constructed. Such works shall constitute a part of the territory and property of the country in which they are situated. The proviso is deliberately inserted to protect Canadian sovereignty over all structures lying on the Canadian side, even though these structures have been built with United States money.

As a further evidence of the zeal with which Canada regards the sovereignty of her territory, and of the fact that she was fully conscious of the fatal surrender which our diplomatic representatives undertook to make in the draft of the same treaty, I quote the following extract from the same editorial:

It is the first time in history that the United States has agreed to place the abstraction of water from Lake Michigan under international control. This really means that Lake Michigan is admitted by the neighboring Republic to be an international waterway, like the other Great Lakes. Henceforth it belongs definitely by international agreement to the St. Lawrence watershed.

We have already shown that there is to be no abandonment of Canadian sovereignty in the St. Lawrence. The treaty involves no departure from the historical Canadian policy regarding the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes.

As proof that our diplomatic representatives who negotiated the proposed treaty intended to surrender sovereignty over Lake Michigan and to give to Canada absolute control over diversion at Chicago, which for more than a century has been recognized by both Governments as a domestic question, I beg leave to quote paragraph B of article VIII of the treaty, which reads as follows:

No diversion of water from the Great Lakes system or from the international section to another watershed shall hereafter be made except by authorization of the International Joint Commission.

There is no opportunity to divert water out of the St. Lawrence watershed on the Canadian side, and hence the foregoing paragraph was intended to specifically apply to the diversion at Chicago, and to give to Canada and to Great Britain the absolute control of that diversion in excess of 1,500 second-feet.

By the language of this provision we waive the right to submit the question of permanently increasing the diversion at Chicago to a disinterested board of arbitration, no matter how dire our needs may become for such increase. We bind ourselves to submit such question to the International Joint Commission. This Commission will be half Canadian and it will be impossible to increase the diversion for a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway without the consent of Canada. This is another proof of the alertness of Canadian diplomacy and of the inability of our representatives to protect the interests of the United States when coping with Canadian and British diplomats.

Elihu Root was a real diplomat, with genius and ability adequate to protect American interests; but what of our diplomats who negotiated the proposed treaty? They surrender the right to insure a commercially successful waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf by agreeing to limit for all time the Chicago diversion to 1,500 second-feet. They undertake to do this without even giving the Secretary of War the time or the opportunity to determine the amount of water necessary for such waterway, as provided by law. Furthermore, we get no consideration in return for giving up the diversion which has long existed at Chicago, or for surrendering sovereignty of our Lake Michigan; for under the terms of the proposed treaty the Canadians are granted the right to take 41,000 second-feet out of the Lakes for power, and as much more as they see fit, to make an all-Canadian waterway out of Georgian Bay, while the United States is limited to diversion of 22,425 second-feet. This is another conclusive proof of the inability and failure of our diplomats to protect the interests of the United States.

As another evidence that our American representatives were unable to cope with Canadian and British diplomats in writing the proposed treaty, I call attention to the fact that they bound the United States to pay approximately 65 percent of the present estimated cost of this great power and navigation project, and permitted Canada to take the lion's share of the benefits. On this point I shall further quote from the Toronto Mail and Empire editorial:

The treaty has its power side as well as its navigation side. The work in the international section and in the national section will develop about 5,000,000 horsepower. Of this 2,000,000 horsepower will be available in the international section and 3,000,000 in the national section. Canda is to obtain 1,000,000 of the 2,000,000 horsepower to be produced in the international section, but all of the 3,000,000 horsepower to be developed in the national section will belong to this country. This means that Canada is to obtain 4,000,000 horsepower and the United States 1,000,000 horsepower out of the whole St. Lawrence waterway development.

I have already quoted the jubilant boast of the Canadian Premier as to our vast expenditure for Canadian engineers, Canadian labor, and Canadian materials at a time when millions in our own country are begging for an opportunity to toil. As further bearing upon this point I again quote from the Toronto Mail and Empire editorial:

Most of the construction work will be done in Canada. All the construction work on the national section will, of course, be done here, but there is more than that. Though the United States is to provide the $54,718,000 for works situated on the Canadian side of the International Rapids section, Canadian engineers, Canadian labor, and Canadian materials are to be used.

Mr. President, the Canadians have a right to be proud of the skill and the genius of their diplomats, and the advantages which they gain as the result of the proposed treaty is a sufficient cause for jubliation among them. The editor of the Toronto Mail and Empire, in rejoicing over the success of the Canadian Minister who conducted the negotiations which resulted in the provisions of the proposed treaty, had the following to say:

He has obtained a treaty which places the bulk of the cost on the United States and involves the Dominion's treasury in an expenditure of less than $40,000,000. This, and his success in obtaining a greatly increased number of air channels from the United States for radio purposes, amply justify his appointment to the Washington post. He would not have accepted that position but for the prospect of doing these two jobs for Canada, and his double achievement marks him as an international diplomat of first-class order. In the language of the street, he has "carried the message to Garcia, delivered the goods, and brought home the bacon."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I want to remind the Senator that when a British diplomat negotiates a treaty on the part of Great Britain he is usually elevated to the peerage immediately following the ratification of the treaty for the success accomplished. It has been the almost invariable rule that when a Britisher or a Canadian comes over to the United States and puts over a treaty on us he is made either a baron or an earl immediately following the ratification of the treaty on account of the success attained, and I know of no other man who ever deserved such reward from the Canadian Government, as the Canadian paper so truthfully says, as the gentleman who put over on the United States this St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty, if we shall ratify it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; they ought to make him a duke. I am willing to admit that the Canadian minister "brought home the bacon" all right, but I am wondering what our diplomats were doing at the time. As proof that the Canadian representatives were keenly aware of the great advantage which they had obtained in article VI, in which our American representatives recognized Canadian sovereignty over all diversions in Canadian territory, while they surrendered to Canada absolute control over diversions from Lake Michigan, an all-American lake, I quote the following from the editorial in the Toronto Mail and Empire:

> Canada retains the specific right to construct at any time in the future, wholly within its own territory, alternative channels and canal facilities along the Great Lakes or in the St. Lawrence River, including the international section of the St. Lawrence. It has a right to use for such purely Canadian canal purposes whatever water there may be necessary for the operation thereof.
> As we indicated before, this clause places Canada in a position to build an all-Canadian waterway if at any time in the future it is deemed wise. This is one of the most important and one of the most satisfactory points in a treaty which fairly bristles with satisfactory points.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, we must concede that this treaty bristles with points favorable to Canada and unfavorable to the United States. By its terms we obligate ourselves in these distressing times to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to build a waterway through a foreign country, while depriving ourselves of the right to build a successful waterway through the great agricultural interior of our country. At our own expense we build a seaway from the wheat fields of Canada to the world markets, while we close the door to an adequate diversion for a waterway which will enable the farmers of our great agricultural States to use that seaway. We spend hundreds of millions of dollars to give the Canadian farmer an advantage which the American farmer cannot meet. We build a waterway of tremendous value to Canada which will be useful to only a small section of the United States. At our own expense we help create 5,000,000 horsepower of electricity, four fifths of which will belong to Canada.

We bind ourselves to pay 65 percent of the cost of a highway through Canadian territory and then give to Canada and Great Britain the right for all time to use the channels and harbors of the Great Lakes, which must be improved and maintained entirely at our own expense. We make all the improvements in the Great Lakes and give the British Empire the right to navigate them for all time and then permit the Canadians to divert 41,000 second-feet of lake water for power, while we are limited to 22,000 second-feet.

We yield to Canada complete control over diversions for navigation on the Canadian side and we surrender to Canada absolute control of diversions on the American side. We permit the Canadians to divert 5,000 second-feet from Niagara Falls to be used for power and navigation in the Welland Canal, while we allow them to limit our diversion at Chicago to 1,500 second-feet.

Canada safeguards her national policy and yields no sovereign right over her territory, while we reverse a policy regarded as sacred for a hundred years and permit Great Britain to say what we can do with a purely American lake.

This in the very nature of things is only a partial enumeration of the inequities and iniquities of this treaty, but it is enough to justify its rejection in its present form. It should be sent back for further negotiation and should never be ratified until these inequities have been removed and the interests of the United States, not only now but for the future, have been fully protected.

EXTENSION OF GASOLINE TAX—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I observe the absence of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who is in charge of the conference report, and also of the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. Therefore, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Kean	Reynolds
Ashurst	Cutting	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Dale	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.
Bachman	Davis	King	Russell
Bailey	Dickinson	La Follette	Schall
Bankhead	Dieterich	Lewis	Sheppard
Barbour	Dill	Logan	Shipstead
Barkley	Duffy	Lonergan	Smith
Black	Erickson	Long	Steiwer
Bone	Fess	McAdoo	Stephens
Borah	Fletcher	McCarran	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Utah
Brown	George	McKellar	Thompson
Bulkley	Glass	McNary	Townsend
Bulow	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Trammell
Byrd	Gore	Murphy	Tydings
Byrnes	Hale	Neely	Vandenberg
Capper	Harrison	Norris	Van Nuys
Caraway	Hastings	Nye	Wagner
Carey	Hatfield	Overton	Walcott
Connally	Hayden	Patterson	Walsh
Coolidge	Hebert	Pope	Wheeler
Copeland	Johnson	Reed	White

Mr. KING. I wish to announce that the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], and the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] are engaged in attendance upon a committee of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

BANKING REGULATIONS—INSURANCE OF DEPOSITS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have before me a copy of the Philadelphia Record of Tuesday, June 6, which refers to the bank situation. I wish to read a few lines, and then I wish to offer the remainder of the editorial for publication in the RECORD. Then, while I am on my feet, I wish to say a word about another matter. The editorial is headed "They Were Told to Stand By Their Banks", and, after the heading, reads as follows:

> To the Congress of the United States:
>
> Before you adjourn, what are you going to do for depositors in restricted and closed banks?
>
> What are you going to do for the men and women who, like good soldiers, stood by their Government in its hour of peril?
>
> They were told they could serve their country best by leaving their money in their banks. They were told it was their patriotic duty. The President of the United States told them, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Governor of their State, the mayor of their town, the president of the big bank, the minister in the pulpit, the editor of the newspaper.
>
> They took this advice seriously. They left their money in their banks—"they" being some 20,000,000 depositors in smaller banks with $8,000,000,000 of their money now tied up.
>
> What are you going to do for them?
>
> Adjourn without action in their behalf?
>
> That would be the vilest legislative betrayal in our history.
>
> That would be the disgrace not only to Congress but to the Presidency. It was the former President who urged upon these depositors the course which has proved their undoing.
>
> To adjourn without aiding the depositors in restricted and closed banks would be to discount patriotism and place a premium on selfishness.
>
> The man who drew his money out of his bank can now redeposit it and laugh at his neighbor who heeded the President.
>
> Is that a good precedent for the future of this Nation?

I want to read that last sentence again.

> The man who drew his money out of the bank can now redeposit it and laugh at his neighbor who heeded the President. Is that a good precedent for the future of this Nation?

I wish to digress long enough to say that it was the request and the urgence of the President of the United States, just as this paper says, and of the governors and all the Treasury officials that everybody ought to take their money and leave it in the banks. We denounced the hoarders as unpatriotic and called upon them to disgorge their money from their stockings and mattresses and put it back in the banks which were operated under law; and now, as this newspaper says, the man who did what the President of the United States told him to do and what the Congress asked him to do and what the authorities of the State told him to do, the man who heeded the call of patriotism now finds himself laughed at by the man who paid no attention to the urging of the Government and who kept his money out of the bank and who still has his money.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. VANDENBERG. In line with what the Senator is saying, I should like to offer this further observation. Much is said about the iniquity of the small State banking institutions in this situation, but the fact of the matter is, in my own State there are 100 of the so-called "little State banks" which are still closed which could have been opened long ago if two big national banks in the city of Detroit had not all the impounded reserves of the State banks tied up in those Federally controlled national institutions. In other words, the Government has a moral responsibility not only to the depositors in national banks but also to the depositors in these much-despised State banks which are the collateral victims of the failure of the former banks.

Mr. LONG. That is what broke the banks in my State. The Federal Reserve banks in the cities, particularly three of them—three Federal Reserve banks operated by the Federal Reserve Board—had tied up all the resources of the little country banks. They had in their vaults the taxes that had been collected by the municipalities and by the counties and by the States that had been deposited in those little banks and redeposited by the little banks in the Federal Reserve banks. On the faith and on the pledge of the President and of the leaders of both parties, they left the money in the banks, and now the banks have been closed, and the man who said, "I have too much sense to pay any attention to my Government, I know it cannot be believed, I would not believe it on oath", is the man who proved to be right.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator know how much money is tied up in those closed banks?

Mr. LONG. I understand it is between five to eight billion dollars. That is merely an estimate.

Mr. WALSH. Some time ago the forces of the administration contemplated starting a general liquidating corporation whereby the Government would be able to pay the amount of money found to be due those banks forthwith, and prevent the tieing up of this large sum of money throughout the slow progress of ordinary liquidation. What has become of that plan?

Mr. LONG. The liquidating corporation seems to have turned into an evaporating corporation. That is all we seem to be able to learn about it.

Mr. WALSH. As long as this huge sum of money is tied up in those closed banks it is a great contribution to deflation.

Mr. LONG. That is true.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me there is nothing that could be more helpful than to find some way of making available immediately the amount of money that could easily be estimated and determined to be due.

Mr. LONG. There is no question about it.

Mr. WALSH. I join with the Senator in expressing the hope that something along that line may be done in order that the unfortunate people who are suffering all over the country as a result of their funds being tied up may be relieved. I still hope some legislation may be enacted to relieve the situation in that respect.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator. I think if the Senator from Massachusetts and a few more of us will stay on the job we will be able to make them hear us before we get through with this session of Congress.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In line with the observation submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, I should like to say to the Senator that so far as reopening the closed banks in the Middle West is concerned, the one thing which will most promptly and effectually contribute to that end is for my immediate deposit-insurance proposal, which the Senate has approved, to become the law, because the thing which is now preventing the reopening of many banks in the Middle West is the fear that there will be supplementary runs, except as the people are given the steel beam of a Federal warrant upon which to rest their confidence. The process of reorganization in many of these institutions is now coming to the point of fruition, but in the face of this continued lack of confidence they would not be reopened lest persistent withdrawals again shall needlessly drive them to the wall.

Mr. WALSH. In other words, the business of the banks should be put upon a sound basis, but there is yet a possibility of their not reopening because of the fear that there may be runs that would wipe out their liquid assets.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is entirely correct. I think I have ample justification for saying that.

Mr. WALSH. In my State, and I suppose it is true throughout the country, there are very large numbers of banks where a person can only get a percentage of his deposits from time to time, and that is tying up hundreds of millions of dollars more.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is entirely correct. I repeat that so far as the Middle West is concerned, if the conferees, who are now meeting at this moment in respect to the so-called "Glass banking bill", retain my provision for immediate limited insurance, it can be done not only without any jeopardy to the Federal credit but it can be done utterly effectively in respect to the reopening of banks and the renewal of liquid bank credits.

Mr. LONG. There is a conference now going on which is going only a part of the way, but a long ways toward this end. They are talking about the banks that are solvent, the banks that can pay off entirely. There is no such bank in the United States today. We have only $7,000,000,000 or $8,000,000,000 worth of currency, gold and silver and printing-press money all put together. All of its amounts only to about 7½ billion dollars. We have about $45,000,000,000 worth of bank deposits, which, according to law, everybody can demand payment of, while we have but $7,000,000,000 to make payment of those $45,000,000,000 of deposits. There is no such thing as keeping a bank liquid. It cannot be liquid because we cannot get $45,000,000,000 out of $7,000,000,000.

Today we have on here a conference; and if we could take these distinguished gentlemen who told the people to put their money in the banks and leave it there, and keep them from interfering in this matter, the Vandenberg amendment would be back here and would be the law of the land today. But the very men who went out and got the people to leave their money in the banks, who got the people not to draw it out—those people whose money is now in the closed banks—the very men who advised the people—and the people took their word—are now imposing their will and their ipse dixit upon a conference between the House and the Senate to defeat the insurance of bank deposits which has been provided by the Vandenberg amendment.

I want to read just another line from this editorial:

> Remember that all the banks were closed by order of the Federal Government.

We have forgotten all about that. When we closed all the banks and they had to reopen and the people found out that they did not have the money to pay off the deposits, then they were all lost under the hammer. We practically said to a man over in Wichita, Kans., that the Government had to close his bank because it could not pay off, and the minute we reopened that bank without some kind of insurance to the people the process was only a matter of time before it would close again unless the Government stood behind it, because the people would know the bank did not have the money with which to pay off its depositors.

The editorial continues:

> Remember that all the banks were closed by order of the Federal Government—and only certain ones licensed to reopen. Five billions of deposits remain frozen in 5,000 restricted banks by act of the Federal Government.

That may be all right. I do not think so, however; but as this paper says, you may justify your conscience if you have to wipe out 5,000 banks, but you cannot justify your conscience that you have a right to let the depositors of those banks lose their money when you are the man who told them to put their money into the banks and leave it there if they were good American citizens. The man who did not leave his money in the bank, who proved that he did not care what the Government advised him to do, has his money today, and the man who left his money in the banks, in any of the 5,000 banks that are closed and are going to stay closed, is the man who is stuck today and is not going to get his money because he tried to follow the advice of his own Government.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I have had numerous communications from my State indicating that the people even now are restricted in the amount of money they can withdraw from their banks. In one instance that I have in mind a man wanted to buy a home, but could not draw his own money out of the bank. I presume there are hundreds of thousands of such cases throughout the country, so that not only is the money tied up in closed banks, but a large amount of money in open banks is not available and the people cannot use it for progress in industry or in business or for buying homes or indeed buying the necessities of life.

Mr. LONG. We have that condition throughout the United States. We have it in my State. Senators will find it in every State in the Union. I am certain there is hardly a State in which even the banks that are open are not compelled to restrict withdrawals.

Mr. President, here is a very pertinent line in this editorial:

> In your mind the goal of a stronger banking system may justify the wiping out of 5,000 banking institutions.
>
> We are not talking about banks.
>
> We are talking about depositors, human beings, innocent of any wrong, except perhaps too great reliance on the words of their leaders, deprived of their life's savings, their means for health and decency.
> Why should depositors in smaller banks bear the entire burden of cleaning up the business of the banking situation? Why shouldn't it be equalized among all depositors, big and little, in proportion to their deposits?

That is the only wrong that can be charged to them, that they ought to have known that they ought not to put any reliance in the word of the leaders of the Nation. That is the wrong, according to this editorial.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. KING. I ask for information. What proportion of depositors referred to in the editorial were depositors prior to the 4th of March of this year and how many are depositors since then, or whether any who were depositors since then have their deposits in banks which are closed?

Mr. LONG. I think relatively a small part since March 4. I should judge that to be the case, because after March 4 we said that all since then would be paid in full. The crisis, of course, arose before the 4th of March, when the banks were closed. I think that is correct.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further——

Mr. LONG. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator must take into account the fact that whereas a short time ago we had fifty-five billions of deposits in the banks of the United States, approximately fifteen billions were withdrawn. Obviously, with only three and a half billions of gold in the United States, it would be impossible to pay the demands of the depositors.

Mr. LONG. There is no question about that.

Mr. KING. If all the depositors, in their eagerness to withdraw their deposits, had gone to the banks and insisted upon withdrawals, only a limited number could have received their deposits.

Mr. LONG. That is right.

Mr. KING. Under our banking system, all banks may not be liquid. No bank can pay all depositors if a demand is made. I do not like to be critical of the editorial, or critical of our banks; but the fact is that many of the banks in good faith, because they had to make returns upon their deposits in order to pay interest to many of the depositors, had to buy securities; and they took the securities—Government securities and securities of solvent corporations. When the great depression came, however, securities shrank in value almost to the vanishing point, and thus left many of the banks in an insolvent condition. We cannot blame entirely and absolutely those in control of the banks.

Mr. LONG. No.

Mr. KING. It is a situation that calls for a good deal of charity.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. And I know my friend is a very charitable man.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; and I am glad to have the Senator from Utah state that. I tried to state that the other day on the floor of the Senate, though not nearly so lucidly as my friend from Utah does. Those banks are not at fault, because the depreciation was not the banks' depreciation. It was the country's depreciation. It was the failure of America that brought on the bank failures of this country. The failure of the country was largely responsible for the failure of the banks.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But it was the responsibility of the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve banks in setting up during the first week in March a formula which ignored solvency as a rule of reopening action, and insisted that only those banks should operate which were 100 percent liquid. If 100 percent bank liquidity is as impossible as the Senator from Utah indicates—and he is entirely correct—how perfectly absurd and murderous was a rule of action in the midst of this banking crisis which required 100 percent liquidity instead of 100 percent solvency as the basis of renewed bank operations. That was the point at which the malignant initial error was made—malignant from the standpoint of millions of bank depositors throughout the Nation. The tragic error still persists.

Mr. LONG. Every bank that was chartered in this country as being 100 percent liquid was a fraud on the law. The minute they put up a sign and said that bank was 100 percent liquid, they knew that they were deceiving the American people; because, as the Senator from Utah says, in the nature of things there is no such thing as a liquid bank. There cannot be any such thing as a liquid bank. With five or six or seven billion dollars of gold, silver, and printed money to exist on, how can you pay $45,000,000,000 out of $5,000,000,000 of money? It cannot be done, and the officials knew it could not be done.

What they did was to prefer banks. That is what they did. They preferred communities. That is what they did. Knowing that there were none of them able to pay that money out, they picked whatever ones they wanted to, and sent the balance of them into wreckage. That is what they did, and they thought of nobody that had their money in there.

Why, if I had gone out here in the name of the Government and had told my brother of common, lay standing to put his money in the bank, and that he was doing a good, patriotic service, and I had gone out and condemned the man that pulled his money out of the bank as being a hoarder and a man of rapacious characteristics, undertaking to drag down his neighbor's own business, and then I had closed the bank, I certainly never would have felt justified in penalizing the man who had taken me at my word as a leader of the Government in favor of the man who did not and drew his money out in that crisis.

This editorial is so good that I want to read the rest of it. It is not very much longer.

Remember that all the banks were closed by order of the Federal Government, and only certain ones licensed to reopen. Five billions of deposits remain frozen in 5,000 restricted banks by act of the Federal Government.

You can't evade the moral obligation of your Government to the depositors in those banks.

In your mind the goal of a stronger banking system may justify the wiping out of 5,000 banking institutions.

We are not talking about banks.

We are talking about depositors—human beings—innocent of any wrong, except perhaps too great reliance on the words of their leaders, deprived of their life's savings, their means for health and decency.

Why should depositors in smaller banks bear the entire burden of cleaning up the banking situation? Why shouldn't it be equalized among all depositors, big and little, in proportion to their deposits?

That is right. This is the Philadelphia Record. This is one of the forward-looking human institutions we have in the field of journalism in this country today. The Philadelphia Record supported the nomination of Franklin D. Roosevelt. It supported his election. I think it was about the first paper up in that part of the country that came out for President Franklin D. Roosevelt for nomination and for election, and it is still supporting the administration. If Mr. Roosevelt were today listening to institutions like this that nominated and elected him President, instead of calling in the high council and priesthood of financial politics that ruined the previous administration, he would be a whole lot farther down the road of prosperity and sane and sensible government than he is in listening to these recalcitrants.

This paper goes on to say:

Can you adjourn with clear consciences when you know that the depositors in the 100 largest banks have less than 5 percent of their deposits frozen, while depositors in smaller banks average more than 30 percent loss?

If a great wind wrought havoc among the dwellings of this country, your Government would act in the emergency.

Your engineers report many smaller homes so badly damaged that they must be abandoned. Other homes can be repaired. A few larger, more substantial mansions of the wealthy are practically unharmed.

You order work started at once to make as many homes as possible habitable.

What of the homeless citizens whose dwellings are beyond repair?

Would you say to them, "You're just out of luck. We are too busy fixing the houses worth repairing, making them extra strong, in case there is another big wind, to bother where you are going to live, or how?"

Would you presume to tax the homeless citizen for the expense of repairing the other fellow's house?

Would you expect loyalty and patriotism from citizens misused in this way?

Your neglect of the victims of the financial tornado is no less callous and short-sighted.

The obvious method of relief of depositors in restricted and closed banks is an advance of a portion of their money on assignment of their deposits to the Government. The advance of 60 percent on the $8,000,000,000 now tied up in restricted and closed banks would require creation of nearly $5,000,000,000 of new credit by the Government.

This new credit would lower the value of the dollar, and therefore be in the nature of a levy upon the purchasing power of the $38,000,000,000 of deposits in open banks.

Because any move to relieve depositors in closed and restricted banks must largely come from depositors in open banks, we have selfish and sinister opposition to what is so obviously just and proper.

That is the reason we have such overemphasis on balancing the Budget. The moneyed interests hope that this slogan will block creation of new credit, reduction of the value of their swollen dollars.

Creation of $5,000,000,000 of new Government credit by discount of Treasury notes with the Federal Reserve bank might reduce the purchasing power of the dollar as much as 20 percent. Thus depositors in open banks would bear 20 percent of the burden, while their less fortunate brothers, with deposits in restricted and closed banks, would pay a 40 percent penalty.

But the money interests don't want it that way. They want the little fellows to bear all the burden. Worse than that, they want to gain by the other fellow's misfortune, because freezing of $8,000,000,000 of bank deposits tends to increase the purchasing power of the dollars in open banks.

Relief to depositors in closed and restricted banks is dictated by economic expediency as well as by justice. Release of frozen bank deposits would reduce the value of the dollar toward the 1926 value, which is the avowed object of President Roosevelt.

He has made some progress toward that end by suspension of gold payments. Whether he makes higher prices stick depends largely upon whether you restore purchasing power to the masses.

It is time that you ended the rule of the selfish moneyed interests, which brought this country into its present financial plight.

Is this a democracy or a plutocracy?

Your aid or lack of aid to depositors in restricted and closed banks will answer that question.

Mr. President, we have a conference on down here in the Appropriations Committee room now, undertaking to solve this problem. I do not know what they are going to do, but if they come in here and do not give us relief, it is up to this session of Congress to take this matter in its hands. I do not know what we are going to have to do. I do not know just what the rule is, but I know that if we are going to let this session of Congress adjourn and let these people who have been deceived and deluded by the patriotic pleas of everybody, from the President down to the lowest officer, lose their money and let these banks stay closed, thinking of nobody whatever except the big vested interests who have received such backing from the Government that they can stay open whether they are liquid or not liquid, then we are sadly failing in the responsibility of Congress; and I think, furthermore, that we are listening entirely too much to find out what somebody else thinks about this bill.

Let us demand that Congress do its duty. There are men enough in these two Houses, if the bill meets with Executive disapproval, to override the Executive veto if we have a mind and heart here to do justice by the American people.

I do not care what kind of a pronunciamento, ipsi dixit, or anything else, comes from the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. I want to protect the American people. I helped to elect the gentleman who is occupying the White House, on the ground and on the promise and on the platform that he was going to help protect the American people. It is up to us here to put some action through this Congress and put this thing in the form of law and send it up to the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. Then, if the Executive does not see fit to grant his approval, it is up to us to bring the bill back here and override the veto by the vote that is necessary to make it the law. It can be done by this Congress if there is that kind of disapproval.

I have yet to be convinced that the bill is going to be vetoed. I discount seriously the rumors that are circulating around here to the effect that the bill may meet with the veto of the Executive. I do not believe it will. I do not believe he has ever said so, and I do not believe he would do it. In fact, I know he would not do it if I have any mind at all as to what motives would actuate this man in correcting what seems to be a palpable injustice at this time.

So, Mr. President, I am hoping that we shall be able to do something on this banking situation.

EXTENSION OF GASOLINE TAX—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there comes before us now the conference report upon House bill 5040, to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes.

In view of the facts that have been developed on this measure, and in view of the action which was taken at my instance and upon my appeal by the Senate, I cannot permit this conference report to be agreed to without protest, and without expressing my opposition to it.

The bill seeks to fix a tax upon electrical energy for domestic or commercial consumption, and it reads thus:

> There is hereby imposed upon electrical energy sold for domestic or commercial consumption and not for resale a tax equivalent to 3 percent of the price for which so sold, to be paid by the vendor under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe.

Another section of the conference report reads thus:

> No tax shall be imposed under this section upon electrical energy sold to the United States or to any State or Territory, or political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia.

I assume—and in stating that assumption I appeal to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], in charge of this bill—that that means that the vendor of electrical energy to the United States, or to any State, or to any Territory, or any political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia, will be exempted from this tax. That is the construction, is it not, I ask the Senator from Mississippi, which will be placed upon that provision?

Mr. HARRISON. That is my idea as to the construction.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

I specifically call to the attention of those who are here the exemption that thus is made by the conference committee.

Before, sir, discussing the proposition that is involved in this bill, I want to refer very briefly and, I trust, very respectfully, to the manner of legislation which has grown up in this body—a system, sir, which I think at the very earliest opportunity that presents itself should be abrogated and eliminated.

Here was an amendment to an important bill, an amendment which means much to about 100 municipalities in this land. It was adopted by a very considerable majority of the Senate. It was an amendment which exempted, as governmental activities have ever been exempted in the past from tax bills, the municipally owned or publicly owned power plants which generated electricity and sold that electricity to the people.

The amendment, thus agreed to, went to conference. It went to conference—and I say this not in any invidious way—presented by those who were opposed to it, and necessarily, although I have no doubt they did all they could do under the rules of the Senate, under those circumstances an important bit of legislation had ultimately perhaps very little chance.

Mr. President, this is a system which has grown up in this body for which none is responsible, and against which perhaps we ought not too severely to inveigh; nevertheless, it is a system which ought not to be tolerated. Where legislation is passed by the Senate, in conference it ought to be in the hands of those who are friendly to it, rather than in the control of those who are unfriendly to it.

In the past out of that system certain things have resulted which none of us like to recall, and the mode by which legislation in conference is accomplished, and accomplished at variance with the will of the body which passes it, is a system which should not, as I insist, be continued here, and which I trust in the very near future we may be able to abrogate entirely.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. I ask, for information, how the Senator would deal with the situation where, as the Senator knows, in many bills there would be a score or more of controversial items, all of which might be very important, as to which it might be difficult to find a unanimity of vote in the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there is one way in which I would deal with such a situation, and this I suggest, and shall ultimately urge on the Senate through amendment of the rules. If there be an important amendment sponsored by any particular group, I believe that at least a representative of the group sponsoring the amendment, and being in favor of it, should be upon the conference committee. It is a perfectly silly idea to pass legislation here, as I have seen in days gone by, and have in charge of that legislation in conference those who had most bitterly opposed it, and from that very situation I have seen come out of conference, in days gone by, things which were never intended by the Senate. Out of that have come real wrongs against the Senate and against the people of this land.

It was only a year or two ago that an amendment of this sort was agreed to by the Senate and went to conference, only a year or two ago that the Howell amendment, in relation to the tax upon electrical energy, was agreed to in the Senate, and when the Howell amendment got into conference, the leaders of the Senate who were presenting that amendment had all been opposed to it, and the amendment came back here emasculated and practically eliminated from the measure to which it had been attached. In some respects that may have been a good thing, because perhaps it gave to us one of the brightest and one of the best Members who now sits in this body.

However, that was an incident, indeed, wholly an incident, of that measure. The amendment about which I am speaking is an incident, perhaps, and only an incident, of this particular measure, but where the Senate has registered its will, where it has voted by a substantial majority upon a definite governmental policy, that policy ought to be intrusted to its friends, not to its enemies, and its friends, or the representatives of its friends, ought to be permitted to sit upon the conference and see that the particular policy thus adopted receives its just due. So much for the mode of legislation. The other day I remarked that sometime in the far future, perhaps, or perhaps in the near future, I hope to make an endeavor to amend the rules. But we may eliminate that for the moment and come now to the very gist of the matter.

An amendment was added to the bill that was presented here as I have related, by which the municipally owned, publicly owned, power plants were exempted from the tax of 3 cents. I insist that that was a logical thing to do and that it was an appropriate thing to do. I insist that the publicly owned power plants of municipalities which have the energy and which have done the work which was essential in order to construct those plants should be put in such a situation, because of the very character of those power plants, that they would be relieved from taxation under a bill of this character.

It is no new thing, Mr. President, to exempt governmental activities from taxation. It is as old, indeed, as the taxing system itself. There has not been a cooperative organization of farmers or otherwise as to which we have not stood upon this floor and demanded that it should be exempted from any tax bill presented; not one. There has not been any particular cooperative institution involved in any bill which has heretofore been before us but appeals have been not only numerous, but unanimous, on this floor that the cooperative organization should be exempted from a pending tax bill.

Why is that? They were exempted because a cooperative institution—and that is all, indeed, a municipally owned power plant is; a cooperative institution working without thought or hope or suggestion of profit—is working in behalf of the people, for all of the people, and therefore it is dealt with as a governmental institution which should be accorded the privilege, as governmental institutions ever are, of not being taxed.

We would laugh to scorn the individual who would come here and want to tax the Washington Monument. We would say that a man was half insane who came here and endeavored to tax any particular governmental activity in the city of Washington. We would say, just as we say in relation to the taxing of municipally owned power plants, that inherently there rests with the people of this land the right to construct, maintain, operate, and continue service unto the people; and where they are non-profit-making institutions and exercise that inherent right and that inherent power, government has ever recognized them and government has ever undertaken that they should not be subject to taxation as a privately owned institution would be.

These are governmentally constructed enterprises, constructed by the people themselves, and it is something of a paradox to say that what the people themselves erect, construct, maintain, and operate as a necessity for the people, should be taxed in order to put from one hand into the other the money which will be received in behalf of the people. That is the distinction which exists, and it exists and has existed ever since we have been a Government, and ever since tax bills have been written into the laws of the land.

Mr. President, not only is it so that inherently this right and power exist, and that the taxing power should be exercised in favor of that which inherently the people have the right to do and have done in the matter of service for themselves, not only is that so, but, in addition to that, the two diametrically opposed enterprises, one public in character and the other private in character, are of such difference that the decision, whenever they come in conflict, as they do here, should be in favor of that which serves the people and without profit furnishes that which is essential for their well-being.

Mr. President, electricity today has become not only something which is appropriate, convenient, and something which ought to be accorded, it has become today substantially a necessity. From 1900 until the present time the increase in the number of electrical users has been so great, has been of such tremendous proportions, that I do not dare from memory to state the figures. Electricity now to our people is like furnishing water to them, like giving to them any other necessity of life, for it has become, substantially, certainly in some of the cities of the land, an absolute necessity.

Who here would dare tax a municipal water supply? The only reason why we do not tax them is because they are governmental activities, erected, constructed, maintained, and operated by the people, under the inherent right which the people have to maintain themselves, and to have that which constitutes a necessity in the matter of a public utility. Electricity now being in the same category, it ought to be judged and taxation of it ought to be determined by the same rules.

Mr. President, there is only one thing that prevents it, and that is the profit making of the privately owned plant. It is the dividends of the privately owned plant which would tax the municipally owned plant. The people would not do it, of course. The Congress ought not to do it. There are profits on the one hand, no profits on the other. Profits which are made by the private institutions are the controlling force by which, indeed, ultimately it is sought to extend the same rule to the publicly owned plant that, in the first instance, is applied to the privately owned plant.

Taxed is the privately owned plant, it is said, and it is contended this is discriminatory and unjust. Not so. Taxed? To be sure; an involuntary payment, which the privately owned plant makes to the Government, is the tax which is levied upon it. A voluntary payment by the municipally and publicly owned plant is its contribution to government.

There is no difference in the payment itself; the difference is in the manner in which the payment is made. The profit-making institution is required in its involuntary payment to contribute to the Government. The non-profit-making institution has to take every dollar it makes above that which is essential for its maintenance, and put it into the hands of the people themselves. The one may be called a tax; the other may be asserted to be merely a voluntary payment by virtue of the fact that the plant is maintained, owned, and operated wholly by the people themselves.

The methods of the conduct of the two plants are essentially different. The publicly owned plant is underpaid, it may be said, the officers receive but small salaries, and it is run and maintained for the benefit of all the community and solely for the benefit of the people. The privately owned plant, with its pyramiding investment corporations, with its mode of propaganda and the like, runs another course entirely, and the privately owned plant, thus pyramiding its investment and selling its stock, and watering that stock as well, maintains a different existence entirely from the underpaid publicly owned plant, which just serves the people.

The line is drawn sharply on an amendment such as that I have presented here. It is the old, old, age-long fight. It is the struggle between those things which the people have the right to have, and which they would be denied by privately owned institutions, and in the making of money and the paying of dividends the privately owned institution is none too scrupulous, and even worse in its use to prevent the people having what they need and what they want and what is their right. How different are wages, hours of labor, and the like in the publicly owned plants as contrasted with those in the privately owned plants! How different are salaries that are paid by the publicly owned plants compared to the enormous salaries that are paid by the privately owned institutions; and how different are the ideals of a public-welfare enterprise when compared to those of a private, profit-making enterprise! So what legitimate argument can be made in favor of taxing the privately owned plant in the fashion that is sought to be done by this conference report and by the gentlemen who represented the Senate in rendering that conference report unto the Senate?

I will mention some of the little differences that exist. I wonder if Senators realize that there are now about 100 cities—not very large cities, some of them—in the United States that are tax free because they own their power and light plants? That is a fact, and the number is gaining every day. The struggle, of course, is against them; they have to fight against the efforts by the privately owned plants to throttle and hamstring them; and yet the figures show that the privately owned plants have made large dividends and that they have been able during even a period of depression to remain fairly prosperous.

Compare the great Insull organization with a publicly owned plant in a city of ten, fifteen, twenty, or thirty thousand people; compare the one with the other, and then, because the privately owned plant may assert that it pays taxes and the publicly owned plant does not, shall we yield to their blandishments or to the specious arguments that they make and tax this public institution that is designed to administer to its people, and to its people alone?

We have had this fight out in the State from which I come; it is not over. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty" with those individuals who believe as we do regarding these public utilities. We cease our activities for a moment; they cease their activities never. They are able, of course, in the State from which I come, in some instances, I am sorry to say, to pay the election expenses of some legislators, and they are able to maintain their very large and very richly endowed lobbyists wherever there is public work to be done. We who believe in the people after all, we who think that, after all, such things as are necessities should be furnished by the people for themselves, and that they have a right to go forward as they see fit in that regard, relax our vigilance at times, and only sporadically are we aroused. The others never forget, and they never forget for a single instant or under any circumstances.

Here I read from an article by a gentleman of standing and probity in our State, Mr. Louis Bartlett, who was mayor of the city of Berkeley at one time, some little interesting things of what may have occurred or what has occurred in California.

(At this point Mr. JOHNSON yielded to Mr. LA FOLLETTE to present an amendment to House bill 5755, the industrial recovery bill, and also to Mr. NORRIS to submit a report from the Committee on the Judiciary on Senate bill 752, relative to the jurisdiction of district courts, etc., which appear under appropriate headings.)

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska if the measure which he has just reported is what is known as the "jurisdictional bill"?

Mr. NORRIS. It is.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is a very interesting measure, and I am going to digress for 2 minutes merely to tell the Senate about it. I have had pending before the Judiciary Committee for a year and a half now a bill which would require a public utility contesting a rate which had been fixed by the public-service commission of any State to exhaust its rights in the State courts; and I would preclude the public utilities from going into the Federal court, except, as a last resort, to the Supreme Court of the United States. I would preclude them from having two bites at a cherry as they now do have. The course now pursued, which will be pursued no longer if we can secure the enactment of the bill, is that the public utility goes before the public-service commission of a particular State; the State commission hears the testimony at very great length and, after the commission of the State has heard the testimony and is about to render its decision, then the public utility goes into the State court for injunctive relief. It pursues that injunctive relief until it becomes obvious that a decision may be rendered against it, and then it hops over into the Federal court and makes the same plea; and, because of diversity of citizenship, the Federal court takes jurisdiction and disregards all the work that has been done and all the expense that has been incurred by the public-service commissions of the various States; and the case is interminably then in the Federal court. I would deprive them of the later procedure, and make them go on through the State court where once they have invoked the relief which they seek.

That is just another angle of this question. Regulation by a State commission is a difficult thing at best. I do not know whether or not Senators have read the last Supreme Court decision that involved the Los Angeles case. If they have, and if they are able to determine from it all that is decided, they will have all the wisdom, the acuteness, and the ingenuity of the famed Philadelphia lawyer. Difficult it is to deal with utility companies; difficult it is to deal with them in the fashion in which the service commissions have sought to deal with them. They enter our politics; all of us know that; they enter our schools, the wickedness of which I have never ceased, indeed, to denounce; they enter our churches; they enter our women's clubs, and they hire men in our colleges to preach their doctrine, and God knows what else they do with the coin that is theirs.

Here is an opportunity where we have a line of demarcation plain before us. On the one hand, the people's right to maintain a governmental agency to minister to its people, not for profit, and, on the other hand, the privately owned institution paying its enormous dividends and its extraordinary salaries.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Inasmuch as the Senator has referred to the bill which I have just reported, will he permit me to call attention to a case that is described in the report on that bill, exemplifying just what the Senator has said about delay and about pursuing two different remedies by utility companies?

Mr. JOHNSON. I am glad to yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. The case described in the report occurred in the State of Montana, where the public-service commission, of its own motion, took up the question of the rates charged by a utility company for gas in the city of Shelby, Mont. The utility company asked for and obtained a hearing before the Public Service Commission of Montana. The investigation ran over a considerable time, in order to get evidence, I presume, to find the value of the utility company's property. At the close of the hearing the public-service commission fixed a rate that was unsatisfactory to the company, and the company appealed it, and went into the District Court of Montana, where the case was tried. The district court held with the utility company and reversed the order of the public-service commission.

Then the public-service commission appealed the case from the District Court of Montana to the Supreme Court of Montana. It was tried there and finally decided by the Supreme Court of Montana, reversing the district court and upholding the order made by the public-service commission. It was a unanimous decision of the five judges of that court. Later on a motion for a rehearing was made by the utility company. That was granted, and they went into the Supreme Court of Montana and reargued the case. It was decided by the Supreme Court of Montana, again reversing the district court and reinstating the order of the Public Service Commission of Montana.

The mandate of the Supreme Court of Montana went to the District Court of Montana; but before the mandate was carried out, reinstating the order for the rates fixed by the Public Service Commission of Montana, the utility company dismissed their case; but prior to its dismissal they commenced a case de novo in the Federal district court and secured an injunction from the Federal district court restraining the public-service commission from putting its order into effect.

The public-service commission then asked that the case be dismissed in the Federal court. The Federal district court refused to dismiss it. The State commission took an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the order of the District Court of Montana, and held in effect that the company had a right to pursue their remedy in both courts at the same time. Then they went back to Montana, and after another long delay the case was tried by the Federal District Court of Montana, which decided in favor of the utility company, and made the injunction permanent. Then the commission again appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and sometime during this year the Supreme Court of the United States took it up, and after argument reversed the Federal district court and reinstated the order of the commission that was made just about 6 years before.

So after weary years of travel, going up to the Supreme Court of Montana then back again and up again to the Supreme Court of Montana, then starting at the bottom and going up to the Supreme Court of the United States and back again, and then up to the Supreme Court again and back again, we have the same order that we started with made by the public-service commission 6 years earlier. It may be that the order now will not apply to the conditions that exist. Many of the people who engaged in that suit have died of old age while the proceedings were going on; but in the meantime the utility company was secure during all these years by reason of the injunction, that we hope will soon be set aside and the original order put into effect.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Nebraska, because the bill which he has reported is an extremely important one. Twenty-four public-utility commissions in as many States have written me in respect to the bill, and are anxious for it to pass. It is exactly the sort of bill that the President of the United States, when he was Governor of New York, praised in the highest terms, and hoped would ultimately become a law.

Mr. President, before proceeding to read from Mr. Bartlett's article let me refer to what I recalled in the first words that were spoken in this argument this afternoon. The conferees in their report have written:

> (c) No tax shall be imposed under this section upon electrical energy sold to the United States, or to any State or Territory, or political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia.

Why? Because a governmental function that was engaged and that was involved in that kind of exemption. That could be the only reason; and yet when it comes the other way around and we have an exemption for a governmentally owned electric plant, the governmentally owned electric plant is to pay the 3-percent tax and is denied any exemption. If we sell electric current to the Government, if we sell it to a State, to a city, to a county, or to a district, an exemption is accorded; but if we make it governmentally and we use it governmentally for our people, it is to be taxed. The very principle for which I am contending is recognized by the conferees who denied it to a governmentally owned non-profit-making electric plant in a municipality or otherwise.

Let me pursue just a moment the methods of compensation of our great public utilities. In a recent investigation before the Railroad Commission of the State of California the activities of gentlemen who are running the privately owned plant were illustrated by the number of clubs to which they belong. This is just an incident. It is related by Mr. Bartlett in his recent article in the Nation. The query was, Who paid for all the memberships in the various organizations. It was ascertained that they were paid for by the utility and charged to operating expenses. The company in question paid the following club dues and expenses for its employees: 22 in the Commercial Club, 5 in the Exchange Club, 4 in the Rotary Club. Can anyone wonder about propaganda and the manufacture of public opinion when one single utility in our State was paying for these memberships in the various organizations that were manufacturing the public opinion of our particular territory?

I continue: One membership in the Round Table. They ought to rebel and insist that they are being discriminated against in favor of the Exchange Club and the Rotary Club. Five in the Lions Club; 3 in the Bakersfield Club, which is outside of the territory the company serves; 1 in the Optimists Club, 4 in the Engineers' Club, 3 in the University-Sequoia Club, 1 in the Businessmen's Club, 1 in the Petroleum Club, 1 in the Kiwanis Club. Every Kiwanis member ought to rise in his might and dignity and demand that they have just as many memberships from a public utility as the Rotary Club or the Lions Club. They ought not to tolerate any such discrimination as that.

The list continues: 4 in the Fresno City Farm Center, 7 in the Ad Club, 1 in the American Legion, 1 in the Dairymen's Club, 1 in the Press Club. There was a fatal blunder!

"Besides being a member of many of these clubs, the president of the company, which operates in the vicinity of Fresno, 200 miles from San Francisco, had the rate payers pay his club dues in the California Club, Commercial Club, Family Club, and Bohemian Club of San Francisco, as well as in other clubs lumped together under the title 'Miscellaneous.' One wonders when he found the time to earn his salary of $22,900 a year."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Does the list include a poker club and a church club?

Mr. JOHNSON. As to the latter I could not say. As to the former I think a wise discrimination would have been exhibited if there had been a membership there. [Laughter.]

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I am a bit jealous on behalf of the great State of Washington. I want the Senator from California to know that his own State is not the only one where the benevolent and patriotic 100-percent-American Power Trust has invaded everything in sight.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator is certainly right.

Mr. BONE. Out in the great State of Washington, the great Evergreen State, the benevolent Power Trust has invaded everything in sight—churches and clubs and societies of all kinds. The boys have gone into everything that requires dues, where they could be generous and help pay the expenses of the organization. If there is any institution of the kind in my State which the Power Trust has not permeated, I am not aware of it now.

I merely wanted the Senator from California to know that his State is not the only one that receives the attention of the Power Trust.

Mr. JOHNSON. Upon the roll of honor of States to which these gentlemen pay such marked attention, I will see that Washington follows California! [Laughter.]

Mr. BONE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there is another aspect to this as well. The salaries we pay in our municipally owned public utilities, of course, are small. They amount to but little, because we are running close to the wind in order that we may do our duty by our people and that it may be possible for us to bring down exorbitant electric rates. But not so with the gentlemen who run their private concerns. Strangely enough, the gentlemen who run the private concerns and receive their salaries are the heads, generally—certainly the directing geniuses—of our economy societies and of our taxpayers' associations. They preach economy with an eloquence that seldom can be found, certainly not in this individual or in this body. They preach economy for everybody else and for every single activity in life save their own.

The list of salaries of over $5,000 a year recently reported to the California Legislature by the railroad commission is interesting, to say the least, says Mr. Bartlett. A. F. Hockenbeamer, president of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., the largest electric utility in the State, receives $75,000 a year, or enough to pay the seven salaries of the supreme court, at the figure the California Taxpayers Association thinks just, for a period of 1 year and 4 months. Paul Shoup, president of the Southern Pacific Railway Co., listed at $100,000, reported by the press to have been kicked upstairs at a salary of $125,000, gets enough to support the entire supreme court for 2 years. Other presidential salaries reported are: Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co., $60,000; Southern California Gas Co., $50,000; Western Pacific Railroad, $43,500; Southern California Edison Co., $68,500. The total of salaries of over $11,500 paid by the last-named company would pay the reduced salaries of the seven supreme court justices of California for 7 years.

Oh, it is a fine thing that they have. Then somebody will have the audacity to stand up here and prate of the poor, miserable, hard-bitten, privately owned companies which require the charity of the Government of the United States and demand for their protection that the little plants of all the people in the little cities shall be taxed to the limit. The same people will be heard to say that it is discriminatory when we have a superintendent receiving $5,000 or $6,000 or $7,000 from a publicly owned plant, while the president of a privately owned plant receives a salary of $75,000; that it is discriminatory if a governmental agency like the electric plant that supplies its people shall not be taxed, just as we do not tax the cooperative in farming areas and just as we do not tax any other aspect of various public agencies that do work for the people, and for the people alone.

Mr. President, I have said enough on the subject to make anyone understand the difference that exists. It is a fundamental difference—this difference for which we fight today. Of course we recognize the difficulties of sending back to conference a bill brought here from conference, but we ought to do it. We ought to do it because it is right. We ought to do it because we deal with a governmental agency inherently with the right to serve its people and to serve them as governmental agencies do and which ought not to be penalized by the Government of the United States and ought not to be taxed.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will send the bill back to conference and will refuse absolutely to agree to the conference report.

REDUCTION OF VETERANS' COMPENSATION

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I agree with every word uttered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. I wish for a moment to advert to another subject, though one which equally concerns the honor and dignity of the Senate.

On Friday last this body adopted an amendment to the independent offices appropriation bill allowing the President to make a reduction of not to exceed 25 percent in cases of veterans disabled in service connection, as opposed to the economy bill which set no limit on his power of reduction.

Since that time the metropolitan press of the country has almost unanimously condemned the action of the Senate. Every newspaper which is controlled or owned by the great interests has come out with editorials denouncing the action of the Senate and decrying the motives which impelled the Senate to act.

We are told over and over again that only a few cases have been treated with brutality and barbarism and that in the majority of cases the Veterans' Administration have used good judgment in the way in which they have administered the cuts.

Mr. President, no one on this floor has attempted to defend the action of the Director of the Budget or of the Veterans' Administration in the way that individual cases have been handled. I refer to cases which have been brought to our attention by numerous Senators on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I think the public sentiment of the country is overwhelmingly in favor of the action taken by the Senate.

Mr. CUTTING. I think so, too; but the Senator from Massachusetts will agree with me that we would not get that impression from reading the editorials in the metropolitan press.

Mr. WALSH. I am sorry to say I have to agree with the Senator; but, as for myself, I have not received a single, solitary letter of criticism of my vote in that matter.

Mr. CUTTING. Neither have I.

Mr. WALSH. The only criticism I have heard is that we delayed too long in acting.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, we can go on quoting individual cases until doomsday, and we still will not be able to get away from the possible criticism that the cases quoted are exceptional.

My own judgment is that the cases quoted are so far from being exceptional that they may be considered typical, and that the cases in which veterans were drawing compensation for undeserved causes are extremely few and far between, although they again have been magnified by the press as though they were typical and characteristic cases.

Mr. President, I come from a State to which tuberculars are sent from all over the country. The calculations which some of us have made show that somewhere between three and five thousand of these men will be thrown out of hospitals, or will cease to get the compensation which they are now getting, on the 1st of July. Who is going to take care of these men? They are not native New Mexicans. They come from every State in the Union. My State has not the financial resources to take care of them. We are going to try to do what we can.

The Governor of my State is attempting to find out precisely how many of these men will have to be taken care of by the State of New Mexico. In order to do that, the Governor of New Mexico recently wrote to the Veterans' Administrator in Washington asking him for a list of the men now drawing compensation in my State. That reasonable request—reasonable, as it seems to me—was refused. There is only one explanation for such a refusal, and that is that those who are administering the Bureau, under the direction of the Director of the Budget, are unwilling to have the people of the United States know the real facts.

Without that information, the State of New Mexico is proceeding on its own to get the information which it needs. It has to get it here and there, from little town and little village and little ranch house. We are being severely hampered in obtaining that information.

I received today a communication from the Adjutant of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War at Fort Bayard, which, as Senators know, is a large tubercular hospital. This adjutant, Mr. Doty—whom I know personally and who is a man of high standing—tells me that he has already contacted 50 men in the hospital. Those 50 men were contacted at random.

Of those 50, this investigation shows that 4 men were not drawing compensation at all; that 4 of them were Spanish-American War veterans who had not yet been notified as to any change in their compensation. Of the remainder, one was cut the small amount of 12½ percent. Every other one of the 50 was cut more than 50 percent—1 of them 51 percent; 1 of them 66⅔ percent; 1 of them 75 percent; 1 of them 77½ percent; 2 of them 85 percent; one of them 87½ percent; 7 of them 94 percent; and 27 of them, more than half the total number contacted, were cut 100 percent.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Referring to those percentages, the Senator is giving the percentage of cut?

Mr. CUTTING. The percentage of cut.

Mr. CONNALLY. And not the percentage of compensation that they still receive?

Mr. CUTTING. No. Those who were cut 100 percent will receive zero in compensation.

Mr. CONNALLY. If a veteran was getting $100, and got a 75-percent cut, he would get $25 now?

Mr. CUTTING. Exactly.

Mr. CONNALLY. That illustrates it.

Mr. CUTTING. So it will be seen that out of these 50, if we are to consider them typical—and I think they are typical of the condition in tubercular hospitals all over the country—54 percent were cut 100 percent. They were cut totally in their compensation. Eighty percent of them were cut more than 75 percent.

I ask that the entire table, as reported by Mr. Doty, be printed in the RECORD at this point of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

JUNE 2, 1933.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have contacted some 50 patients in this hospital for the purpose of determining the results of the cuts under the proposed economy law. They are compiled herewith for your information:

Number of men	Drew, old law	Cut to—	Percentage of cut
3	$100.00	$0.00	100
1	96.00	.00	100
1	90.00	.00	100
3	80.00	.00	100
1	56.00	.00	100
1	50.00	.00	100
1	40.00	.00	100
4	12.00	.00	100
1	125.00	15.00	87½
7	100.00	6.00	94
2	100.00	15.00	85
1	80.00	15.00	77½
1	26.00	6.00	75
1	60.00	20.00	66⅔
1	72.00	60.00	12½
1	50.00	24.00	51

4 drew nothing; 4 Spanish-American War veterans not notified; 12 draw $40 disability allowance. This class of beneficiary will probably be cut off entirely.

NOTE.—These figures show you there is no such thing as a 20-percent cut.

MICHAEL A. J. DOTY.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me inquire of the Senator whether or not those cases were service-connected cases.

Mr. CUTTING. Of those who were cut 100 percent—that is, of the 27—15 were service-connected and 12 came under the disability allowance. The partial cuts were all made in service-connected cases.

In view of the fact that it has been repeatedly represented that service-connected cases would not be cut more than 20 percent, I commend to the attention of the Senate the note which this adjutant of the Disabled American Veterans puts at the end of his communication:

NOTE.—These figures show you there is no such thing as a 20-percent cut.

Mr. President, in this connection I should like to read a few words from an editorial which appeared in today's Philadelphia Record:

The American people are lucky that Lewis Douglas was not Director of the Budget during the World War.

If he had been, the Germans would have taken Paris, Wilhelm II would still rule at Berlin, and the United States would face a formidable foe across the Atlantic.

Because there were no Douglases in the Government or the Treasury, we did not stop to balance the Budget. We went ahead and won the war.

The article goes on to show, in rough figures, that in 1917 the Federal receipts were slightly over $1,000,000,000, and the expenditures were over $2,000,000,000; that in 1918 the receipts were $4,000,000,000, and the expenditures close to $14,000,000,000; that in 1919 we received $4,500,000,000, and spent $19,000,000,000; and, as the Philadelphia Record goes on:

Had Lewis Douglas been Director of the Budget during the war, General Pershing's famous remark would have been changed to read:

"Lafayette, we'll be there as soon as we balance the Budget."

[Laughter.]

Millions of young men leaving their dearest ones to shed their blood for their country would have been told:

"Awfully nice of you to risk your lives, but don't expect us to risk our balanced Budget to help you in sickness or old age when you get back."

For Lewis Douglas, Director of the Budget, knows only one idea.

The Budget must be balanced.

The jobless may go hungry, veterans may be in grave need, depositors in closed banks may be penniless but the Budget must be balanced.

Even if balancing the Budget only causes more deflation, intensifies depression, slows up business.

I shall not read the whole article, which ends:

Lucky for us that we did not fight the war as we are now fighting the depression.

Let's fight the depression as we fought the war.

Mr. President, I ask that the entire editorial be published in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of Tuesday, June 6, 1933]

"LAFAYETTE, WE'LL BE THERE AS SOON AS WE BALANCE THE BUDGET"

The American people are lucky that Lewis Douglas was not Director of the Budget during the World War.

If he had been, the Germans would have taken Paris, Wilhelm II would still rule at Berlin, and the United States would face a formidable foe across the Atlantic.

Because there were no Douglases in the Government or the Treasury we did not stop to balance the Budget. We went ahead and won the war.

In 1917 our Federal receipts were $1,124,325,000 and our expenditures $2,086,042,000.

In 1918 our Federal receipts were $4,180,425,000, but we spent $13,791,908,000.

In 1919 our receipts were $4,654,381,000—and we spent $18,952,141,000.

Our expenditures in those 3 years were almost four times as great as our receipts.

* * * * * * *

Had Lewis Douglas been Director of the Budget during the war General Pershing's famous remark would have been changed to read:

"Lafayette, we'll be there as soon as we balance the Budget."

Millions of young men leaving their dearest ones to shed their blood for their country would have been told:

"Awfully nice of you to risk your lives, but don't expect us to risk our balanced Budget to help you in sickness or old age when you get back."

For Lewis Douglas, Director of the Budget, knows only one idea.

The Budget must be balanced.

The jobless may go hungry, veterans may be in grave need, depositors in closed banks may be penniless, but the Budget must be balanced.

Even if balancing the Budget only causes more deflation, intensifies the depression, slows up business.

No falser economic principle ever governed a nation in a great crisis; a crisis as great as war.

The Hoover administration, in attempting to balance the Budget, at least had the excuse that it wished to keep the country on the gold standard.

But the Roosevelt administration insists on trying to balance the Budget, even though we are off the gold standard, even though the overturning of the gold fetish has left us free to fight the depression as we fought the war.

It presents the spectacle of the greatest and richest Nation on earth balking at $170,000,000 for its veterans, turning its back on depositors in the banks it closed, cutting its underpaid employees 15 percent.

The balance-the-Budget delusion threatens to undermine public confidence in the Roosevelt administration.

The only way to balance the Budget is to increase the national income.

The only way to increase the national income is to put more buying power in the hands of the masses.

The only way to put more buying power in the hands of the masses is by creating new credit to help jobless, veterans, and depositors in closed banks.

To attempt to revive business by piling on new taxes and decreasing Government expenditures is like trying to get a horse and wagon uphill by putting new loads in the wagon.

The Federal Budget cannot and will not be balanced until the Nation's economic balance is restored.

Attempts to balance the Budget in hard times, as John Maynard Keynes points out, can only end in a budget like this:

Receipts, 0; expenditures, 0.

Mr. Hoover's attempts to balance the Budget only resulted, as the Record predicted, in making business worse and finally forcing us off the gold standard.

Mr. Roosevelt's advisers of the Douglas type are driving him to similar disaster.

Present rises in the security and commodity markets are in anticipation of inflation.

Failure to inflate will depress those prices again, as surely as it did in England.

Lucky for us that we did not fight the war as we are now fighting the depression.

Let's fight the depression as we fought the war.

EXTENSION OF GASOLINE TAX—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word about the conference report dealing with the matter of a tax on publicly owned power systems.

The report of the conference committee strikes from the measure, as passed by the Senate, the protection and exemption given to municipally owned plants in the bill.

The senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has so completely and so thoroughly expressed my own attitude of mind toward this problem that I do not care to repeat any of his arguments. I merely wish to say that they wholly express my own attitude on the subject.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one thing that has a distinct bearing on this question of a tax on publicly owned power systems.

Some 3 or 4 years ago a rate expert in the city of Seattle joined with me and we made some comparisons of light and power charges in the city of Seattle, Wash., with those in a city in this section of the country comparable in size to Seattle. This will entertain the Senator from California, because it so forcibly illustrates the force of his argument.

We found that if the people of the city of Seattle had been compelled to pay for electric energy, all schedules combined, the same average prices that were being exacted from the people of this eastern city by a private power company, the charges for electric energy would have added over $11,000,000 a year to the light and power bills in the city of Seattle, which has a publicly owned power system; and that $11,000,000, which was literally gouged out of the pocketbooks of the light and power consumers in the eastern city, was as much as or more than the entire tax budget of the city of Seattle that year.

In other words, the people of the city of Seattle in one year, by the cheap light and power rates of that city, saved enough money to run the city without the levy of a dollar of tax. If they had cared to raise their light rates to the level of the eastern city and utilize that money for the purpose of doing away with taxation, they could have done so. But they did what all cities with publicly owned power systems strive to do; that is, the simple, elemental, and wholly desirable thing of giving the people the lowest possible light and power rates.

In my own city of Tacoma we are giving our people an average price for electric energy of a little over 1 cent a kilowatt-hour. The average in the United States is between 5 and 6 cents. If my city of Tacoma chose to make a profit-making venture out of our light and power system, we could, from the revenues of the light system, run the city without the levy of a dollar of city tax. But we are giving our people the advantage of cheap light and power, and as a consequence we probably have more electric ranges per capita and more of the accessories that make life sweeter and pleasanter and happier for the mass of the people, for the housewife in particular, than any other large city. We can make it possible for the citizen there even to heat his home, if he wants to, by electricity. The housewife can turn a switch and have at her disposal every agency which the scientific achievements of this age have given to us.

Life has become fuller and sweeter and happier out there because we are doing that; and now we are to be penalized under this bill because we have done that very humane, that very just thing which cements men to their governments!

If there was ever a time in the history of this country when we should attempt to cement to this thing we call "government" the people themselves, grapple them to government with hooks of steel, now is the time, because it is the last agency to which they can turn in their hour of trouble and perplexity.

Because of that, I am fearful that we are making a bad mistake in striking this protection from these public plants that are not being operated for profit, but are being operated solely for service to the people.

Mr. President, the report of the conference committee wholly strikes from the measure the provision exempting publicly owned electric power plants from the tax. The Senators will recall the extensive and illuminating debate which occurred on this floor when the provision exempting publicly owned plants was adopted here. It was pointed out then that the publicly owned plants are mutual, non-profit-making instrumentalities of local government.

I do not know why the conferees struck out this provision. Had I thought that the conference report would include the elimination of this provision, I should have submitted to the conference committee certain information which proves conclusively: First, that failure to exempt public-owned plants is in effect a tax upon aid to the destitute; second, that the private power companies, by the operation of the law and the rulings of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, have succeeded in securing a preference which would hardly be offset by exempting publicly owned plants from the operation of this bill.

Let me read to the Senate a letter received from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on May 16, and I call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi particularly to this communication. The letter is in answer to one of my own, in which I ask why the Reconstruction Finance Corporation made money available for the payment of individual electric-light bills to private power companies but refused to do as much for those of our citizens who are unable to pay their bills to publicly owned light systems. This is what the Reconstruction Finance Corporation replied:

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION,
Washington, May 16, 1933.

Hon. HOMER T. BONE,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BONE: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of May 13, 1933, in which you enclosed a letter from the commissioner of public utilities of Tacoma, Wash., relative to the use of funds made available by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for destitution relief in the payment of light and water charges for destitute persons.

As you know, the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932 provided that the moneys advanced under title I thereof should merely be supplementary to those provided by the State and local communities.

The Corporation has taken the position that in the case of municipally owned light and water plants it would not seem within the spirit of the law for these funds to be used in paying the city to care for its own destitute, which would be the result were these moneys used in paying charges of the kind referred to.

Of course, the Corporation has no way of securing these services from privately owned companies other than by paying for them and in cities where these public utilities are not owned by the city there is no method of providing these essentials for destitute persons except by payment therefor.

Very truly yours,
FRED C. CROXTON,
Assistant to the Directors.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not entirely clear that I followed the letter as understandingly as I should have. Do I understand that the letter from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation indicates that they deny any relief to publicly owned utilities, while granting relief to privately owned utilities?

Mr. BONE. That is the substance of the letter, and I will send the letter to the Senator to peruse while I finish my remarks, so that he may note what it says. I should be glad to have the Senator comment on it when I shall have finished.

Mr. JOHNSON. We ought to promote these gentlemen, I think.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, it will be noticed from this that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation takes the position that publicly owned light plants ought to furnish light to their customers whether or not they get paid by the customers, but that Government money may be used to pay the light bills of the destitute, if the light is furnished by a private company. As a result of this position of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, adoption of the conference report would mean the placing of a tax on aid to the destitute. Publicly owned plants would not only be compelled to serve those who cannot pay for the service but would be compelled to pay a tax to the Federal Government for giving free—or perhaps not getting paid for—the same sort of service for which Government money is provided for the private companies.

Mr. President, adoption of the conference report, with exemption of publicly owned plants omitted, will be the rankest sort of discrimination in favor of privately owned utility companies. It would tax local government for taking care of its own destitute, while it would leave Government money available for private operators furnishing the same service to the destitute.

I move that the conference report be recommitted, and I urge upon the conferees on the part of the Senate, in view of the rulings of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation making a preference for privately owned utilities, to help to balance the scales by doing everything in their power to induce the conferees of the other House to agree to the original Senate provision affecting the publicly owned plants.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington to recommit the report to the committee of conference.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I should like to have a quorum present, and should like to have a roll call vote on my motion.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not make the point of no quorum now. I think there is a quorum present.

Mr. President, it is always difficult to defeat a conference report. Since it is impossible to amend it, it is necessary to take it as a whole, or reject it as a whole. I dislike very much to feel as though it were my duty to vote against the pending conference report solely upon the ground of what the report contains relating to taxation of publicly owned, municipal electric-light plants.

It is generally believed, and has been so held, I understand, by the Supreme Court of the United States, that Congress has no constitutional right to tax a State, or a county, or a municipality, or any of the governmental activities of any of such subdivisions. Yet in this particular instance we are levying a direct tax against every municipal corporation in the United States which makes its own electricity and supplies it to its own citizens.

It would be exactly the same if we levied a tax upon every municipality for the amount of revenue it received for the sale of water from a publicly owned system of water distribution. Almost every municipality now owns its own water system. There was a time, years ago, when very few of them owned their water systems. Water is known to be a necessity of human life, but it is not necessary that people should get water through a municipal plant. It can be obtained otherwise. Electricity now, in this civilized age, is as much of a necessity in the ordinary home as is the supply of water from the city, and we propose now to tax every municipality which supplies its own people with electricity.

Mr. President, it seems to me that if the Supreme Court should follow the reasoning which brought it to the conclusion that we have no power to tax a subdivision of Government, they would necessarily have to hold that this provision was unconstitutional. But I prefer to argue the matter from a different standpoint. While it seems to me clear that it is unconstitutional if the prior decisions of the Supreme Court are to be followed, yet there is a better reason why we ought to refrain from this method of taxation.

A municipality which supplies its own citizens with electricity does so for exactly the same reason which leads the municipality to supply its own citizens with water. Electricity is a human necessity in the modern home. It is cheaper and more economical to supply the citizens of a city through the instrumentality of a plant which covers the entire city than it would be to let each family supply itself from individual wells, in the case of water, or from other private sources, in the case of electricity. In neither case is a citizen compelled to take the supply offered him by the municipality. The citizen may take water from the municipality or may get it in some other way. He can take electricity from the municipal plant, or he can get electricity in some other way, or go without electricity.

The municipality supplies its citizens with electricity to enable its people to escape from the clutches of monopoly. It is because the municipality wants to give to its people cheaper and better service in the matter of this modern necessity of human existence. There is no other reason. We are to tax them now, if this conference report is agreed to, for doing that thing. We are to make it more difficult for them to supply their people with a necessity of human existence. We are to make it more difficult for them to give to their people cheaper electricity and better service.

Mr. President, suppose a municipal plant, if this report shall be agreed to and the bill enacted, shall supply its own people with electricity upon the streets of the city. We will penalize them for doing so. We will tax them for performing a public service. We will tax them for doing something which every modern city in our present civilization must do.

The idea of getting electricity through the instrumentality of municipal plants, as I have said, is for the purpose of supplying the citizens of the municipality with this necessity of modern existence. There is no reason on earth why we should tax a municipality for making electricity which supplies its streets and thoroughfares any more than that we should tax the municipality on the amount of money it pays to its mayor, its policemen, or any of its officials, and no one will contend for a moment that we ought to do that, or that we have any constitutional right to do it.

It is said, in defense of this proposal, or at least I suppose it has been said, although it has not been said here, because so far no defense of this particular provision has been made, that it would be unfair to tax the privately owned institution which makes a profit out of its business and not tax the municipal plant which makes no profit, and which in many cases, as the Senator from California has said, pays the taxes of the municipality.

Mr. President, lest we shed too many crocodile tears over the hardships of the private power companies, let me say that if these privately owned corporations, the Morgan companies, the United Corporation, which Morgan controls, the holding company which supplies more than one half of the electricity consumed in the homes of the United States; if companies like the Insull Co., for instance; the Southern Commonwealth Holding Co.; the Alabama Power Co.; the Tennessee Light & Power Co.; the Potomac Electric Power Co., all of the great combinations united in the greatest monopoly of modern times, would withdraw their agencies, discharge their secret envoys who have entered the lodge rooms, the churches, the Kiwanis clubs, the commercial clubs, the women's organizations, and other kinds of organizations, withdraw their emissaries who, through stealth, are trying to practice deception upon the American people; if they would stop their propaganda, and save the expense which they now incur in the effort to control the municipal political convention, the county political convention, the district political convention, the State political convention, and, last but not least, the great national conventions of our country, they would be able to pay this tax and never feel it.

They are spending more money now, Mr. President, for the contamination of the youth of our land, for instilling into the minds of the coming generations poisonous doctrines, false doctrines, against municipally owned power plants, than it would cost them to pay the tax and stay where they belong—out of politics. We all know that; their political activity is no secret.

We all know that in the two last great Republican National Conventions they dominated, and they came very near dominating the last Democratic National Convention. One loses his breath when he thinks of the narrow escape. If it had not been for the man who is now Vice President of the United States, and who every day for a portion of the time graces the Presiding Officer's chair with his presence, withdrawing at the psychological moment, Franklin D. Roosevelt would not be in the White House today; there would be a Power Trust Democrat there. I am not telling the Senate anything it does not know. I am not giving them any news; they know it is true.

How much did it cost? Every cent was paid by those at the firesides of millions of homes, by those who had nothing to say except to foot the bill, although it may have been contributed in pennies in millions of instances. The great power and utility combinations held the country by the throat; they were able to demand and the country had to deliver.

I think I have shown how they have spent millions of dollars of their money. They are interested in every congressional contest; in every senatorial contest; in every contest over the governorship of every State in the Union. They have emissaries dominating colleges and college professors and State legislatures; they spend every year in this unlawful business hundreds of millions of dollars which they have taken from the people of the United States, money which they have drawn from every fireside and from every home. They have the money they have thus acquired with which to pay these taxes many times over, and then, contrary to what they are now doing, they might be doing an honest, legitimate, patriotic business.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. I have never heard the Senator mention in the course of his addresses on this subject the fact that the private utility companies litigate at the expense of the public. In other words, they have the right to charge into operating expenses the costs of litigation. They may in any kind of a case hire all the experts they want to hire, and all the lawyers they desire, and put the expense in their operating costs. Even though they lose the lawsuit, they can fight a dozen times, and their expenses are assessed in their operating costs.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I have the floor, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I should like to suggest also to the Senator from Louisiana that this shell game is a great deal better for the utility companies than he suggests. There never has been any shell game like it from the beginning of time. They not only add such expenses to their operating costs but they are clever enough to add them into their rate base and thus make the people pay interest and dividends forever on all this manipulation. They go beyond anything the Senator from Nebraska has ever suggested in any statement he has made.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, Mr. President; in the case that I referred to when I interrupted the Senator from California, and which Senators will find mentioned in the prepared report on the bill reported by me this afternoon, if it shall be printed by that time, the litigation traveled up and down the pathway from Shelby, Mont., to the Supreme Court of Montana, back again and up again and back again, and then to the Supreme Court of the United States and up again and back again and up the second time and back the next time, costing an almost unlimited amount of money to the people who pay in that case for gas; but it is the same outfit that owns electric light and power plants. It was the people who paid the expenses on both sides in that very expensive litigation. They not only paid in the way of increased rates for the attorneys and the experts and their assistants who were working for the utility company but they paid in the way of increased taxes for their own servants, their own attorneys, their own experts whom they utilized in making preparation for the lawsuit and in trying it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I think it is a fair statement to say that municipalities and States litigate with utility companies in this kind of a way and under this kind of handicap. I remember a case where a public-utility company spent over $200,000 for the estimates alone, whereas the entire appropriation for the State body, including the salary of the members of the commission for that year undertaking to fight the private utility, was $21,000. One concern spent over two hundred thousand and some odd dollars in preparation of one case alone, and the State commission had to fight them with an appropriation to the commission for all expenses amounting to $21,000. By accident, the State won that case, strictly upon technicalities alone, because it could not have met the other side and made the estimates and necessary preparation for that amount of money. Under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the value of the property in its present state, less depreciation as determined from the estimates, was the controlling value, necessitating, if we were to fight the case at all, that we be able to hire the same kind of experts and make the same kind of estimates and the same kind of investigation, costing over $200,000.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator. It reminds me that I probably ought to make one more reference to the Montana case referred to by me several times. One of the necessary things to find in fixing a rate is the valuation of the property. That requires a great deal of expert labor and expert testimony. I am not informed as to how much the State of Montana paid for its experts and its investigators, in finding the value of the property used in the distribution of natural gas in the Shelby case, but, undoubtedly, it cost them a large sum of money, not one cent of which would have been necessary if the State had been dealing with somebody who was ready to do the square thing.

To regulate these great corporations which cover this country with a network of monopoly costs millions and hundreds of millions to the taxpayers. The utilities must be regulated; everybody concedes that; they themselves concede that if they were not regulated they would run rampant and the people of the country would be at their mercy. They know that; they hold up their hands and say, "Regulate us; if you do not, we will rob you." And often they get control of the regulators and rob them, anyway. But it is a great expense to maintain all the State commissions, and the taxpayers foot the bill. The utility companies employ the best attorneys and the greatest experts that money can buy, knowing that they do not pay the bill, knowing that the ratepayer foots the bill, knowing that, whatever the price is, they will filch it from the consumer.

So, Mr. President, we ought not to shed any tears about these privately owned companies because they will be required to pay a tax if we relieve the municipal plants from taxation. All they will have to do is to stop their illegal political activities, be good citizens, and they will save much money by the operation.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before we vote, I want to say to the Senator from California that while I agree with the Senator's philosophy that conferees should carry out the wishes of the body which they represent, there were in this instance many different phases to the conference. We were forced to yield to the House with reference to the 3-cent tax on domestic and commercial energy. We presented the Senate's viewpoint with reference to the publicly owned power plants. I think we had at least a half dozen conferences and did not agree on the conference report for at least 3 weeks. At every meeting held the House conferees absolutely refused to accept the amendment of the Senator from California. I say that in defense of the conferees who represented the Senate. I ask for a vote on the report, Mr. President.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I express my thanks to the Senator from Mississippi for his statement. I have no doubt that he did the best that could be done under the circumstances. My complaint is not that he did not do the best that could be done under the circumstances, but upon a question of this sort the enthusiasm of advocacy is essential in order to accomplish results.

Now just one word, and then we will go to a vote if we are able to get a vote upon the report. Do Senators realize that this is the only governmental function that has been singled out for taxation? This is the only place where there has been an attempt to afford protection to the little municipally owned utility plants. Why are they singled out here in the Senate or elsewhere to be made the mark and to pay the price, the price demanded by those privately owned plants which have been maintained in the fashion that has been described today? I submit the case to the Senate.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Mississippi would answer a question?

Mr. HARRISON. I will gladly do so if I can.

Mr. BONE. I should like to know if the Senator can answer why it is that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has adopted the policy of refusing to pay light and power bills in States where they have municipally owned light and power systems which are selling power as nearly as possible at cost, while, on the other hand, it is utilizing public money to pay the bills due to privately owned power companies? Why should that policy be continued? That is the reason I made the objection here today.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say that I am not familiar with the policy of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I know that in the original Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act they were not authorized to loan money directly to electric-power companies. It may now be that under some later relief legislation we passed some States have adopted that method. I am not familiar with that phase of the question and cannot answer the Senator's question.

Mr. BONE. The Senator from Mississippi and other Senators will understand that in approving this conference report they are penalizing the publicly owned plants which are selling cheap power for daring to sell the cheap power, and they are making possible the payment of bills for private power companies out of the Public Treasury. My city is being penalized by this.

Mr. HARRISON. As it is today, the consumer pays the tax whether he gets the energy from a municipally owned plant or whether he buys it from a privately owned institution. Of course, now the matter will be changed, and the power companies will pay the 3-percent tax. The municipality that has a publicly owned power plant for the lighting of its streets and similar functions will not pay a tax. Upon the current which they sell to the private consumer they will have to pay the tax.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I think I ought to say in justice to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that the Los Angeles municipally owned utility has either borrowed or made arrangements for the borrowing of a very large sum to build a transmission line from Boulder Dam to the city of Los Angeles. What this amendment does is this: That loan was arranged for or made or consummated prior to the passage of this particular measure. What the Los Angeles municipal plant is required to do is not only to amortize the money that it owes for the construction of its plant and its maintenance but is required as well to amortize the indebtedness to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It is perfectly obvious that the private plants in southern California know just what they are doing. This tax puts an additional $400,000 per year upon that municipal utility.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I hope I have not been misinformed, I hope for the sake of the good name of the country I have not been misinformed, but may I ask the Senator from California if it is not a fact that the loan could not have been made to the publicly owned company in Los Angeles if the private companies down there had not agreed to it?

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not justified in saying that.

Mr. BONE. The city of Los Angeles had to get the consent of the privately owned power companies there before it could get this loan, according to my information.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not justified in saying that because I do not know the facts.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say that while now a publicly owned institution might not be able to borrow the money, yet when the industrial-recovery legislation is enacted, while the private institutions cannot then borrow money, the municipality or the county or the State can borrow money to finance such enterprises as this.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington referred to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I have heard that kind of a rumor, and I took occasion to make some investigation, and I do not think the rumor is based upon facts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington to recommit the report to the conference committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. May we have the question stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington to recommit the report to the conference committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, was a motion made to recommit the conference report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion was submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it not more in order to vote to adopt or reject the report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to recommit is in order, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is not a vote against the conference report equivalent to recommittal of the report to the conference committee? If the conference report is not adopted, it goes back to the conference committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not automatically, in the opinion of the Chair. If the conference report is defeated, it is defeated.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] to recommit the conference report, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, is a vote in the affirmative a vote to recommit?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. To whom are we recommitting the report?

Mr. BONE. To the conference committee.

Mr. HARRISON. The conference committee, when they made their report, were discharged.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Mississippi permit the Chair to make a statement? The conference report has not been acted upon in the House, and until it is acted upon in the House it can be recommitted. The motion is in order. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). On this matter I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES]. Therefore I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. I understand if he were present he would vote the same as I shall vote, and I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. McGILL. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. AUSTIN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is necessarily absent. I have already voted. I understand the Senator from Virginia, if present, would vote as I have voted, and therefore I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. PATTERSON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. As that Senator has not voted, I feel that I should make an announcement of our pair. However, I am informed that if present he would vote as I have voted, and, therefore, I feel at liberty to let my vote stand.

Mr. KENDRICK. I wish to announce the general pair of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS].

I also wish to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business: The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THOMPSON], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON], the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. HEBERT (after having voted in the negative). I am advised that my general pair, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], would vote as I have voted. Therefore I will let my vote stand.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS]. I understand he has not voted. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I am forced to withdraw my vote. I understand if the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] were present he would vote "nay", and if permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is necessarily absent. The Senator can transfer his pair to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am informed by the Senator from California that I can transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]; and upon his authority I am very glad to do that. I so transfer my pair and vote "yea."

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE], has a general pair with the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], if present, would vote "yea."

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is necessarily detained. If present, he would vote "yea." He has been paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] by the transfer stated by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—41

Adams	Bachman	Black	Brown
Ashurst	Bankhead	Bone	Bulow

Byrd	Gore	Overton	Thomas, Utah
Capper	Hayden	Pope	Townsend

So Mr. BONE's motion to recommit the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I happened to be a member of this conference committee. We made an honest, persistent effort to carry out the wishes of this body. As I stated—and many Senators on the other side of the aisle were not here at the time I made the statement—we had no less than half a dozen meetings during these very busy days when we were working on many other matters.

The House absolutely refused to accept the so-called "Johnson amendment." So far as I am concerned, I know that I cannot do any more in the conference than I have already done; and I ask unanimous consent that I may be relieved as one of the conferees representing the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that he may be relieved as one of the conferees on House bill 5040. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not make that request tonight. It seems to me that of all the Members of the Senate who ought to represent the Senate in such a conference, the Chairman of our Finance Committee is the outstanding Member.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that a statement like this is not made in play upon my part. I have no sore toe about it. I know that I did my part. The Senate, however, feels that the conferees are not really representing them, since they voted the other way, as I did. I voted against the Senator's amendment when it was offered here. He feels, and the great majority here who have just voted to recommit the conference report, after we labored to try to get together in an agreement, feel that the Senate should not be represented in a conference by those of a different line of thought.

The Senator from Pennsylvania will recall that in the conference, after the House conferees refused to accept the so-called "Johnson amendment", I made an effort to have the tax removed even in those cities that had a publicly owned institution in competition with a privately owned one, and that that phase of the matter was debated for some time. I tried to go the whole length. I could not go the whole length, and I went half the length on the proposition.

So far as I am concerned, I cannot conscientiously take part in a conference, when Senators on my own side are unwilling to have confidence in the conferees.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Mississippi to let the matter of his request ride until tomorrow. I ask him to do that; and I shall be very glad to confer with him, if he will permit me, in the morning.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say that I should have no objection in the world to the Senator from California himself being appointed in my place. I have no pride of opinion about these matters.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is very kind of the Senator; but I ask the Senator simply to let the matter ride until morning.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, when one House refuses to agree to a conference report on some issue of this kind, is it not customary to have it submitted to the other House for a vote? That has not yet been done.

Mr. HARRISON. No; that is not the customary procedure.

Mr. DILL. It would be now.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to say for the Senator from Mississippi that he did loyally and persistently try to carry out the will of the Senate in the conference. When he could not get all that the Senate asked he did suggest a compromise, and tried to get part of it. When the House flatly refused to give that—and we discussed it for a considerable time—the conference broke up, and I thought the bill was dead. So did a good many of us. There was an interval of a week or 10 days when the conferees did not meet. We had reached an impasse; and, as I say, I thought the bill had died, because it was perfectly evident that the House would not give in.

As far as I am concerned, I am not going to serve on the conference committee unless the chairman of the Finance Committee serves. If new conferees are to be named, I suggest that they all be new. Let them go and try out the matter with the conferees from the House; and I shall be very much entertained to see how they get along.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I believe that the Senator from Mississippi has acted handsomely. There is no Senator here whose intellectual integrity, diligence, and research as a statesman could excel the Senator from Mississippi.

Certainly it is known that on an issue of this kind men vote their convictions, and not their friendships. If it were a matter of friendship, the entire Senate would vote with the Senator from Mississippi. He is, as I say, one of the most popular of all our Senators. He has done the handsome thing; and while I did not vote with him I believe he is doing the right thing, when he finds that a task of this sort, the result of his laborious and honest work, does not meet with the approval of his colleagues, in letting someone else eat the toadstools thinking they are mushrooms. [Laughter.]

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I rise because of some things said by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] in the course of his argument.

The Senator from California said that all of the Senators who were on the conference committee were opposed to this particular amendment. Before I make reference to that, however, let me call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there were many controversial features in the bill. There were several amendments on which the House and Senate were at variance. I met with the conference committtee for a number of days, and went away to attend the funeral of one of the Congressmen from my State.

I desire to say to the Senator from California that I am not opposed to exempting municipal plants from taxation; but I want to remind the Senator from California of the form of his amendment when we voted on it upon this floor. I say without hesitation that I should vote against it again in that form, and I do not see how any Senator could vote for it in that form if he analyzed it.

This was the status of the matter:

The Senate committee had divided the tax into a tax on domestic and commercial energy at 2 cents, to be paid by the producing company; and 1 cent on industrial energy, to be paid by the consumer. The amendment offered by the Senator from California exempted the municipal plant from the tax, whether levied on commercial energy, domestic energy, or industrial energy. Therefore the manufacturer of shoes or hats buying his power from a municipal plant would pay the Government no tax. Bear in mind that the Senate amendment was that the industrial tax was levied upon the consumer, not the producer; but the shoe manufacturer or hat manufacturer buying his industrial energy from a private corporation would pay to the Government a tax.

Obviously that is unjust. Obviously it is unfair; and that would be true in the same town. Suppose we say, however, that the manufacturer in the same city had the right to buy, free from tax, all of his industrial power. You cannot answer why the shoe manufacturer in Washington City, for instance, should pay no tax to the Government because he buys from a municipal plant; but over across the Maryland line, where there is no municipal plant, the shoe manufacturer is compelled to pay a tax to the Government.

The Senator's amendment, as he will see if he will examine it, expressly exempted all power sold by the municipal plant from the taxation imposed by the two specific provisions of the bill; and I therefore voted against the amendment. I am not, however, opposed to exempting municipal plants. Therefore I am in position to say to the Senator from California that I certainly in good faith undertook, so far as I could, to carry out the wishes of the Senate, and I am pleased to say that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] did; and I saw no disposition upon the part of any of the Senate conferees not to carry out fully the Senate's expressed wishes upon this as upon every other amendment.

I desired to make that statement because I thought it was a matter of justice to myself and to my own position in this matter, and as illustrating that I certainly was free, because in sympathy with it, to advocate the exemption of municipal plants. I may say to the Senator from California that his own colleague [Mr. MCADOO] called me before I went into the conference on the 2 days that I was able to meet with the conferees, and made a particular request of me, and I undertook to carry out that request with reference to this particular amendment.

I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not retire from the conference; but if there is to be a change in the conference committee, of course I am quite glad to go off the conference committee. I express the hope that the Senator from Mississippi will not retire, however, because he certainly ought to remain on the committee.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

THE CALENDAR—ORDER OF BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Under an order of the Senate heretofore entered, the calendar is in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, unless some Senator insists upon a call of the Calendar, I am going to ask unanimous consent that that order be vacated for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the order will be vacated.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to call up a conference report? I do not believe the consideration of the report will take very long.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly; but I wish to make a brief statement. The proceedings regarding the conference report just voted on have taken a much longer time than was anticipated, and a number of Senators are anxious to conclude this session of the Senate. So, when certain details have been attended to, I shall move a recess.

PURCHASE OF PREFERRED STOCK AND BONDS OF INSURANCE COMPANIES—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the conference report on Senate bill 1094.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following conference report, which had been submitted by Mr. FLETCHER on June 2, 1933:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 6.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 10, 11, and 12, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert: "The total face amount of loans outstanding, preferred stock subscribed for, and capital notes purchased and held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, under the provisions of this section and section 2, shall not exceed at any one time $50,000,000, and the amount of notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue and to have outstanding at any one time under existing law is hereby increased by an amount sufficient to carry out the provisions of this section and section 2" and a period; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert "The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not subscribe for or purchase any preferred stock or capital notes of any applicant insurance company, (1) until the applicant shows to the satisfaction of the Corporation that it has unimpaired capital stock, or that it will furnish new capital which will be subordinate to the preferred stock or capital notes to be subscribed for or purchased by the Corporation, equal to the amount of said preferred stock or capital notes so subscribed for or purchased by the Corporation: Provided, That the Corporation may make loans upon said preferred stock or capital notes, if, in its opinion, such loans will be adequately secured by said stock or capital notes, and/or such other forms of security as the Corporation may require"; and on page 3, line 13, of the Senate bill, strike out "acceptance" and insert in lieu thereof "loan"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 6, line 16, of the Senate bill, after the period, insert quotation marks; and the House agree to the same.

That the title of the bill be amended to read as follows: "An act to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to subscribe for preferred stock and purchase the capital notes of insurance companies, and for other purposes."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I think that before we agree to the conference report, the Senator from Florida should explain the effect of it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, one of the principal items in the bill was a condition imposed upon the Reconstruction Finance Corporation against subscribing to the stock of insurance companies until they were afforded certain assurances regarding the capital stock of the applying companies. That remained in the bill just as the Senate agreed to it.

There was another provision in the bill, however, to the effect that no loans or renewals of loans could be made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation where any officer or employee of the company seeking to borrow received an annual salary in excess of $17,500. That was changed, and it was provided that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation must find that the compensation was reasonable before they made loans. Instead of limiting any salary to the specific sum of $17,500 with reference to all renewal loans and all loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the House provision was that the compensation should be considered reasonable by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That is a change which the House made, and the Senate conferees accepted the change. Those are the main features as to which there was any difference.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay the Senate at this late hour, but I assume there will be no record vote, and I want it known that I shall vote against the conference report.

The Senate adopted an amendment to the bill which would have prohibited the payment of salary in excess of $17,500 to the officer of any company borrowing money from the Government. That amendment has been stricken out. There has been substituted for it a provision that no salary shall be paid by any company borrowing from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in excess of that deemed reasonable by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Personally I desire to congratulate the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on the very forward step it made a few weeks ago in this regard. It did provide for a very drastic curtailment of salaries, in some instances as much as 60 percent of the salaries. Unfortunately, when that 60-percent reduction was made, the salary of the president of the railroad which was borrowing money was still near the $60,000 mark. I still take the position which I took on this subject last year when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation measure was before us—that when any business enterprise comes to this Government with its hat in hand to borrow money, it should reduce the salaries paid its officers to somewhere near those paid officials of the United States. I am of the opinion that $17,500, the amount fixed by the Senate, was liberal with reference to the salaries of officers of corporations operating their business on loans from the United States.

I make no criticism of any kind or character of the conferees in connection with this report, but I did want it known that, insofar as I am concerned, I believe that if the House of Representatives had had an opportunity to vote upon this proposal when the matter was sent to conference, the House would not have voted in favor of salaries in excess of $17,500 for officials of corporations borrowing from the United States Government money of the taxpayers.

I want it expressly understood that I approve of the forward step taken by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the reduction which they did exact, but I am of the opinion that the reduction is not enough. I do not think the president of a railroad company which has allowed his corporation to reach such a stage that it comes to the Government to dig down into the taxpayers' money is justified in drawing a salary of anything like $60,000 a year. For that reason, for myself, without asking for a record vote, but merely that my position may be made known, I want it understood that I shall vote against the conference report because it would permit the drawing of a salary of as much as $60,000 a year on the part of officials of corporations which cannot successfully operate their own business until they dig down in the pockets of the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am heartily in sympathy with the views expressed by the Senator from Alabama. I never criticize conferees, and have no thought or desire to do so in connection with this report, nor did I have with respect to the report just acted on. But in order to express my own views and my own sentiments, I have either to vote for conference reports submitted or I have to vote against them. Had I been persuaded by my esteem and my high regard—I might say affectionate regard—for the Senator from Mississippi, I would certainly have voted for the last conference report we acted upon, but I was voting purely upon the policy involved. I am going to vote upon the pending conference report with the policy in view. I am against the policy of striking from the bill this limitation of $17,500, and therefore I want it understood that I am against that part of the report of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I should like to move, at this time, that we reconsider the vote by which the conference report was just agreed to. In connection with that I want to say that I am not in favor of permitting the large corporations of this country, paying huge salaries to their officers, to avail themselves of the opportunity to secure money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in any amount, at any time. I have always been opposed to the money of the taxpayers of this country, in the hands, as it were, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, being given out in any amount, at any time, to any company whose officers are permitted to draw salaries in excess of $17,500. I think we have arrived at the time when a stop should be put to that, and I am thoroughly in accord with the views expressed here this afternoon, to my delight, by the eminent Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. I hope we may have a reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, there are probably not enough Senators here to enable us to get a yea-and-nay vote. Unless we can get our good friends to consent to this reconsideration, we want to have a yea-and-nay vote, but I do not want to call for a quorum, because I do not believe we could get a quorum at this time, and it would force an adjournment. Therefore I suggest that the motion to reconsider go over until tomorrow.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; let us dispose of it now.

Mr. LONG. Then I will have to call for a quorum, because we want to have a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well, call for a quorum. I should like to have it settled now, because I will be very much occupied tomorrow. I have to attend a meeting at half past 9 and another at 10 o'clock, and I should like to have this matter disposed of now.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I hope the motion will not be pressed at this time. A great many Senators have left the Chamber to go to their offices, upon the theory that we would take a recess after disposing of the first conference report brought up. It would be exceedingly unfair at this time to take a vote on this motion. I think it should go over until tomorrow. Therefore I shall object at this time to a vote being taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I did not understand the Senator from North Carolina to make a motion to reconsider. I understood him to say that he hoped that the vote would be reconsidered.

Mr. REYNOLDS. No; I made the motion.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from North Carolina made a motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to reconsider the vote whereby the report was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will not the Senator withhold that suggestion?

Mr. LONG. I withhold it.

Mr. McNARY. I appeal to the Senator from North Carolina, in view of the many Senators who are absent from the Chamber on personal and public matters, that he allow the matter to go over until tomorrow.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I should be very glad to agree to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire that the motion be entered?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am merely agreeing that the matter may be delayed until tomorrow.

Mr. LONG. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from North Carolina would have a right to withdraw his motion today and renew it tomorrow, would he not?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I ask for the opinion of the Chair on that question.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator has a right to enter his motion and ask that it go over until the next day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator withdraws his motion?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I will renew the motion in the morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And the Senator withdraws it at this time?

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator may enter his motion and it will go over.

Mr. LONG. No; do not do that. Someone will move to lay it on the table. The Senator must be careful about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

REGULATIONS PERTAINING TO VETERANS' ALLOWANCES

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD a statement relating to changes in the regulations having to do with compensation allowances for veterans of the World War and the Spanish-American War.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Important changes were made today by the President in regulations having to do with compensation allowances for veterans of the World War and the Spanish-American War. These changes were approved by the President by an Executive order which he signed.

The object of the changes made was to reduce the severity of cuts originally proposed under the so-called "Economy bill" passed by the Congress to maintain the credit of the United States.

The new regulations set forth in the Executive order were made possible by the President's original direction that the tentative regulations be carefully reviewed and amended to specifically prevent cuts in compensation of service-connected veterans which would be deeper than was intended and to effect more equitable levels of payment.

Under the new regulations no directly service-connected veteran will be reduced in payment by more than 25 percent, and the average reduction will approximate 18 percent. This regulation applies not only to World War veterans but to Spanish-American War veterans with directly connected disabilities and to peacetime veterans who have incurred a disability while with an expeditionary force engaged in a campaign or expedition such as Nicaragua, China, Russia, or Haiti and who have incurred injuries or disease in line of duty.

Under this regulation the service-connected Spanish-American War veterans and some of the peace-time veterans will receive payments substantially in excess of those which they were receiving prior to the passage of the Economy Act.

With respect to World War veterans, this regulation increases the payments to those suffering from specific injuries, such as $150 a month for those who have lost both hands or both feet or one hand and one foot, or in any case where the person is so helpless as to be in need of regular aid or attendant, and, in addition, in the case of the more severely injured, the President's new regulations increase the allowance from $150 per month to $175 per month.

In the case of the Spanish-American War veterans over 62 years of age and who have served 90 days of more, even though they may be suffering from nonservice-connected disabilities, rates are increased from $6 to $15 a month; and in the case of either Spanish-American War or World War veterans who are permanently and totally disabled, the rate is increased from $20 to $30 a month.

The new regulations also liberalize allowances pertaining to burial and funeral expenses to veterans; provide that pensions shall continue to be payable to children of deceased veterans up to the age of 18 years, and, in the event of a child being in an approved school or college, the pension may continue for an additional period until the completion of the course, but not beyond the age of 21 years.

The original regulations only authorized payment of pensions up to 16 years in such cases. This regulation also includes a provision exempting from the prohibition against payment of pensions to Federal employees the widows of deceased veterans and those veterans whose pay is $50 per month or less.

PUBLIC-WORKS PROGRAM

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter I have just received from a man who for years has been interested in building low-cost houses and who has made an offer to the District of Columbia that may be of interest to Members of the Senate in connection with the construction project proposed by the pending Capper bill.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., June 5, 1933.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SCHALL: Having corresponded with you before relative to the public-works program and the need for a national housing program to promote the building of low-cost homes and having been employed by the Federal Government and others to produce equipment for producing materials for such homes in the Panama Canal Zone and elsewhere, I am taking the liberty of writing you of my proposition made to the District of Columbia in the program it is about to undertake in the event the pending Capper bill becomes law. This bill, of course, aims to clear slums and alleys.

My proposition was made to the Senate District Committee and to Col. U. S. Grant, who has charge of public buildings and parks in the District, to produce material and superintend the building of houses as was done in the Canal Zone, Youngstown, Ohio, and other places at cost. The District would advance the money for the plant to manufacture the products and the money thus advanced would be repaid through the sale of products and machinery to other sources. A bond would be put up to carry out the construction project and other guaranties given that the salary advanced and cost of plant would be repaid to the District during the time that the housing program was carried out, not to exceed 10 years.

Further details could be worked out by the District officials and the corporation counsel. I am sure I can work out similar housing programs in any city in the country.

Thanking you in advance for anything you can do to support this bill, I am,

Sincerely yours,

A. A. PAULY MANUFACTURING CO.,
By A. A. PAULY.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States transmitting several judicial nominations, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. TRAMMELL, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Rear Admiral William D. Leahy, United States Navy, to be Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, in the Department of the Navy, with the rank of rear admiral, for a term of 4 years from the 1st day of July 1933, which was ordered to be placed on the calendar.

Mr. BLACK, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Jim C. Smith, of Alabama, to be United States attorney, northern district of Alabama.

Mr. NEELY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Paul E. Ruppel, of Illinois, to be United States marshal, southern district of Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there are no nominations on the calendar as printed.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then, as in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 2 minutes p.m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, June 7, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate June 6, 1933

SOLICITOR FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

South Trimble, Jr., of Kentucky, to be Solicitor for the Department of Commerce, to succeed E. F. Morgan, resigned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JUNE 6, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Gratefully, blessed Lord, do we acknowledge Thy love and mercy, which have given us all this day, with its privileges and opportunities for service and joyous, useful hours. Animated by Thy wonderful providence, may we approach our labors with conscientious zeal and with hearts full of sympathy with the calling needs of our land. Feed us, Heavenly Father, with the bread of life that shall enrich our minds and hearts, and lead us not to forget those precious treasures that help the common man. Humble us amid our manifold blessings, and may we ever aim to be among the pure in heart, who alone shall be permitted to see Thee face to face. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, the bill (H.R. 5240) entitled "An act to provide emergency relief with respect to home-mortgage indebtedness, to refinance home mortgages, to extend relief to the owners of homes occupied by them and who are unable to amortize their debt elsewhere, to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, to increase the market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes"; that the Senate insists upon its amendments to said bill, requests a conference with the House thereon, and appoints Mr. BULKLEY, Mr. WAGNER, and Mr. TOWNSEND to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. CONNALLY a member of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House, H.R. 4220, for the protection of Government records, in place of Mr. PITTMAN, excused.

RELIEF OF HOME OWNERS

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table this bill (H.R. 5240) to provide emergency relief with respect to home-mortgage indebtedness, to refinance home mortgages, to extend relief to the owners of homes occupied by them and who are unable to amortize their debt elsewhere, to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, to increase the market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Speaker appointed the following conferees: Mr. STEAGALL, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, Mr. LUCE.

MEMORIAL DAY

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an address delivered by myself at the Confederate memorial services at Arlington Cemetery on Sunday last.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks, I insert an address delivered by myself at the Confederate Memorial Day exercises in Arlington Cemetery, Washington, D.C., on Sunday, June 4, 1933.

The address is as follows:

General Wilkinson, Confederate Veterans, Daughters of the Confederacy, Veterans of the Spanish-American War and of the World War, ladies and gentlemen, if I had known that these exercises were to be broadcast I would have reduced my speech to writing and tried to devote more time and attention to its preparation. As it is, I am sorry to say that I have no address "cut and dried." I feel, however, that by the time I have finished, the verdict will be unanimous to the effect that it was dry enough.

It is not my desire to open afresh the healing wounds of war or to stir the dying embers of sectional strife. I would not for the world utter one word to hurt the feelings of a Federal soldier, or of one who stands in the same relation to him that we of the South do to the men who wore the gray in that unfortunate conflict. I agree with the southern poet who said that—

"None but a coward would revile
An honest soldier's dust."

I have often heard it contended that either the soldiers of the South or those of the North were wrong in that contest. My answer to that contention is that they were both right. They were both fighting the battles of their country in a conflict produced by causes over which they had no control. They are both equally entitled to the love, admiration, and respect of the people of our reunited country.

I want to pause for a moment to pay my tribute to the Daughters of the Confederacy, under whose auspices these exercises are held, and to congratulate them on their splendid achievements, one of which is the erection of this magnificent monument, in the shadow of which these exercises are being held.

I once had the pleasure of taking an airplane flight over Washington with Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, and as I looked down upon the many wonderful things to be seen in the Nation's Capital, the most attractive of them all to me was this beautiful cemetery of Arlington—the bivouac of our heroic dead. The most beautiful object in this great cemetery was this splendid monument, dedicated to our Confederate dead, and erected by the generous, patriotic, loving, and loyal Daughters of the Confederacy.

If I were a Southern woman I would rather be listed among your members than to be a member of any other civic or patriotic organization on earth. You are not only the daughters of the greatest soldiers of all time, but you are the daughters of those glorious women of the South who sustained our soldiers in times of war and shared their burdens in times of peace.

You have another monument to your credit which time cannot efface, and that is Memorial Day. On April 25, 1866, about 1 year after the close of the War Between the States, the women of Columbus, Miss., in the district which I have the honor to represent in Congress, went out to decorate the graves of Confederate soldiers. They were the wives, the widows, the mothers, the sisters, and daughters of Confederate veterans—many of them still in the weeds of mourning. There were about 40 Federal soldiers buried in that cemetery. With a generosity that has few, if any parallels, those noble women decorated alike the graves of the Confederate and the Federal dead.

A report of that incident got into the press and inspired from the pen of the Honorable Francis Miles Finch, a distinguished northern jurist, a little poem called "The Blue and the Gray" that will live as long as the Stars and Stripes continue to float over a free people, as long as the sweet strains of old Dixie shall stir the southern heart with its "sweet but melancholy pathos", in which he said:

"By the flow of the inland river,
Whence the fleets of iron have fled,
Where the blades of the grave grass quiver,
Asleep are the ranks of the dead;
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Under the one the blue,
Under the other the gray.

"These in the robings of glory,
Those in the gloom of defeat,
All with the battle-blood gory,
In the dusk of eternity meet;
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Under the laurel, the blue;
Under the willow, the gray.

From the silence of sorrowful hours
The desolate mourners go,
Lovingly laden with flowers
Alike for the friend and the foe;
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Under the roses, the blue;
Under the lillies, the gray,

"So with an equal splendor
The morning sun rays fall,
With a touch, impartially tender,
On the blossoms blooming for all;
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Broidered with gold, the blue;
Mellowed with gold, the gray.

"So, when the summer calleth
On forest and field of grain,
With an equal murmur falleth
The cooling drip of the rain;
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Wet with the rain, the blue,
Wet with the rain, the gray.

"Sadly, but not with upbraiding,
The generous deed was done;
In the storm of the years that are fading,
No braver battle was won;
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Under the blossoms, the blue,
Under the garlands, the gray.

"No more shall the war cry sever,
Or the winding rivers be red;
They banish our anger forever
When they laurel the graves of our dead!
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Love and tears for the blue,
Tears and love for the gray."

This poem was first published by Judge Finch in the Atlantic Monthly for September 1867, under the following notation:

"THE BLUE AND THE GRAY

"The women of Columbus, Miss., animated by nobler sentiments, than are many of their sisters, have shown themselves impartial in their offerings made to the memory of the dead. They strewed flowers alike on the graves of the Confederate and of the National soldiers." (New York Tribune.)

From this humble beginning came our present Memorial Day, which was later adopted by the Grand Army of the Republic under General Logan, and is today observed throughout the land.

Sufficient time has elapsed since the close of that war for us to pause and take an impartial inventory of the causes by which it was produced and the questions it involved. The three great causes of that conflict were slavery, secession, and the differing political philosophies, coupled with different commercial and economic conditions of the two great sections of the country.

We are not apologizing for slavery in the South; we were not responsible for it. We bought those slaves from the people of New England. They now call slavery a "moral" issue. I have often wondered how long it was after the slave trade became unprofitable in New England before it became "immoral." It is well known that in the Constitutional Convention of 1787 Southern men desired to put a stop to the slave trade at once, but pressure from the Northeastern States prevented them from placing a limitation on it to take effect earlier than the year 1808. To hear some of the tirades that have been made against the South one would think that we reduced a race of people to slavery and that the people of the South were the worst enemies the Negro ever had. As a matter of fact, we elevated the Negro from a position of savage to that of servant, civilized and Christianized him, and showed him for the first time the light of a Christian civilization, through the unfortunate institution of slavery. I say unfortunate, because it was unfortunate for the white people of the South, but it was the greatest blessing the Negro had ever known.

The people of the South have been the Negro's best friends. We are the best friends he has today. In the great depression through which we have been passing since 1929 the Negro, as a rule, has been better cared for in the Southern States than anywhere else under the American flag.

We are glad that human slavery has disappeared from the face of the earth, as we are glad our country is reunited, in spirit and in truth; but we must deplore the efforts of the agitators to stir up strife between the two races, which can only result in detriment to the Negroes as a whole, whenever those peaceful and friendly relations that exist between the two races in the South are interrupted or disturbed. It seems impossible for people of the North to understand the friendly and even affectionate relationships that existed in the South between the masters and their slaves, and even today they fail to grasp it.

I read, I believe, in the New York Times, a few years ago an editorial on that old southern song, Way Down Upon de Swanee Ribber. The editor thoroughly convinced himself that no such language was ever used by the Negro, and that while the music was only fair, the sentiment was entirely overdrawn. It occurred to me that no man who was reared north of the Mason and Dixon's line ever really heard that song. Few, if any, of the generation of today ever heard it, or ever will hear it. In order to have caught the real pathos of this soul-stirring melody one would have had to sit in the gathering twilight at the end of a summer day before a humble Negro's cabin door back in the "years that are fading" on the impoverished estate of a bankrupt planter and heard it sung by an old-time darky, conscious of the impending desolation of helpless old age, instead of the assurance of that care and protection he had hoped to look forward to at the hands of his beneficent master in his declining years.

Slavery was a grievous fault, and grievously has Dixie answered it; and in doing so we have answered for the sins of the very ones who have presumed to mete out our punishment.

But our critics tell us that we were guilty of "treason" because of our secession from the Union. I have often wondered when secession became treason—whether it was before or after the pen of Jefferson, the sword of Washington, and the voice of Adams proclaimed it as a divine right in separating these united Colonies from the dominion of the mother country. I have wondered whether it became treason before or after the Hartford convention in December 1814, where representatives of the New England States met for the purpose of seceding from the Union, in the dark hours of the War of 1812, after an invading enemy had ruthlessly burned the Capitol of our country, and at a time when old Andrew Jackson was leading his southern and western volunteers on to New Orleans, where he "taught the newly fledged American eagle to match its talons with the lion's strength", and raised America for the first time to the dignity of a world power.

No one questioned the right of secession for more than 50 years after our Government was formed. In fact, the American people supported secession in the case of Texas, they condoned it in Cuba, they encouraged it in Panama. Abraham Lincoln himself, the great war President of the United States, in a speech made by him in the House of Representatives of the National Congress on January 12, 1848 (60 years after the adoption of the Constitution), as reported in the Congressional Globe of that date, at page 94, volume 17, Thirtieth Congress, first session, in defending the right of Texas to secede from Mexico, said:

"Any people anywhere, being inclined and having the power, have the right to rise up and shake off the existing government, and form a new one that suits them better. This is a most valuable, a most sacred right—a right which, we hope and believe, is to liberate the world. Nor is this right confined to cases in which the whole people of an existing government may choose to exercise it. Any portion of such people that can may revolutionize and make their own of so much of the territory as they inhabit. More than this, a majority of any portion of such people may revolutionize, putting down a minority, intermingled with, or near about them, who may oppose their movements. Such minority was precisely the case of the Tories of our own Revolution. It is a quality of revolutions not to go by old lines, or old laws, but to break up both, and make new ones."

I submit that the right of secession was never more clearly or more forcibly expressed by Jefferson Davis or Robert Toombs than it was by Mr. Lincoln in that address. Was it treason then?

The South did not want to secede. They were nagged into it. A few years more and slavery would have fallen of its own weight, as it had done in England. But there were great, selfish interests that desired not only to subdue the South but to drive a wedge between the agricultural States of the South and West in order to plunder them through high protective tariffs and other discriminations that, carried out over a period of more than 60 years, have impoverished those sections, bled their peoples white, provoked retaliation on the part of every nation under the sun, crowded our population into congested centers, and brought to the people of America the present direful depression—the greatest economic calamity in all the tides of human history.

We must get back to the fundamental policies laid down by the founders of the Republic and advocated by the great statesmen of ante-bellum times, reinstitute the rule of common honesty for that of selfish greed, readopt the Golden Rule, instead of the rule of gold, in all our national and international relationships if we are to enjoy in the future the respect of mankind as well as those inherent blessings of civilization which the God of nature and the God of nations intended for us to enjoy.

I wish to say just a few words about our great leaders during those perilous times. While there are many whose names are written among the immortals, I shall mention only four: Jefferson Davis, Robert E. Lee, Nathan Bedford Forrest, and Stonewall Jackson.

Stonewall Jackson, the matchless soldier of the Shenandoah, whose marvelous achievements in his valley campaigns thrill the world today, and whose name and fame will live as long as that majestic stream bears its wanton tributes to the sea.

Nathan Bedford Forrest, the Achilles of the Confederacy, the greatest genius of them all, whom Lee pronounced "the outstanding soldier developed by the war", the greatest fighter of ancient or modern times. He never had on a uniform until he was 40 years of age, yet in 4 short years he rose to the rank of lieutenant general. Disregarding the didactic precedents of military pomp, he ground his sword to the keenest edge, and invariably led the charge. He killed more men with his own hand than did any other general who ever commanded an army. He had 38 horses shot from under him and was wounded many times. He said no soldier was worth killing who went into battle expecting to come out alive. It is said that he fought more open engagements than any other commander of that war, that he never lost a battle when he was in supreme command, and never bucked a line he did not break. With a genius unsurpassed even by the great Napoleon, he invariably divided his ragged band of "mounted infantrymen" into two or more separate parts on the march, and then successfully concentrated them on the field of battle, inspired them with an enthusiasm akin to living fire, and swept all opposition before him with the fury of a storm.

In the unfolding decades that are before us, as the passions and prejudices of war pass away and America comes to recognize the greatness of this illustrious man, his matchless genius, his marvelous courage, his invincible dynamity will furnish a subject for musicians, painters, and poets. The children of future generations will behold him mounted upon his fiery steed, rising in his stirrups as in the heat of battle, his eyes flashing, his body tense, his countenance ablaze, waving his sword as if inspiring his men to victory or death, as he goes charging down the centuries.

Probably the three greatest Christian soldiers of all time were Robert E. Lee, Jefferson Davis, and Stonewall Jackson. Jackson, the Puritan; Lee and Davis the cavaliers—what a picture that will be for a Rembrandt of the future to give to the world—those three devout Christian leaders in solemn counsel on the eve of a great battle.

Lee was undoubtedly the greatest commander of his day, and easily takes his place among the leading military marshals of all time. Old Senator Ben Hill, of Georgia, once said that—"When the future historian shall come to survey the character of Lee he will find it rising like a huge mountain above the undulating plane of humanity, and he must lift his eyes high toward heaven to catch its summit. He possessed every virtue of other great commanders without their vices.

"He was a foe without hate; a friend without treachery; a soldier without cruelty; a victor without oppression; and a victim without murmuring.

"He was a public officer without vices; a private citizen without wrong; a neighbor without reproach; a Christian without hypocrisy; and a man without guile.

"He was Caesar without his ambition; Frederick without his tyranny; Napoleon without his selfishness; and Washington without his reward.

"He was obedient to authority as a servant, and royal in authority as a true king. He was gentle as a woman in life; modest and pure as a virgin in thought; watchful as a Roman vestal in duty; submissive to law as Socrates; and grand in battle as Achilles."

In the words of Oliver Goldsmith—

"As some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm—
Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread Eternal sunshine settles on its head."

He stands out today the most commanding, the most masterly, the most serenely inspiring figure upon the horizon of human history.

No man has ever been so much and so unjustly maligned as has Jefferson Davis, the great President of the ill-fated Confederacy, "the noblest Roman of them all."

The Honorable Caleb Cushing once said of him that he was "eloquent among the most eloquent in debate, wise among the wisest in counsel, and brave among the bravest on the battlefield."

He was the outstanding hero of the Mexican War. At the most critical moment in that conflict, during the terrible battle of Buena Vista, it was Jefferson Davis, the young colonel of Mississippi riflemen, who executed his famous "V" formation and saved the day by a military maneuver which the Duke of Wellington said was "something new and masterly." He was the ablest Secretary of War this Nation has ever had. He towered like a giant in the United States Senate, standing at all times by the fundamental principles of the Constitution, and defending against all comers the rights of the sovereign States.

As President of the Confederacy, during the dark and stormy years of war, as a prisoner, suffering indignities that would have been spared even the vilest criminal, as a proscribed citizen during the darker years of reconstruction, he never wavered in his devotion to the principle for which he fought and suffered, but stood at all times as—

"* * * constant as the Northern Star
Of whose true-fix'd and resting quality
There is no fellow in the firmament."

As Bishop Galloway once said of him, "Marvelous, many-sided, masterful man, his virtues will grow brighter and his name be writ larger with each passing century. Soldier, hero, statesman, gentleman, American—a prince of Christian chivalry—the uncrowned chief of an invisible republic of loving and loyal hearts—when another hundred years have passed, no intelligent voice will fail to praise him, and no patriotic hand will refuse to place a laurel wreath upon his radiant brow."

As to the rank and file of the Confederate Army, I do not hesitate to say that they were the greatest soldiers, taken man for man, who ever wore a nation's uniform or followed a country's flag.

Someone has said that many a Robert E. Lee was born to die unknown to fame, that many a Stonewall Jackson lies beneath the sod of mother earth, with no other monument to mark the last resting place upon which a brave hero fell than the green grass that feeds its hungry roots upon his decaying bones. As Hamlet said of his sainted father, "They were men, take them for all in all, we shall not look upon their likes again."

But their monuments are in our hearts. As long as valor is esteemed a virtue, courage is admired, and patriotism is prized, the loyal children of the South will cherish as a most priceless heritage the sacred right to claim kindred with their spirits.

What shall I say to this broken band of veterans in gray, this lingering remnant of the great armies of the Confederacy, who sit before me at this hour? How shall I express to you our gratitude, our love, our admiration?

Fifty years to a day after the Battle of Bunker Hill, in addressing the Veterans of the Revolutionary War, who were gathered to witness the laying of the cornerstone of the great monument that crowns that historic eminence, Daniel Webster said:

"Venerable men! You have come down to us from a former generation. Heaven has bounteously lengthened out your lives that you might behold this joyous day. You are now where you stood 50 years ago this very hour, with your brothers and your neighbors, shoulder to shoulder, in the strife for your country. Behold, how altered! The same heavens are, indeed, over your heads; the same ocean rolls at your feet; but all else, how changed! You hear now no roar of hostile cannon; you see no mixed volumes of smoke and flame rising from burning Charlestown. The ground strewed with the dead and the dying; the impetuous charge; the steady and successful repulse; the loud call to repeated assault; the summoning of all that is manly to repeated resistance; a thousand bosoms freely and fearlessly bared in an instant to whatever of terror there may be in war and death—all these you have witnessed, but you witness them no more. All is peace; and God has granted you this sight of your country's happiness ere you slumber in the grave."

What a consolation it must be to you venerable men who have "come down to us from a former generation", who now stand where you were 70 years ago—in the midst of a devastating, fratricidal war—how gratifying it must be to you to behold our reunited country and to see our beloved Southland recovering from the wounds of war and the scars of reconstruction, growing in strength and influence, filled with the happy homes of your children and your children's children, and taking the lead in the new development, as well as in the onward march of our glorious country. What a solace it must be to know that the passions of war have passed away, that the world is coming to understand the great principles for which you fought and for which your comrades died. What a comfort it is to us, your children and your children's children, your neighbors and your friends, to have this opportunity to greet you on this occasion, to manifest to you in our humble way a meager portion of our gratitude for the service you have rendered and the sacrifices you have made, to lay at your feet the undying flowers of filial love and affection, to add them to your laurels of fame which will live and brighten with the passing years,

"Till the sun grows cold,
And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment Book unfold."

ACTIVITIES OF THE NEW ADMINISTRATION

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address made by Hon. Harlee Branch, executive assistant to the Postmaster General, at Ocala, Fla., on May 30.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Hon. Harllee Branch, executive assistant to the Postmaster General, at Ocala, Fla., Tuesday evening, May 30, 1933:

We are living in a time of unprecedented events which at the inception of the Roosevelt administration had been threatening to overwhelm not only the welfare of our own Nation but the welfare and peace of the world. The situation that confronted President Roosevelt when he took office called for immediate and continuous action in dealing with many problems. It called also for drastic treatment, necessarily along new lines and by new methods, for most of the formulas that had been advanced had proved futile, and some of them had only aggravated the conditions from which we suffered.

It is my purpose to narrate to you in some measure what has been going on in Washington during this strenuous period since March 4 and the unexampled activity of the administration in its application of new remedies under the new deal to relieve the Nation from the most acute phases of the depression.

The platform upon which Governor Roosevelt was elected Chief Executive last fall specifically pledged his administration to put into effect definite principles, policies, and reforms advocated therein, and to eradicate the policies, methods, and practices therein condemned. So far as the policies favored could be put into effect by legislation and those denounced could be abolished by Executive action, the pledges of that platform have all been practically kept and will be wholly completed by the time Congress adjourns in June.

President Roosevelt's first official act on the first working day of his administration displayed the courage and the foresight expected of him by the people. By an Executive order he put an end to a Nation-wide run on the banks which, had it continued, would have closed all the weak and insolvent banks in the country and in turn would have brought about the closing of the strong and solvent ones. By an Executive order he declared a bank holiday to enable the Federal authorities to determine what banks were solvent and able to continue business. To allay the suspense created by this drastic action, the President in a radio address took the people into his full confidence and explained the situation in such plain and simple terms that every man and woman with common understanding realized the necessity for his act and also that it was in behalf of the people themselves. It is no exaggeration to say that public confidence was almost immediately restored. With the lifting of the ban the people knew that the banks which opened were able to remain open and that those whose solvency could be restored were being aided to resume.

Simultaneously with the bank-holiday order, the President called Congress to assemble 4 days later, and on the opening day presented an emergency bill which gave him full authority over the banking situation and provided additional currency to meet all demands.

On the second day of the new Congress President Roosevelt submitted a message demanding that the Budget be balanced within a year, and transmitted an emergency economy bill to that effect. Under this economy legislation the Government, beginning the next fiscal year, July 1, will be in receipt of enough revenue to meet its current expenses. In addition to this, the total savings effected are estimated above $1,000,000,000. A large part of this economy is in the Veterans' Administration, and the remainder in reduction of salaries and in reorganizing the departments and bureaus, eliminating waste and duplication. This total is in excess of the pledge in the platform to reduce governmental expenditures 25 percent.

Then came the beer bill before the President had been in office a week, and on April 7 the States whose laws permitted it had beer. The revenue from the beer bill is an important factor in the balancing of next year's Budget and for the future. It was originally estimated that it would bring the Government from $125,000,000 to $150,000,000 annually. From the returns so far it is now estimated that the revenue from this source alone will be between $250,000,000 and $300,000,000, or twice the original estimate.

No time was lost by the administration in dealing with farm relief. This is a problem that has confronted the Government ever since the World War, and while legislation has been enacted in previous administrations it proved inadequate, and in one instance, an expensive experiment, known as the Federal Farm Board. Under this administration that futile agency has been abolished, and all the fiscal activities relating to agricultural aid have been merged into the Farm Credit Administration under one head.

Under the farm bill the President was delegated the widest powers over the production and distribution of basic agricultural commodities, and at the same time has been authorized to expand credit and the currency to meet all necessary demands that may be made by the agricultural program. The farm legislation also includes a provision for refinancing the farm debts, so that holders of farm mortgages will have the privilege of exchanging them for Federal land-bank bonds, the interest upon which is guaranteed by the Treasury of the United States. The President made a special appeal to mortgage creditors when he signed the bill to abstain from bringing foreclosure proceedings or to dispossess farmers who are in debt to them. Favorable response has already been made by large financial institutions, including insurance companies directing the suspension of farm-mortgage foreclosures.

In less than 3 weeks before he took office, President Roosevelt set in motion his plan for unemployment relief by a reforestation bill placing 250,000 unemployed young men in forestry work, providing them with food, quarters, clothing, and medical attendance, and a cash allowance of $30 a month. A subsequent provision adds 25,000 men from the bonus army who are able and willing to work.

This was followed by a measure appropriating $500,000,000 among the States for the maintenance and succor of the unemployed, thus relieving to this extent charitable organizations and the taxpayers of the commonwealths.

The major blow at unemployment is a gigantic one sent to the Congress on May 17, which provides for a $3,300,000,000 public-works program and the control of industry designed to obtain wide reemployment, to shorten the working week, to pay a decent wage, and to prevent unfair competition and disastrous overproduction.

Under this measure sections of the antitrust laws which have restrained effective industrial agreements are automatically suspended for the period of the emergency, which is 2 years.

This program is to be financed by an issue of public bonds, to be retired over a period of years at a cost of $220,000,000 annually. It is estimated that the entire cost of this gigantic project could be met by the increased revenues that would follow the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, which is being urged by the administration. This bill has met with the favor of the large industrialists of the country, and is estimated to give at least 3,000,000 men reemployment.

In behalf of wage earners already employed, President Roosevelt recently addressed the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, representing the principal employers, asking them to refrain from further reduction in wages and to increase wage scales in conformity to the rise in prices for the purpose of achieving a well-rounded national recovery. This met with a favorable response in many sections of the country, and numerous increases of wages have since been recorded. In addition to this he sent messages to the Governors of the 13 industrial States suggesting the adoption of laws similar to the new minimum-wage act of New York State.

A large measure of recovery from the depression will be noted in the valley of the Tennessee River through the immediate revival of the great plant at Muscle Shoals, practically abandoned since the war.

This project includes a broad plan for the improvement of the whole Tennessee Valley and is designed to add comfort and happiness to hundreds of thousands of people there and be generally beneficial to national recovery.

Another evidence of relief is found in the act for the refinancing of mortgages on homes.

The railways of the country, which have suffered heavily from competition of motor transports and through the general decline of business, have been aided by the administration bill providing for a Federal coordinator of transportation and the repeal of the recapture clause of the Interstate Commerce Act. This bill makes certain definite planning by the railroads themselves with the aid of the Government, eliminates the duplication and the waste resulting in railroad receiverships, and is expected to overcome operating deficit.

Effective steps have been taken to prevent recurrence of the enormous losses to the American people in the purchase of securities by an administrative measure providing for Federal control over such issues.

In what I have said I have tried to give a record of the major measures proposed by the administration. Most of them have already been enacted and the remainder are in process of passage by Congress. This record has no parallel that I can discover in the formulation of a legislative program in great detail and its prompt consideration and enactment by the Congress. While untoward events of the depression have occurred with great rapidity, they have been met with equal speed since the present administration came into power.

Heretofore, the Democratic Party has been criticized for a lack of party discipline and party cohesion. The opposition has emphasized this criticism in an effort to create the impression that, because of a lack of these things, the Democratic Party was unfit to govern the country. I cannot resist the temptation at this juncture to observe that not in the history of this country has there ever been a better example of party discipline, party cohesion, and party cooperation than now exists in Washington.

Throughout the session the President has had prompt and effective cooperation by the House and the Senate. There have been differences of opinion concerning some of the legislation proposed, but this was only natural when it is recalled that Mr. Roosevelt himself has frankly stated that some of the measures were necessarily experimental. But it can be said that in this program many new points of view have been evolved and developed, and that disastrous experiments of the past have not been included in any of the legislation presented.

If this were all of what has been going on in Washington since the 4th of last March, it would be a record of Executive skill and diligence and statesmanship unrivaled in our history, but this is only a major part of the domestic program. As far back as April 4, 1 month after he entered the White House, President Roosevelt began issuing invitations to foreign nations to send representatives to Washington for preliminary discussions concerning the World Economic and Monetary Conference to be held in London on June 12. Since then he has held conversations with the leading men of the nations of Europe, Canada, Mexico, South America, and Asia. The official statements issued by the Executive and his visitors all indicate a harmonious spirit and desire to solve international problems. Among these are international monetary stability and exchange and international trade as affected by tariffs. These conferences have been supplemented by interviews between the visitors and Secretary of State Hull, who will head the American delegation to the international meeting in London.

While these Washington conferences were being held, a situation developed abroad which seemed to threaten the placing of obstruction in the way of harmonious action at the conference and perhaps to endanger world peace. At the very outset of expected harmonious action at the conference, the President was faced with a crisis. Mr. Roosevelt immediately threw himself into the breach and sent a message to 54 nations in behalf of disarmament and world peace. Already the entrenched leader of a great Nation, by this dramatic act of high statesmanship he made himself a world leader. He asked for a solemn, definite pact of nonaggression and that they should individually agree that they will send no armed force of whatsoever nature across their frontiers. By this act he has brought about the best assurance that could possibly be had of the success both of the World's Disarmament Conference in Geneva and of the International Economic and Monetary Conference in London, and has possibly averted the worst of human plagues—war.

He has brought home to the nations of the world through this display of his courage and genius a clearer understanding that economic world recovery must have as its accompaniment the greatest of human blessings—peace.

PROSECUTION OF JEWS IN GERMANY

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by placing therein a statement made by several prominent lawyers opposing the persecution of the Jews. The statement is signed by Ogden L. Mills, Elihu Root, and several others.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article protesting against the action of the German Government toward the Jews:

[From the New York Herald Tribune, May 29, 1933]

LAWYERS HERE PROTEST NAZI EXCLUSION OF JEWS—TELL HULL THEY RESENT HITLER BAN ON HEBREW ATTORNEYS

Protest against the action of the German Government in prohibiting Jewish lawyers and judges from practicing their profession has been sent to Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, in behalf of 51 members of the New York bar, it was announced yesterday.

The letter, dated May 9, said the signers hoped that reports were exaggerated and that racial or religious bars had not been set up. "The first reports have, however, been confirmed authentically", it said. "We deeply sympathize with Jewish judges and lawyers thus deprived of their means of livelihood.

"We protest against the action of the German Government as without precedent in modern times and as not only a reproach on the juristic system of Germany, which has hitherto been rightly regarded as representing as high standards of learning and honor as any in the world, but as a violation of the elementary principles of justice.

"John W. Davis, C. C. Burlingham, Samuel Seabury, James Byrne, Bainbridge Colby, G. W. Wickersham, Henry W. Taft, Wilson M. Powell, Charles H. Strong, Kenneth M. Spence, John Godfrey Saxe, Victor J. Dowling, Amos J. Peaslee, George W. Alger, Otto C. Wierum, Morgan J. O'Brien, Henry de F. Baldwin, William J. Donovan, James A. O'Gorman, Charles E. Hughes, Jr., W. A. W. Stewart, Walker D. Hines, Samuel H. Ordway, John A. Garver, James W. Gerard, J. G. Schurman, Jr., Lewis L. Delafield, Joseph H. Choates, Jr., Ogden L. Mills, Elihu Root, Albert Rathbone, Eldon Bisbee, Frank L. Polk, Walter E. Hope, Edwin de T. Bechtel, Raymond B. Fosdick, Paul D. Cravath, Carl Taylor, Bronson Winthrop, Charles S. Whitman, Nathan L. Miller, Robert T. Swaine, Boykin Wright, George S. Franklin, Grenville Clark, Wm. Travers Jerome, Geo. Gordon Battle, Roscoe H. Hupper, Charles R. Hickox, T. Catesby Jones."

George Gordon Battle and Sidney Hillman, president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, have accepted the invitation of the American Jewish Congress to serve as joint honorary chairmen of the campaign to raise a $1,000,000 defense fund in behalf of the German Jews. In a joint appeal yesterday the two men termed the drive a campaign of enlightenment. "Nothing, we maintain", said their statement, "must be permitted to take precedence over this effort. On Hitlerism's defeat or advance rests the fate of world economic recovery and international peace—the victory of moral forces over evil."

The New York Buyers' Association announced that its members had pledged themselves "to totally abstain from purchasing any merchandise the source of which, or any part thereof, can be traced as emanating from the German Nation until such times when * * * persecution shall have ceased."

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY—LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. RUFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may sit the remainder of the day during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PURCHASE OF BONDS AND STOCK OF INSURANCE COMPANIES BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama calls up a conference report and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 6.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 10, 11, and 12, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert "The total face amount of loans outstanding, preferred stock subscribed for, and capital notes purchased and held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, under the provisions of this section and section 2, shall not exceed at any one time $50,000,000, and the amount of notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue and to have outstanding at any one time under existing law is hereby increased by an amount sufficient to carry out the provisions of this section and section 2" and a period; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert "The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not subscribe for or purchase any preferred stock or capital notes of any applicant insurance company, (1) until the applicant shows to the satisfaction of the Corporation that it has unimpaired capital stock, or that it will furnish new capital which will be subordinate to the preferred stock or capital notes to be subscribed for or purchased by the Corporation, equal to the amount of said preferred stock or capital notes so subscribed for or purchased by the Corporation: Provided, That the Corporation may make loans upon said preferred stock or capital notes, if, in its opinion, such loans will be adequately secured by said stock or capital notes, and/or such other forms of security as the Corporation may require"; and on page 3, line 13, of the Senate bill, strike out "acceptance" and insert in lieu thereof "loan"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 9, and agree to the some with an amendment, as follows: On page 6, line 16, of the Senate bill, after the period, insert quotation marks; and the House agree to the same.

That the title of the bill be amended to read as follows: "An act to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to subscribe for preferred stock and purchase the capital notes of insurance companies, and for other purposes."

H. B. STEAGALL,

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House, at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report.

On amendment no. 1: The Senate bill increased the borrowing power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by $50,000,000 in order to provide funds to carry out the provisions of the bill. The House amendment provides that the total face amount of loans, subscriptions to preferred stock, and purchases of capital notes which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may have outstanding at any one time under sections 1 and 2 of the bill shall not exceed $50,000,000 and increases the borrowing power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by an amount sufficient to carry out the purposes of the bill. The Senate recedes with clarifying amendments.

On amendments nos. 2 and 3: The Senate bill authorized the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, where restrictions are imposed by State law upon the issuance of preferred stock, to purchase the legally issued notes, bonds, or debentures of insurance companies, which may be subordinated in whole or in part or to any degree to claims of other creditors. The House amendment limits this authority to the purchase of legally issued capital notes; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 4: This amendment provides that in addition to the powers referred to under amendments nos. 2 and 3 the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may make loans secured by capital notes as collateral; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 5: The Senate bill imposed as a condition upon the subscription, purchase, or acceptance as collateral for a loan, of preferred stock, notes, bonds, or debentures of the applicant insurance company, that the applicant show to the satisfaction of the Corporation that it can furnish an amount of new capital equal to that for which application is made to the Corporation. The House amendment, in conformity with amendments nos. 1, 2, and 3, confines this provision to preferred stock and capital notes, and eliminates this condition with respect to the acceptance of preferred stock or capital notes as collateral for a loan; and provides that the Corporation may make loans upon common or preferred stock or capital notes if, in its opinion, such loans will be adequately secured by such stock or capital notes and/or such other forms of security as the Corporation may require. The House amendment also changes the condition upon the purchase of preferred stock or capital notes by requiring the applicant company to show that it has unimpaired capital stock, or will furnish new cash capital which will be subordinated to the preferred stock or capital notes to be purchased by the Corporation, equal to the amount of preferred stock or capital notes so purchased. The conference agreement does not require the new capital to be cash capital and omits the authority to loan on common stock. The condition is also extended by the conference agreement to subscriptions to preferred stock.

On amendment no. 6: This amendment provides that the limitation on compensation of officers, directors, and employees of an applicant insurance company shall include compensation received from the applicant and/or any of its affiliates. This duplicates language already in the Senate bill, and the House recedes.

On amendments nos. 7 and 8: The Senate bill provided that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should not make, renew, or extend any loan under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, or under the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, first, if at the time of making, renewing, or extending the loan any officer, director, or employee of the applicant is receiving compensation at a rate in excess of $17,500 per annum, and, second, unless the applicant agrees to the satisfaction of the Corporation not to increase the compensation of any of its officers, directors, or employees to any amount in excess of $17,500 per annum while the loan is outstanding and unpaid. The House amendments strike out the $17,500 limitation in each case and provide that the compensation shall not be in excess of what appears reasonable to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. On these amendments the Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 9: This amendment limits the application of the amendments contained in the Senate bill to paragraph 6 of section 201 (a) of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, as amended (relating to earthquake loans), to "the area defined in" such paragraph. The existing law accomplishes this purpose. The Senate recedes with an amendment correcting punctuation.

On amendment no. 10: This amendment includes within the definition of "insurance company" corporations engaged in the business of writing annuity contracts, and the Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 11: This amendment requires the loans authorized to be made to State workmen's compensation insurance funds to be adequately secured; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 12: This amendment makes a clerical change; and the Senate recedes.

The committee of conference recommends that the title of the bill read as follows: "An act to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to subscribe for preferred stock and purchase the capital notes of insurance companies, and for other purposes."

H. B. STEAGALL,
T. ALAN GOLDSBOROUGH,
ROBERT LUCE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The Senate has receded on amendments numbered 7 and 8?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Under those provisions and under the regulations prescribed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, insurance companies like the New York Life and the Mutual Life can still pay their presidents $50,000 a year salary and borrow money from this $50,000,000, and the Metropolitan Insurance Co. under these regulations can still pay its president $80,000 a year and borrow part of this $50,000,000 fund. That may suit the gentleman and it may suit my other colleagues, but I am not agreeing to that. If I had my way I would reduce that further and go back to the reasonable Senate amendment and restrict them to a maximum salary of $17,500 a year, which is comparable to the salary that we pay our Ambassador to the Court of St. James's.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is in error.

Mr. BLANTON. In what way? The Reconstruction Finance Corporation said it would require them to reduce salaries 60 percent. If you reduce a $200,000 salary paid by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. to its president by 60 percent, that still permits that company to pay its president a salary of $80,000 per year. If you reduce by 60 percent the $125,000 salaries paid by the New York Life and the Mutual Life to their presidents, it would still permit them to pay their president $50,000 a year, which is unconscionable, which is inexcusable, and is scandalous to this Nation.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, the conference report adopts the House provisions in toto respecting the limitation on salaries to be paid officials of borrowing institutions.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. STEAGALL. The provisions are the same as passed upon by the House.

I assume that Members of the House are familiar with those provisions. The requirement is that any borrowing institution in the future may not receive a loan unless there is a limitation placed upon the salaries of its officials, which shall not exceed the sum of $17,500 a year. That limitation applies to future loans. There is no similar limitation as to the renewal of existing loans, but in the latter case the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is left to the exercise of the discretion of its officials in determining whether or not a loan will be refused or a renewal will be refused because of the payment of salaries by borrowing institutions which are in excess of reasonable sums. That is the situation.

Mr. BLANTON. But I know the gentleman will be fair enough to say that much of this $50,000,000 will be used in renewals of existing loans, so that the $17,500 limitation will not apply to them. It only applies to future loans.

Mr. STEAGALL. I hardly see how the gentleman can contend that it takes new money to renew an existing loan. If we were doing nothing but renewing loans it would not require one dollar of additional funds. It would simply require the execution of new paper covering such transactions.

Mr. BLANTON. But they can get an enlargement of existing loans.

Mr. STEAGALL. No. Not a dollar may be loaned under this bill without the application of the limitation as to salaries. That is quite clear, and the conferees have succeeded in securing the adoption of the precise provisions of the bill incorporated by the House, and for that reason I do not think the gentleman should be content with the action of the conferees.

Mr. BLANTON. I am in favor of reducing these outrageous salaries. When the Senate did it, the House certainly ought not have undone improperly what the Senate properly did.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman let the House know what happened to the fifth amendment placed in the bill by the House, which provided the only protective provision as far as the security behind the money to be advanced was concerned? In other words, the conferees agreed to eliminate the word "cash", although the House overwhelmingly wanted it in the bill, which omission will permit these applicant companies to come in and convert their claims or debts in supposedly new capital, then go to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and have them furnish the only new live capital that they will have.

In effect this means private stockholders incur no liability whatever, but place the entire burden of capital rehabilitation on their creditors and the taxpayers of the country. The conference committee struck out the word "cash", which leaves this bill, I am afraid, in a very dangerous form, the results of which may lead us into serious difficulties and make for great embarrassment. If you are going to do that, you might as well open the floodgates and let every worthy institution slightly affected with a public interest and in trouble come to this corporation and seek similar assistance. Its elimination confirms my first position, and I felt it my duty to let the House know what they were doing and where we are going in voting to adopt this conference report. My statement should at least serve to keep us from acting blindly.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. I noticed in the New York Times of last Sunday where the Globe & Rutgers Insurance Co., mentioned by the gentleman from New York, Mr. O'CONNOR, an article which showed that they have been in a bankrupt condition and before the State Insurance Commission of New York since last March. They are mentioned specifically as the company that is going to be one of the beneficiaries of this bill. They are in a bankrupt condition now, and this bill is being passed for just such bankrupt companies as that company.

Mr. STEAGALL. Now, if anybody has any more questions, I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Does the gentleman know that that same company to which he has referred, however worthy it may be, has already borrowed from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation over $12,000,000?

Mr. McFARLANE. They have borrowed all they can, and now we are asked to be Santa Claus to them again in this bill. I think we ought to kill the bill.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I decline to yield for the moment. I want to answer one or two of these questions that have been propounded.

This bill follows the same plans for aid to insurance companies that were adopted in the emergency banking bill for aid to banks. The emergency banking bill provided that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should be permitted to make loans on the preferred stock of banks or purchase preferred stock in banks. That is identically what is accomplished by this bill as to insurance companies.

Now, the gentleman calls attention to the rejection by the conferees of an amendment incorporated by the House. That amendment provided that before the Reconstruction Finance Corporation might purchase preferred stock, there should be an equal amount of unimpaired capital stock or that new capital of that amount should be supplied. The word "cash" was not employed in the language adopted in the provisions of the bill which applies to banks.

There are States where capital stock may be furnished incorporations in other forms than cash. The requirement is that no such purchase of preferred stock may be made unless the corporation has unimpaired capital of like amount, or will supply new capital stock of like amount. That follows exactly what was done in the case of banks.

The only thing in that provision of the bill that in any way liberalized the requirements as between this bill and the bill that provides for similar aid to banks, was in the clause which would permit loans on the capital stock of insurance companies on either "common or preferred stock." That provision seems to have escaped the attention of gentlemen in the House who fear that this provision of the bill is too liberal. The word "common" was stricken out in conference, and as it now stands loans are allowed only on preferred stock. This places the claim of the corporation ahead of holders of common stock and protects the corporation against loss.

This action of the conferees tightens up the requirements at the only point at which they had been liberalized as between the provisions of this bill and the bill which provides for aid to banks.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Is not the gentleman willing to admit to the House that there is a vast difference between a bank with public deposits and a private insurance company?

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman, of course, invites me into a discussion of the merits of the original legislation, and I decline to go into that question. The House has passed on it, and the conferees carried out the will of the House.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield for a question, but not for a return to the discussion of the general merits of the original legislation.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Let me ask the gentleman if he himself thinks that this is a good and sound piece of legislation.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I will answer the gentleman by saying that as one Member of the responsible organization of this House I gave my endorsement to this legislation. I gave it unhesitatingly. I will say to my friend that we inherited the Reconstruction Finance Corporation from the former administration. That administration used the powers of the Corporation in its efforts to find temporary relief from the distressed condition under which the people of this country suffer. I think it is only fair and just that the small amount of aid provided for in this bill should be used by this administration as a temporary measure in its efforts to relieve conditions which confront the new administration.

I think it is a wise and constructive thing to do. I gladly take the responsibility so far as I am concerned.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. I wish to get this thing straight, Mr. Speaker. Under the banking bill that was passed to permit the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to closed banks, the closed banks must raise an equal amount of local stock before the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will step in and subscribe to stock in any of those institutions. The people themselves, the stockholders, or the depositors, must raise an amount of stock and match the Reconstruction Finance Corporation loan dollar for dollar.

As this bill was originally passed it provided for a loan on either common or preferred stock. I know these insurance companies have preferred stock. So they can borrow of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation without raising any additional money to repair their capital structure.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is not the provision of the bill. I may say to the gentleman that I am not prepared to say just exactly what rule has been applied to every borrowing bank that has asked aid from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. PARSONS. I have been down there. I know what the rules are.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. Is it not true that this loan is designed for four or five casualty companies instead of life-insurance companies?

Mr. STEAGALL. No; that is not the fact. The provision applies to all insurance companies and to annuity companies, and it is limited in amount to $50,000,000 which, compared to what has been done by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the case of banks is certainly moderate and conservative. In individual instances banks have obtained loans in excess of the total amount of loans that are authorized to be outstanding to all the insurance companies of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCFARLANE) there were—ayes 107, noes 24.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. MCFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GREEN and Mr. MCFARLANE) there were—ayes 113, noes 36.

So the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. STEAGALL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

GOVERNOR OF HAWAII

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Rules, presented the following privileged report for printing in the RECORD under the rule:

House Resolution 176

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 5767, a bill to authorize the appointment of the Governor of Hawaii without regard to his being a citizen or resident of Hawaii, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Territories, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY] may have 20 minutes in which to address the House, and that following his remarks the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] may have a similar amount of time to address the House.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object in order to get some information. Is there any other regular business to come before the House this afternoon?

Mr. BYRNS. Nothing that I know of.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like the gentleman to amend his request by giving me 10 minutes.

AMERICA PROTESTS RACIAL PERSECUTION IN GERMANY

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] have leave to extend his remarks by placing in the RECORD a speech delivered by him at the Mayflower Hotel last night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me at the Mayflower Hotel June 5, 1933, at the dinner of the American Society Against Racial Persecution in Germany:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, it was with pleasure that I voted for the bill in the House of Representatives for the ultimate return of all property of the German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian and for the equitable apportionment amongst all claimants of certain valuable funds held by our Government. I fought and voted for our Nation's gift of $10,000,000 to feed the starving babies of post-war Germany. At that time I felt that the bitterness and rancor of war had disappeared, and was supplanted by the great humanitarian heart and soul of America, desirous of doing justice to the nationals of Germany who suffered untold hardships in the loss of life, limb, and property when caught in the whirlpool of war.

Through the passage of these bills we were not assisting the Imperial Government of Germany but we were helping to rescue Germany that has given to the world such eminent men as Goethe, Schiller, Heine, Lessing, Kant, Shopenhauer, Erlich, Hademan, Wassermann, Koch, Einstein, Wagner, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Holbein, many of whom were Jews and all of whose names are famous in the roles of science, art, literature, philosophy, medicine, economics, music, and painting. The German Nation that has produced such wonderful scholars was proudly welcomed by America in the forefront of the civilized nations of the world.

Today the German Government has been seized by the Ku-Klux Klan of that nation as exemplified through the non-German Hitler. Every ideal and virtue that was symbolized by the great German people has utterly collapsed through the temporary influence wielded by the burlesque Nero of the twentieth century.

Since the World War Germany has been appealing to the world for justice, tolerance, fair play, and a square deal for all its people. It is clamoring and crying for these considerations at this very moment, but while it seeks this humane consideration from the world, its leaders have denied justice, tolerance, fair play, and a square deal to thousands of its own citizens because they are of Jewish extraction.

Since the dispersal of the Jews by Hadrian twelve hundred years ago the Jews have become citizens of the whole world. Wherever they have been found, in every nation of the world, they have contributed to science, art, literature, philosophy, statesmanship, music, medicine, and law. The world has been enriched through their contribution to every deserving cause.

Mr. Chairman, because of the cruel, barbarous, and iniquitous treatment of the "madman of Germany", Hitler, against its racial minorities, I desire publicly to join in proclaiming the present German Government working under Hitler as an outlaw in the family of humanity and unworthy of any consideration because of the inhuman, barbarous treatment it has accorded to the Jewish citizens of that nation.

In this the twentieth century of civilization the time has come when we Americans, liberty loving as we have always been, must raise our voices, through the Membership of the House and Senate, so that religious and racial intolerance, practiced through economic injustice, persecution, and prosecution of any racial or religious minority in any country of the world must cease. In the name of the people of the United States I raise my voice in the chorus which demands that the Hitler despotism grant equal political and economic protection to all of its subjects under its jurisdiction, and, above all, once and for all, that it stop the barbarous and cruel treatment of innocent Jewish citizens and protect their life and property in accordance with the covenants of existing treaties between the Imperial German Government and the Jewish nationals in its domain. That protest should be concurred in by every liberty-loving citizen of every nation on the globe.

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an editorial printed in the Santa Barbara Daily News, which points out that President Roosevelt is not a radical.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object to inserting in the RECORD editorials from various papers.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY] be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes, and following that, the gentleman from Michigan be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. I am sure there will be no objection.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have 5 minutes to address the House.

Mr. BYRNS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will include in my request that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] may have 10 minutes and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN] may have 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, I have observed the custom of returning to Congress every 16 years. I was here 16 years ago, I have come back to make some observations, and I expect to come back in the next 16 years to make further observations. [Applause.] I have generally come here on a landslide and have gone out on a landslide [laughter], and it may be from the telegrams I am receiving about the economy bill that the tide is about to ebb.

However, I propose at this time to speak on the progress of farm-relief legislation under four administrations.

For 12 long years the farmers of the country have been producing and selling under falling values and price levels; have been suffering a failure of earnings and income, forcing down and destroying their tax-paying power, their interest, debt, and mortgage-paying power, their buying and consuming power, their power to provide themselves with the necessaries and to maintain farm upkeep and the improvements and to pay the costs of farm operations. For 12 long years the farmers of the country have been sinking in a vortex of hopeless and irreparable debt, of insolvency, foreclosure, and bankruptcy, living in suspense, dread, and apprehension. For 12 long years the farmers of the country have been pleading, praying, supplicating for relief from the blight of this panic. They have pleaded, prayed, and supplicated to silent Calvin Coolidge, the Sphinx of the White House, but pleaded without recompense, prayed and supplicated all in vain. They have pleaded, prayed, and supplicated to President Herbert Hoover, who gave them the Farm Board, with $500,000,000 appropriation and salaries and overhead galore, bringing a loss and deficit but no farm relief. And now they are pleading, praying, and supplicating to President Franklin D. Roosevelt, who tells them to raise less and have more, to wait in patience and Christian fortitude, and he will act "if, as, and when necessary."

When the blight of this great panic fell upon this fair land of ours, the farmers of the country were a prosperous, happy, and contented people. They were selling or giving up one fourth or not more than one third of their products with which to pay taxes, interest, and fixed charges, and leaving them the other three fourths or two thirds of their earnings, income, or the fruits of their toil to pay with, to buy and consume with, to live with, to provide themselves with the necessaries and some of the comforts and conveniences of life and to lay away a saving for the winter of their declining years. And while they so remained in this prosperous and happy condition they were great and liberal consumers of all the products of factory, mill, and workshop, and industry was kept busy and speeding up to meet their wants and their demands.

But suddenly there came a change to interrupt and reverse this order, this prosperous and happy condition of the people, coming like a bolt from the clear sky, like an avalanche from the mountain, like a devastating tide from the sea. And in the language of the Prairie Farmer:

> In 1920 in almost the twinkling of an eye the condition was reversed. Prices fell to a ruinous low level. The exchange of commodities almost stopped. No one could sell anything at a price that was considered fair. Wheat fell in price in 8 months from $3 to $1.60 per bushel. Corn fell from $1.50 to $0.35 per bushel. Hogs, cattle, and all farm livestock and other farm products fell in proportion.

This panic came in 1920 and not in 1929. The so-called "stock-market crash" in 1929 was not the cause or beginning of the panic. It did not bring on the panic. It was one of the disasters of the panic. It was the result of the panic. It was the culminating effect of the panic, which had begun 8 years before with the fall of values and the price level. The panic began in 1920 and not in 1929.

And values and the price level, beginning then to fall, continued to decline and fall until and before the year 1924. Two million farmers had lost their farms by foreclosure, 2,000,000 more were in default and subject to foreclosure, 7,000,000 acres of farm land had been abandoned for want of sufficient income to live and pay the cost of production. Until and before the year 1924, 2,000,000 people had left the farm in quest of a living wage, only to compete in the bread lines of public and private charity and benevolence for the unemployed in the great cities; until and before the year 1924 farm debts had increased and multiplied until farm debts exceeded the valuation of all farm lands and property, until farmers as a class were insolvent and bankrupt.

Until and before the year 1924 farm values had fallen over $40,000,000,000, farm land falling $20,000,000,000, farm crops and stock falling $19,000,000,000, or an average loss of $5,000 to each and every farmer, or over $1,000 to every man, woman, and child on the farm. Until and before the year 1924, 6,000 farm banks had failed, thousands of farmers had gone insane, others had committed suicide, seeing their life savings fade away and facing want and poverty in the coming winter of old age. And continuously from and since 1924 and from year to year up to this time the farmers have been failing and sinking deeper and deeper into hopeless debt, deeper and deeper into insolvency and bankruptcy.

And until today if all the farm property were sold under the hammer, if all the farm lands were sold, if all the farm crops were sold, if all the farm stock were sold, if all the farm implements were sold, the proceeds would not pay farm debts. Until today, to this time, 10,000 farm banks are insolvent, 5,000,000 farmers are bankrupt, farm land is a crushing liability, farming operations are carried on at a ruinous and disastrous loss. Until today the continuance of the panic has not only destroyed borrowers and mortgagors, who can neither pay interest nor principal, but is destroying the lenders and mortgagees as well, who cannot collect but must take farm land without value in payment of their claims, and the farmers have been left writhing, suffering, in bewildering, confusing mystery as to the cause of the misfortune and distress, as well as to the remedy for relief.

But the panic is no longer a mystery, it is now known, realized and understood as coming, following and in obedience to economic and monetary laws, as fixed, certain, unchanging, and inevitable as the laws of life and death. And the remedy for the sudden fall of values and the price level stand out as clear, open, and apparent as the distinct form of objects in the glare of the noonday sun. And following the Bibical injunction: "Seek and ye shall find, ask and ye shall receive, knock and it shall be opened unto you", on investigation it has been found that following an apparent trivial amendment passed by Congress April 13, 1920, amending section 14 of the Federal Reserve law, the section taking the control of money away from private bankers and financiers and placing that control in the Government, a secret bankers meeting was held May 18, 1920, in Washington, D.C., behind closed doors and drawn curtains and in the very shadows of the Capitol, and in the name and style of "The Orderly Deflation Committee of the American Bankers Association", a secret resolution was passed declaring for the contraction of money and credits and then they folded their tents and as silently moved away. Following this secret bankers' meeting of May 18, 1920, under order of the Federal Reserve Board, the discount rate was raised again and again, the open-market operations functioned and the reserve banks sold bonds and securities, and under the means and mechanism of the Federal Reserve money system the money and currency of the country was contracted and withdrawn from circulation until almost one half of the money and credits was taken and withdrawn from circulation.

No one knew of the meeting. No one knew who attended. No one knew of the resolution passed. And for 2 years, 8 months, and 4 days this meeting was kept a guarded secret. But true to an old saying, "Murder will out", and on the 22d day of February 1923, the manipulating bankers and financiers became involved in a dispute and contention over certain Liberty Loan bonds affected by the resolution passed. In retaliation or revenge the proceedings of the secret meeting was published in the Manufacturer's Record, a newspaper of Baltimore, Md., and for the first time the proceedings of this meeting and the names of the bankers attending were known to the outside world.

It was during these 2 years, 8 months, and 4 days, with the proceedings of this bankers' meeting hidden, covered, concealed, and withheld, that the propaganda was started to confuse, bewilder, and mystify the cause and under which the manipulating financiers led their tools, cat's-paws, and puppets to speak as parrots speak, and to repeat after them in blind, vacant servient stare before the people of the country, this panic is all a mystery. Bandit raiders of the range never hied to deeper caverns. Gang murderers of a city never crept to blacker darkness to cover highway robbery or conceal cold-blooded murder than the international financiers and bankers who maneuvered from afar or pulled the manipulating wires from behind screens and curtains, directing their tools and puppets in the secret bankers' meeting and on the servient Federal Reserve Board fawning to do their will and bidding. [Applause.]

But now after their appeals to Coolidge and after their supplications to Hoover in vain, the farmers are at last to be rewarded for their Christian fortitude and endurance, for their long wait and vigil. They have appealed to President Roosevelt. He has called Congress in special session charged with the one first and paramount duty of providing for farm and industrial relief. Congress has convened in obedience to the call and has determined and agreed upon the cause, the deflation and contraction of money and credits; and has likewise agreed and prescribed the remedy, expansion of the volume and supply of money. The farm bill has been enacted providing for a $2,000,000,000 loan in the name of farm relief, available to somebody, and for crop control by the allotment plan; and Congress has conferred upon the President special powers to expand the currency and thereby raise values and the price level and restore the buying and consuming power. But the powers delegated and conferred are subject and dependent upon the "assent" of the Federal Reserve Board and banks, and further upon international agreement and the discretion of the President to issue currency non-interest-bearing notes to expand the volume and supply of money.

We are now in the administration of the bill, and the farm-mortgage holders are being paid with interest guaranteed. But the farmers are still left owing the debt. The allotment-plan provision for raising less to have more is being postponed for another year. The international financiers and bankers, the misers, and grasping Shylocks, who brought the panic upon the country and who are still controlling the Federal Reserve banks, remain stubborn and hard-hearted, still claiming their relentless pound of flesh and refusing their "assent" and will not let the people go; and the revaluation of gold and the remonetization of silver, alternative measures to expand the currency, are held to await international agreement and the consent of other nations; and the President has not seen fit to exercise the powers conferred in his discretion to issue United States currency notes for the purpose and object contemplated as provided in the farm relief bill.

But now without the expansion step taken, the farmers are called to witness the rise of values and the price level as the fulfillment of a promise of relief. But faith without works is dead. If the powers conferred are not promptly exercised or if there is any wavering to create a doubt as to what remedy will be resorted to, the higher values thus gained will decline and fall to the level from which the rise was taken. But this higher price level is not only psychological, wavering, and uncertain, it may be augmented by speculative maneuvers, always temporary and hazardous, unreliable, undependable as a stable basis. And it may be, and probably is, supported by secret Federal Reserve operations or a concerted bank-credit movement to prevent the issue and circulation of actual money more difficult of manipulation and control.

There is nothing in this higher price level to warrant hesitation or delay in resorting to the expansion measure as agreed, determined upon, and provided for as the means to increase the volume and supply of money and raise values and the price level, and thereby restore the buying and consuming power. This same price rise has occurred and even advanced to higher stages at three different times since the year 1920 and as often has been traced to the secret operations of the Federal Reserve Board and has always been followed by a decline. After the drastic slump and price fall in 1920, beginning early in the year 1924, by the time of the Presidential election in November, prices had been suddenly increased and doubled following which prices fell again. This price rise of 1924 has been shown caused by the Federal Reserve Board, through the open-market operations and the discount rate, as appears at pages 1114 and 1115 of the hearings on H.R. 7895 of the Sixty-ninth Congress. The same rise of values and the price level was brought again in 1928, preceding the Presidential election in November, only beginning earlier and continuing until 1929 and then was followed by the slump, the drastic decline and fall, with the spectacular stock-market crash.

This price rise is different from the preceding movements, because it came following or coincident with the announcement or declaration for an increase in the volume and supply of money, while other movements came secretly, unawares, but following an actual increase of money. While this mere announcement and declaration for an increase in the volume and supply of money has been sufficient to start an upward price movement, it will not of itself sustain higher prices; and unless followed by an actual increase of money, the price level will recede and fall and the advantage gained will be lost. If values and the price level, raised on anticipation, are now allowed to recede or fall, the magic spell of faith and confidence in the new administration will be broken, as confidence was broken in the Hoover administration and the public mind will be left to drift, wandering in quest for a new leader and with hope of relief waiting or deferred, the country will be facing the hazard of chaos and disorder.

The house is afire and burning. The fire engines are arrived at the scene. The water hose is connected. Smoke is pouring and flames are leaping. Why stop to investigate new fire apparatus? Why not start the engines, throw on the water, and then save the building and contents? The ship has foundered and is sinking. The water is fast creeping upon the deck. The crew and passengers are shouting and calling. The life boats are standing by. Why stop to investigate a new life-saving service or a new form of life savers? Why not make the rescue and save the imperiled human life? A man lay sick of a fever. The doctors are in consultation. They have diagnosed the disease. They have agreed upon the remedy. The sick man is sinking. Why wait, postpone, or delay to consider a new theory of medicine? Why not administer the prescription and save the patient?

We are in the throes of panic and depression. Millions are unemployed and suffering. Millions are losing their homes and all. The year of redemption is expiring. Chaos and disorder is menacing, threatening. A new administration has been inaugurated. Congress has been called in special session. The cause has been considered and found. The remedy has been agreed and provided, reflation or expansion of the currency in circulation. The power to administer has been conferred. All is ready and waiting. Time is vital and is running. Why delay, postpone, or wait longer on slow, uncertain, international agreement? Why not exercise the powers conferred? Why not issue and distribute the money, raise values, the price level, restore the buying and consuming power of the people, stop the panic, and avert a crisis?

If the powers conferred by Congress upon the President of the United States to expand the volume and supply of money, to restore the relative value of money and commodity prices, and thereby to raise values, the price level, and the wage scale, and the same distributed through channels to reach evenly the masses, to restore the buying and consuming power of the multitude, the great consuming public—if these powers conferred were now exercised promptly, without hesitation or delay, values, commodity prices, and wages, which have already started upward, rising on the mere announcement and declaration of the step agreed upon and to be taken, would swing upward to a higher and to a normal stage and level, increasing earnings and income of the people, restoring the tax, interest, and debt-paying power and the buying and consuming power of the people.

The effect upon the people and the country would be like magic. The doors of factory, mill, and workshop would stand ajar, swing open; the wheels of industry would start; the whir of machinery in motion, the din of saw and hammer, would sing a song of prosperity returning amid the glad hosannas of rejoicing of 120,000,000 of people, beginning in 30 days. And the farmers of the country would realize and enjoy a rise of values and farm prices and an increase of farm earnings and income by the next grain- and stock-market time.

But the step has not been taken. The farmers are still waiting—now waiting for the "assent" of the Federal Reserve Board and banks, for which they have waited for 12 long years; now waiting for international agreement in the far-away, distant, hazy future; waiting for the consent of other nations. And when the fateful question for what is possible, ready, and at hand, when the currency notes will be issued, the only answer coming back is the echo of their plaintive cry, "If, as, and when necessary."

A $2,000,000,000 loan provided in the name of farm relief is to be used to pay farm lenders, leaving farmers still owing the debts. And the so-called "allotment plan", under which farmers can raise less and have more, is postponed for another year. The farmers are still waiting, still waiting at the farm gate, still waiting at the mail box for the letter that has never come.

When I come to realize the plight of agriculture and the independent individual farm-home owners, millions losing their farms by foreclosure, and other millions by delinquent tax sales, and all sinking in insolvency, bankruptcy, and hopeless debt; when I come to witness and observe the plans and preparation of corporations to take these foreclosed lands and combine these farms and 20,000-acre tracts under corporation-landlord estates; when I see the Agriculture Department taking evidence to create a farm manager bureau to educate and train men as managers to take charge of these foreclosed lands for corporation landlords, with former farm owners as their tenants; when I come to consider my duty in the face of this great farm crisis, I can see our forefathers in the clearing. I can see the dead timber line marking the fertile fields of the future. I can hear the measured stroke of the ax and the echo against the forest wall. I can see the fires burning. I can see the smoke rising. I can sense the charred wood and the burned earth. I can hear the he-o-he of the pioneer calling to his neighbors to roll the log heaps. I can see the flash and glow of heated faces. I can see the great beads of perspiration standing out upon the pioneer's brow. And above and beyond all this, I can see the courage and resolution, the grim determination of these brave men to conquer the forest and the prairie sod for their children and their children's children.

Little did our forefathers dream when they were clearing the forests and breaking the sod that they were clearing the forests and breaking the sod for corporations; that they were clearing the forest and breaking the sod for corporation-landlord estates, where their sons and children were to toil as tenants under corporation managers, under the lash of corporation taskmasters. They believed and were inspired by the belief that they were clearing the forests and breaking the sod for homes for their children and their children's children; that they were clearing the forests and breaking the sod for a community of home owners; that they were toiling to leave a heritage for the future and for the generations to come. And I cannot reconcile my conscience and sense of duty to show these pioneers the honor, respect, and gratitude which is due them as great benefactors without defending this heritage with all my strength and every power I can command.

I have a farm in Indiana with forests and streams, with fields and pasture woodlands. I love that farm home above all I have, but not more than other farmers love their farms. I want to live there my own way. I want to worship God there my own way. I want to serve my country and humanity and my fellow man there my own way. I want to toil and labor in the open sunlight. I want to earn my bread by the sweat of my brow, free and untrammeled, in my own way and as I love to labor to live. I want to take solace and consolation there in my last retiring years from the falling leaves, from the fading flowers, from the ripening grain, from the sear and yellow leaf, from the closing seasons declared in various changing colors, there abiding nature's eternal plan, and there to lay down the burdens of life for the last long response to sleep in the bosom of Mother Earth, which gave me birth and being and to embrace me and to claim me back again. [Applause.]

You ask me what I will do in the face of this great farm crisis, this menace to the individual farmers, to the independent farm-home owners. I will tell you what I will try to do. I will try to expose this piracy of American agriculture, this conspiracy to break down the independent, individual farmers, and to make them tenants under corporation landlords. I will first resort to all civil and peaceful means. I will try to warn the farmers of the impending danger. I will try to arouse them in defense in time before the chains and shackles are forged upon them.

Then I will be ready to say the last word and take the last steps in the cause of farm relief. I will then be ready to join my farmer neighbors in Indiana, and with them the farmers of Wisconsin, Minnesota, and the Dakotas, and with them the farmers of Iowa, Kansas, and Illinois, and with them the farmers of the Middle West and great Northwest, and with them I will be ready to meet the landlord corporations at the gateway of American agriculture, at the threshold of the farm gate. And with them I will be ready to say to these invading landlords these lands are sacred, hallowed grounds, and every inch of which will be defended with life's last lingering throb and to the death.

I will be ready to say with them, "Before you gain a foothold here you will have to wade your way through a sea of fire, flame, of flesh and blood; and before you take these lands for a corporation-landlord estate, with our sons and children as your tenants to toil under corporation managers, under the lash of corporation taskmasters, you will have to walk over the prostrate forms of our dead bodies."

And when farm relief fails here, I will be ready to take up farm relief there; there under the higher laws of life; there under the first law of nature; there under the law of self-defense; there under the law of self-preservation; there under the law of life and existence; there under the magna carta ordained by a higher power, guaranteeing the right of men to live upon the earth, to labor to live, and to take the fruits of that labor for their own support and for the support of those who by nature are dependent upon them. I would rather die fighting, I would rather sacrifice these few last remaining years in defense of the heritage left by our forefathers, than to live one day upon these lands as a tenant under corporation landlords. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I therefore ask unanimous consent for the present and immediate consideration of the resolution which I offer and ask consent for it to be read in my time.

[Seventy-third Congress, first session. In the House of Representatives of the United States]

Mr. GRAY submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed:

"House Concurrent Resolution 22

"Whereas the country remains suffering and in the throes of an industrial depression in which millions are held in enforced idleness, in want, distress, humiliation, and despair; and

"Whereas millions are losing their property, homes, and their all by judgments on default of debts, foreclosure of mortgages, tax sales, and involuntary bankruptcy, with the exemption year or period expired or expiring; and

"Whereas the disorders of the panic have continued and have been prolonged until the people have been exhausted of their means to live and until the temper of the public mind is fast becoming wavering, unstable, and threatening chaos, and disorder is impending; and

"Whereas a new governmental administration has been called and commissioned by the people to restore normal prosperity conditions, to act with deliberate promptness, without delay, and Congress has been summoned in special session to consider the cause and determine upon the remedy and to act with diligence and in accordance with the emergency to be met; and

"Whereas Congress on full inquiry concluded has found the cause to be the fall of values, prices, and the wage scale, which has destroyed the buying and consuming power of the people and has likewise agreed upon the remedy for relief, the expansion of currency and credits as the means to raise values and the price level and restore the buying and consuming power; and

"Whereas the Congress on such determination to facilitate and expedite the remedy for relief has delegated and conferred its vested powers and jurisdiction upon the President of the United States to act for and in its stead; and

"Whereas on such announcement and declaration of policy, psychologically and in anticipation of the step to be taken, values and commodity prices have advanced and raised to higher levels and are now so held wavering in abeyance, awaiting the conferred powers to be exercised or a declaration of the time and manner the step will be taken; and

"Whereas the fall of values and the price level now would destroy psychological force so exerted which prompted and now sustains the higher values and the price level and the magic spell of confidence inspiring the people with buoyant hope would be greatly impaired or broken; and

"Whereas in the nature of the situation and the economic state and condition of the country time is a vital, critical element and has become the very essence of the remedy: Be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (the Senate thereof concurring), That in pursuance with and in obedience to the purpose and intention of Congress in surrendering and conferring upon the President of the United States certain powers under and by virtue of section 43 of an act of Congress entitled 'An act to increase agricultural purchasing power and for other purposes', approved May 12, 1933, the same being powers vested in Congress under section 8 of article I of the Constitution, the President proceed in the immediate exercise of such power to cause the remonetization of silver or the revaluation of gold or the expansion of the volume and supply of money by resort to the instrumentalities of the Federal Reserve System, if the powers thereof can be invoked in the exercise of positive governmental force and without the delay and uncertainty of obtaining the 'assent' of the Federal Reserve Board and banks, or by causing to be issued United States non-interest-bearing currency notes, all as provided for in said act, and accordingly as one or the other as such currency means and agencies can be resorted to under such delegation of powers which will accomplish the object and purpose of such provisions of said act most speedily, promptly, and without delay."

[Applause.]

THE OLD QUESTION—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a telegram from the Texas Railroad Commission on the oil question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PARSONS). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegram from the Texas Railroad Commission on the oil question:

AUSTIN, TEX., June 3, 1933.

Hon. STERLING P. STRONG,
House of Representatives:

East Texas oil field now under control since 3-judge Federal court refused injunctions against our last order. Production yesterday 20,000 barrels under the allowable. Commission is now making exhaustive pressure tests to ascertain whether alleged excessive pressure declines are true and has called hearing for June 12 to examine results of these tests and such corrective measures as are shown necessary by proof will be taken.

TEXAS RAILROAD COMMISSION,
ERNEST O. THOMPSON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL], under a previous arrangement, is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, you are all aware of the financial storm which leveled the fortunes of the people of Michigan. You may not, however, know that the losses involved nearly 800,000 bank depositors in Detroit alone, and have largely destroyed in assets between seven and eight hundred million dollars. The paralyzing effect of this unheard-of bank failure cannot be described nor comprehended. Its effect touched every merchant, every manufacturer, and every parish and congregation in Michigan. Commerce and industry throughout the Middle West was jarred to the foundation and trade recovery delayed. This financial quake swallowed the life savings of the industrious, provident worker. It has snatched from the widow and from the estate left for the benefit of the widow and her children the patrimony which a thoughtful and considerate husband left to provide for her future and for the education of his children.

This historical failure, without precedent in the history of banking, has caused a trail of broken hearts and suicides that cannot be estimated. Its killing effect can never be appraised. It has stifled progress and withered the confidence of the people of Michigan to the point of hopelessness.

Involved in this colossal failure without culpability are hundreds of small up-State banks which failed to reopen because their money was tied up in this gigantic Detroit combine which crashed of its own weight. Banks located in Toledo, Cleveland, and other nearby cities were jeopardized by the unprecedented demands which might be called "runs." Hoarding and the use of safety-deposit boxes as repositories of withdrawn cash caused a stringency which endangered the structure of banking within a radius of hundreds of miles of Detroit.

Sorely needed welfare funds of the city of Detroit and pension funds of the Detroit police, of superannuated teachers, of firemen, of the Couzens crippled children's fund, cash balances of other organizations have been tied up and in most instances hopelessly impaired, and yet there seems to be very little attention paid to the liability of those who were directing the destinies of the Detroit Bankers Co., the First National Bank of Detroit, the Guardian Union Group, Inc., and the Guardian National Bank of Commerce before the fatality occurred.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. Yes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. In order to ask one question with reference to the percentage of banks that have reopened.

Mr. DINGELL. I could not tell the gentleman that at this time, but the greater percentage of them are still closed.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman tell the amount involved in the banks that have opened and in those that are still closed?

Mr. DINGELL. No; but I say that the major portion of the banks of Michigan are still closed, and they are very largely tied up in this smash that occurred in Detroit.

Mr. DONDERO. And that applies to the rest of the country?

Mr. DINGELL. I would not say it applies to the rest of the country.

I might digress here for a moment to state that at this moment a former Governor of the State of Michigan, Mr. Alex Groesbeck, now receiver for the Guardian-Union National Bank group, said that he intends to oppose any movement or any action which would place the responsibility upon the stockholders, by which a levy would be assessed against them on the ground that the legal basis for assessment is unsound. This gentleman is drifting far afield. It does not make any difference what was the cause of the failure, the double-liability laws should apply and the stockholders must assume their responsibility for the benefit of the depositors who are above all others the innocent sufferers.

There was apparently no intention to levy an assessment, which is provided for under the law. Pressure and wide-spread demand forced a belated consideration of such action. The double-liability assessment would make available additional payments to the depositors, and any delay of a 100-percent levy would be criminal in view of the wide-spread losses and the need of the unfortunate depositors.

In this connection I must add that I was amazed when I read in Detroit newspapers recently the statement made by a Federal judge which shows about the way officials and higher-ups generally feel toward the unfortunate depositor. I am not here to do any "skinning" or to "hang any pelts on my barn door", but the statement of Judge Arthur J. Tuttle, of the United States district court, as regards the unfortunate depositors who have lost their savings in the defunct Detroit banks cannot go unchallenged.

He referred to those who lost their money through no fault of their own as the "luckiest people in the world", and that "these depositors do not deserve all of the tears they are giving and getting." His remarks would shock anyone of even crude sensibilities. My reaction is that Judge Tuttle was prejudiced in favor of the banking fraternity, and I do not wonder, because he is himself a banker. His comparison of the depositor in a bank with holders of stocks and with purchasers of real estate is grotesque and very unbecoming. He should be the first to concede that the relationship between a bank and its depositors is the sacred relationship of a creditor and a debtor.

The fact that a 50-cent piece will buy more ham and eggs at Judge Tuttle's farm, as he stated, had no bearing on the case before the court, as far as I can see; and while it is true that the bankers, by their short-sighted policy of deflation and merger encouragement, brought this condition about, yet they should not be given any credit when an important case is being considered in Judge Tuttle's court. However, by his remarks the judge automatically disqualified himself from sitting in the case of Depositors against Bankers when he revealed his attitude of prejudice. Yet, as a banker, with the arrogant view of a banker, he sat and rendered a decision against the depositors.

In view of the suspicions and the general resentment on the part of the sorely tried and financially exhausted people of my State and city, and in view of the fact that the atmosphere is surcharged with a sentiment that is dangerous if confidence is not restored, I believe that the banking situation in Detroit requires some very thorough sifting.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is the gentleman dealing with the national-bank situation or with State banks?

Mr. DINGELL. I am dealing specifically with the bank situation in Detroit which indirectly has affected the entire country. They are both members of the Federal Reserve System; and on numerous occasions witnesses in our Federal and State courts have testified that Governor Comstock was persuaded to call the "bank holiday" in Michigan by Mr. Leyburn, a national-bank examiner, and his Federal Reserve associates, after which these banks and hundreds of others have never again opened their doors.

At any rate, the people of Michigan are entitled to know at least what has happened to their banks and what was the cause of the wrecking. Congress should go into this matter as the only agency that will not be hemmed in by petty local influences and as a body which will recognize no limitations, which can summon witnesses from beyond its own State borders, and as a tribunal which will render a decision solely and only upon its findings irrespective of whom it might harm or favor. The President of the United States in his inaugural address has said that the money changers must be driven out of the temple, but here we have an example, forsooth, where they have been kicked from the temple into the sanctuary.

Members of the boards of directors of the defunct banks are in partnership with the United States Government which created the lone governmental bank which exists in Detroit today and the genius of the wrecked structure is the power and the directing force of the new institution.

Nobody but the depositor seems to be concerned about the underlying cause which wrecked the greatest banking systems between Chicago and New York and which was the greatest financial failure in the history of the world. Will the governmental agencies in smug complacency assume that whatever happened was inevitable and, therefore, all right?

It is my contention, and I know that the Members of this House will agree with me, when I say that it is mandatory that this matter be thoroughly investigated in order that we may, through the findings and experience, prevent the repetition of similar failures in the future. That is the least Congress can do. The people will not be satisfied with less.

It is inconceivable that any considerable opposition could be mustered to prevent an investigation of this kind.

At this place I should like to read a letter from Chairman FLETCHER, of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, which has done so much in the interest of the public and for good government:

JUNE 5, 1933.

Hon. JOHN D. DINGELL,
House of Representatives.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Referring to yours of the 3d, I would say that in my opinion there is a real need for a thorough investigation in reference to what has transpired in connection with the banks in Detroit.

Our committee is restricted in its authority, and although we have been appealed to by various localities to look into their banking situation, it would extend our inquiry far beyond its original purpose and consume an enormous amount of time and lead to very considerable expense.

Your resolution bears directly on this particular situation, and I hope you will succeed in having it adopted.

Incidentally, I observe by the press that the attorney general of Michigan is taking steps, which, no doubt are fully warranted, and you will probably be able to cooperate with him.

Very respectfully and sincerely yours,

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, Chairman.

Let me point out to you that the people who are concerned directly and vitally in the crash believe, and information from reliable sources seems to support their beliefs, that "wise money" was withdrawn after the declaration of the bank holiday. It is also charged that unsecured loans amounting to millions of dollars were made to members of the board of directors and certain influential stockholders.

The First National Bank of Detroit made loans of $180,000,000—sixty million of the amount was past due and in technical default. Its mortgage-loan department was negligent; it is admitted that the bank did not make tax searches to see that borrowers were keeping up tax payments, though they knew taxes constituted a prior lien and amounted to a first mortgage.

Insurance companies make tax searches every 6 months on all real-estate loans.

That the new National Bank of Detroit had a difficult time in selecting $21,000,000 in mortgages out of a $150,000,000-mortgage portfolio indicates the condition of this institution as regards their mortgages.

There is a wealth of information cropping out at the surface; more can be had without any difficulty. The Detroit Times in a series of articles called "Vanishing Millions", which should be followed up, makes some startling disclosures. A magazine called "The Real Detective", for the month of June tells "The Truth About Michigan, the Plundered State." I would advise Members of the House who are interested to read some of the statements and charges made in this publication.

Farsighted and well-informed citizens of Detroit believe that the holding companies and their dummy stockholders will never yield a single solitary cent under the double-liability provision of the law. This belief is based upon the financial standing of the dummy stockholders. There can be no question but that the Government is morally responsible and should be interested in recovering for the depositors every available cent, because the Government of the United States did not raise its finger to block the creation of the bank trust, namely, the Detroit Bankers Co., which controlled the First National Bank of Detroit, and the Guardian Union Group, Inc., which controlled the Guardian National Bank of Commerce. There was no earthly excuse for its existence except to control the destinies of the great metropolitan city of Detroit and of the State of Michigan, and which were organized for the purpose of being able to dictate on a parity with other arch combines of this Nation.

In the heyday of its glory, before mergers, combines, and consolidations were tolerated and became popular, Detroit had wellnigh onto a score of prosperous, well-managed, separate, and independent banks with hundreds of branches established for the convenience and for the service of the people.

Gradually this selfish hysteric movement toward centralized financial control applied heat and pressure which welded into two readily controllable masses nearly all of the independent banks, which became known as the "Detroit Bankers Co." and the "Guardian Union Group, Inc."

Some time ago the United States Senate undertook to investigate the stock market and some of the big bankers of the East. They assumed, as a matter of senatorial privilege and for the benefit of the people, to delve into the practice and the policy of banking institutions that were going concerns, that were operating, and which at this time are still doing business—institutions wherein the public has not lost its deposits. On the surface everything appeared orderly, and there was no outward sign of illicit practice in the conduct of the business; yet in spite of this reassuring surface appearance, the Senate investigators, under the able direction of Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, and assisted by Ferdinand Pecora, discovered one Charles E. Mitchell, chairman of the National City Bank, of New York City, a sneaking, sniveling thief, and a cutthroat, who has been picking the pockets of an unsuspecting, generous American public. He posed as a gentleman banker and moved in select, respectable circles, but he did not fool the Senate, nor is the Senate yet satisfied. It proposes to carry on its investigation still further. Other banking institutions may yield some very valuable front-page matter to enlighten the American public as to our banking system in America and as to its treasonable practices.

For the past few days J. Pierpont Morgan, whose name has been connected with American banking and finance for many years, has been cross-examined by Mr. Pecora, and we learn that among the select clientele of the Morgan interests are such illustrious names as that of Charles Gates Dawes, who, by the way, gained his reputation through profanity and by the use of an underslung pipe, and whose pedigree dates back to the Lorimer bank scandal in 1911. He was smart enough to shed his silk breeches in London and rush home in time to place as collateral a lot of worthless Insull securities and obtain some eighty or ninety million dollars from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for his faltering bank system in Chicago. Incidentally Mr. Dawes was at one time Vice President of the United States of America.

We also find listed as preferred customers of Mr. Morgan the names of the late Calvin Coolidge, John J. Raskob, Joseph R. Nutt, William H. Woodin, Norman H. Davis, Richard Whitney, and the illustrious Charles E. Mitchell, formerly of the National City Bank, who is now on trial for tax evasion; E. Brooke Lee, the stalwart Maryland political leader; Myron C. Taylor, of the United States Steel Corporation; and a list of other very prominent men.

At the insistence of the Morgan aides, the name of John W. Davis was also included.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. Referring to the investigation that is taking place in the Senate, the gentleman is aware of the fact that the committee has today decided not to go into the tax matters, which Mr. Pecora was trying to go into, which is some indication that this whole investigation is being whitewashed.

Mr. DINGELL. That may be entirely possible. There is a great deal of pressure to stop it and has been all the way through.

Mr. McFADDEN. Information which comes to me in the last few minutes indicates that the hearing is to be postponed until September. I should like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this committee cannot well afford to stop the investigation now. There are other houses that are equally guilty in tax matters, as well as in the exploitation of the public.

Mr. DINGELL. It is my belief that public sentiment will see to it that that investigation will not be stopped. As a matter of fact, in all probability, its scope of operation will be enlarged.

If the Senate continues its well-planned work and if the House adopts Resolution 58, I predict that stretcher bearers who will bring to our courts sick bankers will be so much in demand as to solve partially the unemployment question.

Recently Mr. John W. Pole, former Comptroller of the Currency, shocked the Nation and the Senate investigators when he stated that "defalcations are common matters in the Comptroller's office." He calmly admitted that "defalcations of bank presidents are common." Charles Mitchell's peculations and outright thievery, along with Harriman's shady deals and false entries, however, might be likened to the fruits of a petty pickpocket as compared with the tremendous losses sustained by the people of Detroit and of Michigan.

If there are irregularities which caused the ruin of the banks of Detroit, the people of this Nation are entitled to know what they are and who permitted them.

In an interview the Secretary of the Treasury, William Woodin, admitted to me and to my Detroit colleagues that the Detroit banks were hopelessly insolvent and could not possibly be reorganized. This was shortly after March 4. Bank examiners a short time before pronounced these same institutions as sound. What then has happened so suddenly that paralyzed and laid low this giant of finance? Was it perhaps the withdrawal of huge sums of money of "wise depositors who were tipped off"? Did large sums of American money withdrawn from Detroit banks reach English banks for safe-keeping?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] has expired.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. ZIONCHECK]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGELL. The Bank of England at or about that time issued a statement that the amount of American money that was arriving by transfer was proving an embarrassment.

A persistent rumor is rampant that the Morgan interests took a hand in the establishment of the National Bank of Detroit, and, in spite of all denials to the contrary, there are some very interesting sidelights that might well be taken into consideration. We have a man in Detroit by the name of Henry Ford. I think most of the Members of this House have at some time or other heard the name. It is invariably connected with the well-known initials "f.o.b." In fact, he was the man who made "f.o.b. Detroit" a common, everyday expression the world over. Mr. Ford had, in several instances, brushed against Wall Street and against the Morgan interests. I do not know that he won his battle each time, but I do know that he remained the untamed master of his own destinies.

When the Governor of Michigan declared a bank holiday at the request of one of the two large banks, it became an evident fact that at least this bank would not be able to reopen, and within a few days it was conceded that the situation was hopeless for both banks. Mr. Ford agreed to take over both institutions and planned to rehabilitate them with sufficient new capital to serve the community, but he stipulated certain conditions. First, he stipulated that the presidents and the boards of directors of both banks must abdicate unconditionally and as stockholders become subject to an assessment; second, Mr. Ford, as the sole and undisputed owner, reserved the right to nominate the new president and the board of directors. There was no intention on the part of the motor magnate to recede from the original plan or to modify his conditions in the slightest degree. The people were hopeful, but just when it appeared that abject submission on the part of the boards of directors of both institutions was at hand an unseen force entered into the negotiations and the Ford plan was completely dissipated—blown to the four winds without leaving a trace.

The Membership of the House knows that Mr. Ford is a man of positive convictions. He is a man of rugged honesty, self-made, and concededly quite successful and old-fashioned enough to believe that banks are public-service institutions and are to be conducted for the benefit of the community and of its people. Naturally there would be a clash of interests if Mr. Ford entered the banking field on a large scale, and the question arose whether the professional Wall Street bankers' influence should prevail in Detroit or whether a Ford idealism should take root.

If Ford were to be as successful in banking as he was in the conduct of the Ford Motor Co., of the railroad business, and in the production of steel, then the future of Wall Street's domination and of Morgan influence in the field of finance was challenged, if not seriously threatened.

I am wondering if the Mills-Ballantine-Awalt combination in the Treasury Department had any connection with the substitute plan under which Mr. Ford was definitely and completely eliminated. Of course, no one would be foolhardy enough to deny that Mr. Mills knows anything about Morgan's wishes. In fact I think it will be quite generally conceded that they are rather close in their associations and that the Wall Street king knows him by his first name. It would have been a very dangerous and needless exposure and risk on the part of the board of directors of these institutions to permit Ford to delve into the records, assuming, of course, that there might have been something wrong. It would have been like placing your neck into the stocks without a struggle; and so the new bank was proposed, and today the last chapter of Detroit's inglorious banking history is about to be written.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGELL. The good people of Detroit were ravished by a scoundrel system that has fed upon humanity like an ogre. This organized method of thievery, gross violation of confidence, the wrecking of fortunes, gambling, manipulations, and carelessness has grown consistently at a greater pace than the Nation itself has grown. Each time that this curse of mismanagement and banketeering descended upon an unfortunate community—and frequently it struck twice in the same place—the toll was greater, the devastation more shocking.

Will Congress assume the fearless course as a tribunal of the people or will Congress, like the ostrich, bury its head in the sand? I am pleading for the truth. If these indications are but mere coincidents, if the banks were properly administered, if the depression alone was responsible for the ruin of the First National Bank and of the Guardian National Bank of Commerce, then the people are entitled to know and the bankers should be given a clean bill of health; but I am not so certain as to the outcome if the statement is true which Mr. Woodin made to me in the presence of my colleagues, "that when the truth is known, a lot of people are going to jail."

It appears, now that destruction is complete, and that the courageous people of my State and of the dynamic city of Detroit are striving to reestablish and to rebuild their ruined fortunes, that an unfriendly, disappointed political element, and a bitterly partisan press, in several instances, have attempted to make political capital by building, upon suspicions and misinformation, a structure in which it is hoped they might revitalize lost political power. Obviously they seek to convey to the people of my State the impression that the banks were solvent, that they were unimpaired, and that the Roosevelt administration had bungled and deliberately mishandled the situation. They are trying to convey to the public the impression that the liquidation of assets should have brought more to the depositors than the amount thus far paid under governmental direction.

They feign to believe that the banks should never have been closed when as a matter of fact, if the truth is known, these banks should have been closed 6 months prior to March 4, rather than by proclamation of President Roosevelt.

Screaming headlines in the newspapers, "United States wrecked two big banks here by official bungling, both before and after holiday edict, Groesbeck charges"; "Public bank hearing approved"; "Charges United States ruined bank"; convey the impression that the administration has bungled this entire bank set-up. All the way through political demagogues are making political capital of a very tragic situation in the State of Michigan. Every day in some Michigan newspaper we find charges that things have been bungled. The conservative press of Detroit is anxious that we have an investigation and, I add that an unfriendly, bitterly partisan press is trying to make capital of this situation. I believe the House should at the earliest possible date consider Resolution No. 58 and by its passage clarify the entire situation.

Certain newspapers of the State, true to the traditions of journalism, are standing by and printing the truth irrespective of whom it might harm or favor, and I predict that long after the paupers of the newspaper world are buried in the Potter's field of journalism, in unmarked graves, and forgotten, the virile, upstanding, fearless press of Detroit and of Michigan will continue to live for the best interests of our people. [Applause.]

PERSECUTION OF THE GERMAN JEWISH PEOPLE—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, last night at the Mayflower Hotel our brilliant and distinguished majority leader made a very brilliant and eloquent address on a subject in which I am very greatly interested and with which I totally agree. I ask unanimous consent that his address, delivered before the American National Conference at the Mayflower Hotel, may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered last night before the American National Conference at the Mayflower Hotel by the distinguished majority leader of the House, Mr. BYRNS:

Mr. Toastmaster, ladies, and gentlemen, I want at the outset of my brief remarks to register my opposition to intolerance wherever it shows its head.

Society has been in the making for centuries and all people of reason and understanding look forward to the day when human conflict will have finally reached the end of a trail which has left blood and tears in its wake.

There is no place in what might be called "the Book of Life" that gives one people the right to maim and outlaw another people except by the right of might.

You are met to protest against racial persecution in Germany.

The persecution of the German Jewish people as reported is incomprehensible when one considers the contributions made to German civilization by this people. Anyone who is even superficially acquainted with the record of German Jewry in the fields of art, letters, jurisprudence, medicine, and science in general, as well as various other endeavors, cannot help but wonder why the German people do not pay homage to this great race for all its contributions that it has made to German culture, to the German State, and to humanity in general. Instead of this, we learn that these people are being singled out and persecuted under the new German Government, and that this persecution is definitely a governmental policy—I repeat it is incomprehensible.

The Jewish people possess a longer and probably more interesting history when viewed from every angle, than any other race which has lived on this earth; they have made vast contributions to human development. True, like every other people, they have faults, but if a race is to be crucified for its shortcomings, I know of no race that would be permitted to survive. We who accept the Christian teaching of the brother of man and the fatherhood of God as a precept upon which to build the good life must remember that St. Paul, the founder of Christianity, was a Jew. I do not want to touch upon the religious side of the question. I am one of those who believe that man has the right to worship in his own way. I would much rather approach the subject from the human standpoint. However, it would be well on this occasion to touch upon some phases of Jewish history.

The history of the Jewish people is an open book; from the day of their birth as a nation they have not lived for a day in seclusion. What they have done for their own race and humanity in general are facts that cannot be controverted by racial theories.

In the ancient period it is the Bible that stands out as a monument of cultural enlightenment which served as the foundation of European and American civilization.

But Jewish accomplishments were not confined merely to the Bible. Their influence has been felt in every field of human endeavor throughout the ages. In the Alexandrian civilization the Jews were in the forefront. Civilization for centuries obtained great benefits from the source of Philo and his contemporaries, who matched their brains with the brains of the Greeks of the period of Aristotle and Plato. In the Middle Ages they kept the torch of civilization burning. It was to a great extent Semitic genius that saved for us the blessings of culture; and it was due partially to their influence that the two great movements, the Renaissance and the Reformation, were born, which launched humanity upon a new way of life.

When we speak of the Reformation every student of history knows that this movement had its roots in a proper understanding of the Old Testament, which became popular due to the realistic interpretation of Jewish savants and teachers, who because of their knowledge of Hebrew made the old Bible and its blissful ideals accessible to Christianity.

In modern times wherever Jews were permitted to drink at the source of knowledge they have helped to enrich culture with their great genius and originality. The Jew has been impressive not only in the realm of finance and commerce, but also in poetry, the arts, science, and inventions. In fact, there is no field in which Jewish genius has not made its mark. I believe that the Jew, assertions to the contrary notwithstanding, is not a materialist but an idealist. He seems to have the quality of linking idealism to realism, which is a far cry from materialism. The Jews have suffered martyrdom reminiscent only of the first Christians, who were largely Jews. Martyrdom is the badge of the race. A race that has stood united for 2,000 years and clings to its ideals and race in spite of all persecutions cannot be characterized as a materialistic people.

But it is not only in abstract science that the Jews have excelled; not only in philosophy and mathematics in which they are leaders. They have excelled in physics as well as in chemistry. They have an illustrious record in the field of invention. In this very city of Washington we had one of the greatest inventors, who hailed from Germany, Emil Berliner, who could rightly be compared to our great Edison. And under Edison, as everyone knows, worked a man who helped to create these marvelous inventions which have changed the face of our country. The man I speak of was the late and lamented Steinmetz, who was a German Jew, the wizard of electricity, as he was justly called.

We in the South know that the Jew proved to be patriotic under the most trying circumstances, and that his loyalty is unmatched and his ability unexcelled. As one example, I may mention Judah Benjamin, who not only was a great statesman but made a contribution, in the last century, to English jurisprudence which called for the admiration of all lawgivers.

With us in the United States at present are upward of four and one half millions of the Jewish race. They are part of us and we recognize them as such. In our country they have equal opportunity to move forward, and because of their exceptional ability, and in many instances their brilliancy, we find them holding some of the most important posts in our country. In the highest court of our land, the Supreme Court of the United States, there are two members of this race whose legal talents shine with luster.

There are several members in the House of Representatives. They are represented in our individual States from the governorships down. We find them in our universities and at other institutes of learning. In every line of endeavor they have decided upon in this country they have, without exception, proved their worth. They are a loyal people and have rendered real service in the development of our country and I want to take this opportunity to pay my respect and tribute to them and to say that any experience that I have had with the members of this race is to their credit.

We who know that our American civilization was founded by Puritans, who were imbued with the Biblical spirit, fail to understand this nefarious philosophy of Jewish inferiority. Why fear this people when it helped Germany excel in every field of human enterprise? How can we speak of them as inferiors and at the same time degrade them on the theory that if left alone they will become a dominant race? The Nazi government in its attempt to isolate the Jew may find itself isolated. They endeavor to paint the Jew as a low sort of being, but by reading the list of names of scientists and artists they have expelled, they prove to the world that they have expelled men of a superior race, who helped to make German universities, German art centers, and German civilization great and famous.

I am not at all afraid for the future of the Jewish people. I do not believe that the Nazi government, even with the acquiescence of the German people, which I deny, can destroy the Jewish race. Whoever the Almighty has not cursed no Balaam could curse. It is humiliating and pitiful to see a great people at its lowest ebb. There is justice in the world and there is a day of reckoning. The former German government found that out almost 2 decades ago and it behooves the present German Government to think twice before deciding to destroy a great race in whose existence humanity itself is interested.

It is a friendly warning. The treatment of the Jew in Germany is not a domestic affair. It concerns us all as Christians and as friendly neighbors. The Nazi government or any other form of government which is oppressive must fail, and in this instance I hope that the German people will call a halt to it before it is too late.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, the newspapers a day or two ago carried a story that the Senate Finance Committee had seen fit to strike out of the public recovery bill the licensing provision. I have the bill before me now, which was reported yesterday by the Senate Finance Committee to the Senate, and I see that that licensing provision has been put back in the bill but has been limited to 1 year instead of 2 years.

I should like to call the attention of the House to a few facts showing why it is necessary to keep that licensing provision in the bill. I should prefer to see it provide for 2 years; but, at any rate, I think if it goes for 1 year it will remedy conditions which are very bad in industry, as well as labor conditions in industry today, will do much to help out unemployment in the country, and will be kept permanently in the law thereafter when the people realize what it really means. I do not believe in bringing up other States only as examples of bad labor conditions. I believe in going to my own State first.

Massachusetts is supposed to have possibly the best labor laws of any State in the Union, yet under these fine labor laws we have conditions such as are set out in the following excerpts, for instance, from newspapers in Springfield, Mass.:

SPRINGFIELD, May 20.—Sweatshop conditions which have crept into Springfield, at one time one of the wealthiest cities in the western part of Massachusetts, have caused a 50-percent reduction in the weekly earnings of Springfield working girls.

Miss Ruth Fisher, industrial secretary of the Springfield Young Women's Christian Association, conducted a survey to find the exact reductions girls have been forced to assume during these critical times.

Her findings, in addition to the investigation conducted by the Boston Evening American, the Boston Sunday Advertiser, the Massachusetts Bureau of Industries, the Consumers' League of Massachusetts, and the Simmons College of Social Work, reveal that the sweatshops have taken their toll of girl labor and caused the general breakdown of industrial standards in Springfield.

"Because the public as a buyer has sought sweatshop goods in sales, the general level of wages formerly paid in legitimate industry has dropped tremendously", she told the Sunday Advertiser.

BELOW COST OF LIVING

"Even the early reports from industrial workers attending the 'Y' who have been keeping a record of their hours and wages have shown that the purchasing power of the average worker is far less than required for a minimum standard of living. The average weekly amount thus far is $10.09. And this amount must be used to look after members of her family who have been unable to obtain work.

"Hand in hand with the depression has come the general breakdown of industrial standards in Springfield. Although the workers engaged in representative industries, from electrical equipment to jig-saw puzzles, have managed to survive far better than those in a mill town, the standard of living has been forced to a low level and wages which ordinarily would afford a minimum standard to the worker have suffered tremendously.

"Due to the sweatshop and unscrupulous employers taking advantage of the plight of labor and girls whose philosophy is that a little money is better than none, competitive industry has been forced to reduce its wages to less than a living standard.

$10.09 AVERAGE WAGE

"In most of the cases reported in the study the girl is contributing her money to a family budget and in some instances is the only wage earner. In many instances the minimum wage law has been completely ignored by employers who ordinarily would meet its provisions."

We have a minimum wage law in Massachusetts. In the hearings before the Committee on Labor on the 5-day week, 30-hour bill, I brought out the fact that in one case where the cost of living was shown to be $14 a week the minimum wage board declared the minimum rate to be $13.50. In other words, I do not know how they figured an employee was going to live when having said that the lowest amount on which they could live was $14 a week, they then set the wage at $13.50.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Was the minimum wage of $13.50 enforced?

Mr. CONNERY. No; they had no way of enforcing it. The employers were supposed to post the wage they were paying, but the authorities could not follow it up and put them in jail, as they ought to.

Mr. GRANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. GRANFIELD. I am in thorough sympathy with the gentleman's attitude on the subject he is discussing.

Mr. CONNERY. This is just Springfield. I am going to refer later to other cities in Massachusetts—Lawrence, New Bedford, and Fall River.

Mr. GRANFIELD. Springfield is a city in my district. Does the survey the gentleman referred to give the names of any of the sweatshops located in Springfield?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Or in Connecticut?

Mr. CONNERY. No names of the firms referred to are given as to Springfield. The Milchen Shoe Co. is mentioned, but that is in Lawrence, in my own district. My own home city of Lynn has labor conditions which are just as bad. I shall read a few more excerpts whether they are in my district or not. If they are in my district, I shall be very glad to show them up.

Mr. GRANFIELD. If we have these conditions in Springfield, I should like to have the names of the manufacturers or the industries operating under sweatshop conditions. I have always opposed sweatshops and I stand ready to go the very limit to drive them out.

Mr. CONNERY. The names of companies in Springfield are not mentioned; their names are not given.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. How about Connecticut? Does it mention the names of any sweatshops in Connecticut?

Mr. CONNERY. I refer the gentleman to the hearings before the Committee on Labor. We have tons of this sort of stuff in the report of that hearing.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. Does the article say anything about the dirty, rotten sweatshops in Pennsylvania?

Mr. CONNERY. Of course we all know that Mrs. Pinchot, the wife of the Governor of that State, went out on picket duty with the strikers of that State as a protest against the infamous condition of little children working in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Does the gentleman know the Government is imposing sweatshop conditions here in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation? They are working their employees, who are paid a low rate, 2 and 3 hours a night overtime. Only yesterday the Treasury Department posted a notice that its employees would be required to work 2 hours every evening without extra compensation.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman will remember that we had that question up at the last session in reference to the furlough plan. I brought out at that time that Government workers in the Customs Department, Immigration Bureau, and Border Patrol worked long hours overtime and got paid nothing extra for it at all.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. And in the Congressmen's offices?

Mr. CONNERY. And in the Congressmen's offices, Congressmen and their secretaries, as well as clerks of committees, are willing to work long hours, but they work voluntarily and are not forced to such work.

Now, let me read some more from this newspaper article:

If the average girl working in Springfield can be said to be a composite of clerk, stitcher, stenographer, cellophane worker, assembler, wrapper, machine operator, connector of small motors, packer, rag picker, printer, folder, filer, bundle girl, labeler, bookkeeper, trimmer, inspector, pantry worker, then we shall say that the reports of 32 Springfield working girls, based on a 4 weeks' wage and hour study, reveal that 38.1 is the number of hours Miss Average works, and $10.09 is her average wage.

In this study, which is still being made by the industrial department of the "Y" we find that the highest-paid girl receives $22.50 as a stenographer for 41 hours of work, while her sister at the bottom of the ladder, employed as a clerk, gets $5 for 33 hours of labor. One girl operating a power machine has the highest number of hours, that being 52.5, for which she received $9.15 for her efforts.

IGNORE WAGE STANDARD

Another girl during the 4-week period records only 2 weeks' work, one of 26.1 hours for which she received $6 and the second week of 9 hours at $2.80. For the remaining 2 weeks she was unemployed. The five office girls reporting show a steadiness in the regularity of their jobs, and their average weekly wage is much higher. For them as a group $15.18 is the average.

The minimum wage set for the pocketbook industry to maintain health and decency standards is $13.50. However, in most of the cases studied in this particular type of work, a complete ignoring of such wage standards has been in effect.

The sweatshop, you see, has taken its toll of the production of young girls, working at below living standards.

What I have read has been from Springfield. Now, I read an article with reference to Lawrence:

Margaret, 16, who worked at the bench for the Milchen Shoe Co., Lawrence, earned at times 90 cents, $2.03, and $2.79 for three different weeks of work, though she did work at home.

She said she paid 10 cents a week for drinking water and snatched moments from her noon hour to swell her weekly earnings.

Working at the same factory, her sister, who also did home work, earned as top price for 6 days of labor $6.47, although she had made as low at $1.91 once, and at another time 9 cents more. At another time, for a day and a half of bench work, she earned 40 cents.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Now, New Bedford:

For a Friday afternoon and a Saturday morning's work at Mutterpearl's, a pocketbook factory in New Bedford, one girl was given 97 cents. Switching for the New Bedford Manufacturing Co. she made $2.70 for 4 days' work.

A girl ironing all day in this factory gets only $2.75, even though her hands are blistered. Some girls reach $3.25 at the same type of work. And table girls at this plant earn from $3 to $3.25, "depending on how the boss feels", one girl added, "A 17-year-old boy at Mutterpearl's is earning $3.25 a week."

* * * * * * *

Jane, now 19, left school at 16 and began to work. She first went to the Monarch Wash Suit Co. plant, remaining for 6 months. She first earned $4.80 a week as regular pay, then by switching to piece work made $5.

"I left because I was so scared that I blushed. The swearing and shrieking was horrible", she said.

Now she is at the Harwood Underwear Co. stitching the closings on running pants at 1¾ cents a dozen. When she works on pajamas she earns 3½ cents a dozen.

"But the most I can make a week is around $4", she pointed out.

There is a lot of this along the same line and here is one further significant statement:

"But if we go too fast and we are able to make a fairly decent amount, the rate gets cut", a woman said.

This woman, mother of daughters, one of whom works at this factory with her, has years of experience as a stitcher. Yet with all her ability she earns about $9 and $10 a week, and a church organization must help her that she may decently keep her home together so that a younger daughter may go to school.

If oil gets on the garments the workers must buy them.

Now, Fall River—

* * * The Shelburne Shirt Co., of Fall River, has twice been prosecuted by the Department of Labor for working girls overtime, and at present is under probation for the second of these two offenses. This period of probation does not end until next August 9.

Gertie is a textile worker and only goes into the factories when textiles are slack. She is the sole support of her mother, so has to try to find work when her own shop is closed. Last summer she worked at the Shelburne Shirt as a presser. She got around $2 for her first week and her last pay was $4. Found it extremely tiring, so much so that she couldn't eat when she got home at night, because she had to stand all day holding a heavy pressing iron, and was bothered by the gas from the iron tube; she gave up her job.

Sadie, who is a rapid worker and stitches shirts with top speed, makes $10 for a full week.

However, the pressers make less, some of them only $5 and $6.

I have simply brought out these facts to show some of the conditions in my State, which is supposed to have fine labor laws and is supposed to protect the workers. You can readily imagine conditions in other States which have poorer labor laws than Massachusetts.

In the hearings before our committee we had many, many instances brought out of sweatshop conditions in the country, real slavery conditions, and I am now pleased to say they have put back the licensing provision in the Senate Finance Committee in their report to the Senate. This licensing provision is the real weapon to force unscrupulous manufacturers to observe decent hours and pay decent wages. I hope it will pass, and hope the House will agree to it when it comes over here.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. LOZIER. According to a report of the Treasury Department, in 1929, 36 supermillionaires in the United States had a net income of $350,000,000, which was $22,000,000 in excess of the total wages paid to 425,000 textile workers in America. I want to propound this question to the gentleman: Is there not something radically wrong with our industrial system when the net income of 36 men exceeds the total wages of 425,000 workers in America?

Mr. CONNERY. Not only is there something radically wrong, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri, but there is something radically wrong with the Congress of the United States taking $400,000,000 from disabled veterans when they could get that money by taxing securities that are now tax exempt and by calling in the bonds now outstanding and by reducing the interest rate to 2 percent, and in this way raise all the money they need to balance the Budget. [Applause.]

Mr. ZIONCHECK and Mr. KVALE rose.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Then the gentleman feels that for radical wrongs radical remedies are required?

Mr. CONNERY. That is right; yes.

Mr. KVALE. To return to the query of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER], with reference to net income, should it not be noted for the RECORD that that net income is net for taxable purposes only, and represents what is taxable after all the generous allowances and exemptions and deductions and exceptions are taken into account that the administrative sections of the Revenue Act allow?

Mr. CONNERY. That is right.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman tell the House whether or not the firms he has mentioned in his district are American firms and owned and operated by American citizens?

Mr. CONNERY. As far as I know they are, yes; if the gentleman means by "American" whether they have been naturalized or not.

Mr. DONDERO. And hold the position of American citizens under the Government of the United States?

Mr. CONNERY. I do not know. I will say to the gentleman that I have found this out in my experience. It does not make any difference whether they are American citizens or English citizens or Irish citizens or French citizens, or anything else; when they get into these industries, without any control over them, with many of these manufacturers human beings become slaves to them from then on. It does not make any difference what their nationality is, race, creed, or color; money becomes their god.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DUNN. The gentleman from Michigan asked whether the people operating these mills are American citizens. It does not make any difference whether they are American citizens; the fact that the United States Government permits it indicates there is something radically wrong, not in Denmark but rotten in the United States.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LOZIER. The gentleman is making a very interesting and instructive speech. What I intended to develop by my previous interrogation is this: Under our industrial system there is not a fair division of the profits that accrue from the processing of raw materials into the manufactured products. In other words, labor in the last 3 or 4 decades has not been receiving its fair and just proportion of the new wealth that annually accrues to the American people as a result of labor, because, in the last analysis, all wealth that there is in the world, if not the gift of Almighty God in the form of natural resources, is the result of labor. Labor is the only thing that can create wealth.

The banks never created any wealth; the railroads never created any wealth; the merchants have not created any wealth—they merely accumulate, manipulate, concentrate, control, and direct wealth, but in the last analysis the only thing that creates wealth is labor, and labor, in the last few decades, has not received its fair proportion of wealth that annually accrues to the American people.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman is absolutely correct. When times are good, they overcapitalize and water the stock, and then when times are bad the only thing they can think of is to cut wages.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's argument. The gentleman brought up the question of the minimum wage. You have a minimum wage in your State; why not bring them into court?

Mr. CONNERY. We have a minimum wage, but we cannot bring them into court. The only thing that can be done under the State law is to publish them.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Why can you not have a minimum wage in the Federal law?

Mr. CONNERY. There is a provision for a minimum wage in this bill, in the industrial recovery bill.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. And that will be a check on all the States and on all labor throughout the country.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has been speaking of ways and means for paying pensions and the compensation for disability allowances, and so forth, which ought to be paid, and also paying the bonus, which ought to be paid. I want to call attention to another means of helping to raise the funds. The big oil monopolies have countless huge storage tanks in their numerous tank cities, and they have a storage capacity almost measureless. In order to fill their storage with cheap oil, they force oil down to 25 cents a barrel, and even in some places down to 10 cents a barrel.

Then, after filling their storage tanks with cheap oil, ultimately, when they get ready, the price takes a rise, and they reap millions in profits. If we should tax the storage of that oil, say, 5 cents, or even more, per barrel for every 30 days it is stored, it would break up those storage monopolies and be the best thing in the world ever done for the independent oil companies.

Mr. CONNERY. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Under permission I will get later, I will extend my remarks at the conclusion of the gentleman's speech and insert a short statement from one of the oilmen in my district on this subject.

Mr. CONNERY. Now, it is not a nice thing to say, "I told you so", but it is human nature. We all like to feel that others finally come around to legislation which we initiated. I am not speaking for myself, but only for the Committee on Labor, of which I have the honor to be chairman. The Committee on Labor worked long days and long hours, night and morning, in discussion and hearings on the 5-day week and 6-hour day bill. Also, last year, in the last session of Congress, the Labor Committee reported out a bill which passed the House of Representatives and passed the Senate and was known as the "Metcalf-Connery bill", and which provided for predetermination of wages.

That was vetoed by President Hoover. In the public recovery bill the Senate reported out today they have a provision which pleases me very much, because it carries the provisions of the Metcalf-Connery bill. I take no credit for the name; it was due to the fine work and cooperation of my committee that the bill was reported out.

On pages 27 and 28 of the public recovery bill you find this provision:

(b) All contracts let for Federal construction projects pursuant to this title shall contain provisions for minimum rates of wages, to be predetermined by the awarding authorities, which contractors shall pay to skilled and unskilled labor, and such minimum rates shall be stated in the invitation for bids and shall be included in the proposals for bids for the work. The awarding official shall have power to revise the predetermined wages if in his judgment changed conditions so justify. In event the rate of wages is increased, an amount equal to the amount of such increase in wages in any one month shall be paid at the end of such month to the contractor by the United States upon a satisfactory showing by the contractor as to the amount thereof, and in the event of a decrease in the rate of wages, the contract price shall be decreased by the amount of such decrease in wages, and such decrease in the contract price shall be computed on the basis of satisfactory evidence submitted by the contractor.

So there we have one proposition which the Committee on Labor brought out and is now being incorporated in this bill. But far more important to the Committee on Labor at this time is the fact that we reported unanimously, favorably to this House a short time ago a 5-day week 6-hour-day bill. It went on the calendar. It stayed on the calendar. We were not allowed to get action in the House, and the reason we were not allowed to have that bill come up, to the best of my knowledge, is this: I called up Miss Perkins, the Secretary of Labor. She went to the President and asked him if he was in favor of the foreign proposition in the bill which applied the same regulations to foreign as to American manufacturers and workers. He said, "no"; that he was against the bill applying to foreign imports. So, to the best of my knowledge, that is the reason that the bill was not allowed to come up in this House. In this bill which is reported by the Senate Finance Committee today we have language which puts the foreign-imports proposition into the bill without any "ands", "ifs", or "buts"; so the Committee on Labor has the satisfaction today of knowing that, while we were not allowed to bring that bill up on the floor of this House, the body at the other end of the Capitol realized the necessity of such a provision and put it in the bill. We did not go over there and ask them to do that, so we feel that our work has not been in vain.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Does that include agricultural products?

Mr. CONNERY. I will read it for you. I am not sure under this reading whether or not it applies to agriculture. On page 5 (e) of the bill I read:

(e) If any labor organization, or any trade or industrial organization, association, or group, which has complied with the provisions of this title, or any person, shall make complaint to the President that any commodities, articles, or materials are being imported into the United States, and that such importation is detrimental to the effectuation of the policy of this title in that the business of any industry, trade, or subdivision thereof, as to which a code of fair competition under this title is in effect, is adversely affected thereby and unfair methods of competition in the United States are resulting, the President may cause an investigation to be made of such complaint, and if after such public notice and hearing as he shall specify the existence of such unfair methods of competition shall be found he may, in order to effectuate the policy of this title, direct that the commodities, articles, or materials concerned in such unfair methods of competition shall be excluded from entry into the United States, and upon information of such action by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, through the proper officers, refuse such entry. The decision of the President shall be conclusive. Any refusal of entry under this subsection shall continue in effect until the President shall find and instruct the Secretary of the Treasury that the conditions which led to such refusal of entry no longer exist.

May I say this to the House? I made the suggestion in the committee to have that provision put into the bill before we reported it to the House, and my reasoning was very simple. I did not see how you could possibly make any manufacturer in Detroit, Topeka, Kansas City, San Francisco, Dallas, Tex., Philadelphia, or any other American city go on a 5-day week 6-hour day, thereby raising his costs and tell him that he must do that under penalty of law, while at the same time the Czechoslovakian manufacturer, the British manufacturer, the German manufacturer, who is competing with him in the same products, can work his labor any number of hours he chooses and pay as low wages as he wishes and then ship his goods into this country to undersell our Americans. My committee agreed with me, and they put that in the bill. This foreign-import provision is the reason that the bill did not come before this House for action, and it is extremely pleasing to me to know that the action of our Committee on Labor was endorsed by the Finance Committee of the Senate. Opponents of the foreign-import provision said to me, "You are tying the hands of the President when he goes into this conference on June 12, you are interfering with his tariff policy, with the reduction of tariff, or you are placing an embargo." In reply I said, "We have seen what the European nations have been doing in the last 2 or 3 months.

Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy—all the rest of them have been making tariff treaties with the other nations of the world, and then they are going into this economic conference and they are going to say to us, "All right; we have our matters fixed up; now what are you going to give us? We want some more from you." But if the 5-day week 6-hour day with the foreign-import provision had become a law, the President would have had a club, and he could have said to them, "If you do not work a 5-day week 6-hour day in Europe, you cannot send your goods into our country in competition with our manufacturers, who are working their labor 5 days a week and 6 hours a day." This would have benefited labor not only in the United States but throughout the world. From my experience, when you go into a conference, it is much better to have a trump to play than to go in there with the other fellow holding all the good cards. What is there left for us on which to trade, now that all these tariff treaties have been made by other countries between themselves? It is the old story. It is true, as Will Rogers said, that America never lost a war and never won a conference.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman explain to the House by what means this Government can determine whether or not goods made in a foreign country were made under a 30-hour week law?

Mr. CONNERY. It is the easiest thing in the world. Under the present tariff law you have the consular invoice telling you what the value of 25 or any number of different articles is. General knowledge of what hours a shoe factory in Czechoslovakia is working or a textile factory in England, or their hours of labor, is a simple thing for the consul to find out; under the present law he has to find out that the value of a pair of shoes, for instance, is $1.47 before that shoe can be admitted to the American market. It would be much easier to determine what hours of labor factories were working.

Mr. DONDERO. He would have no right to go into factories in a foreign country to find out from the people there.

Mr. CONNERY. He would not have to. The workers would tell him pretty quickly. Furthermore, before they could ship their goods into the United States a consular invoice must be O.K.'d by the consul. The foreign manufacturer would be obliged to state the hours of labor of his factory before he could get a license. It is a very easy matter to handle that.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. I noticed when the gentleman read the bill that it is not made mandatory upon the President to see that that law is enforced, because as the gentleman read it, the President "may." The word "shall" should be substituted.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. It is not mandatory. I am willing to leave it to the President as they have it in the bill. I feel confident when he looks over the situation thoroughly that he will see the necessity for such action. I would rather see "shall", but if "may" is as much as we can get, I shall be glad to accept that. I want to protect the American worker.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. I hold no brief for the Aluminum Trust or for the big concerns which are getting tariff protection and do not need it at all. I believe in the tariff policy of the Democratic Party as enunciated in our national conventions of the past, wherein it is stated that we believe in equal protection as to the difference in wages and cost of production for the American manufacturers as against foreign importers. If we are going to keep up our standards of living, we must have protection for the American workers. We have radios, we have bathtubs, we have washing machines, and various other things in our homes that they do not have in European countries or Asiatic countries, and if we are going to keep up the American standard of living we must protect the worker and the manufacturer and the farmer in the United States against the importation of goods made abroad under sweatshop conditions, poor wages, and then sent into this country and sold under the American market prices.

We cannot keep up our standard of living unless we have this weapon of defense in this bill. Under the public recovery bill we are to license manufacturers. The President will be able to say to them, "Unless you work 40 hours a week, you do not get a license", or it may be 35 hours or 30 hours or 45 hours, whatever he says. Whenever you put that manufacturer on a 35-hour week, for instance, and you let the manufacturer in Manchester, England, or Czechoslovakia or Russia or in any other foreign nation work 60 hours a week, you are penalizing the American manufacturer and workers and eventually you will drive our American manufacturers out of business and put millions more American unemployed workers on the streets.

So in conclusion on this matter I simply want to state that our logic, after our study of this matter in the Committee on Labor, has amply justified itself when the Senate Finance Committee announces that in order to protect American industry and American workmen the President may put on an embargo, if necessary, thus regulating these products which are coming from foreign countries which employ sweatshop labor, long hours, and pay starvation wages.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. The gentleman made the statement that Will Rogers said we never won a diplomatic victory and never lost a war. I do not think we won the last war. If enslaving our people and making them carry the burden of the private bankers in foreign countries is winning the war, then I hope we do not win any more wars like that.

Mr. CONNERY. I think the gentleman is absolutely right. All he has to do is to ask the first disabled veteran who is a battle casualty and has had his compensation cut by the economy bill who he thinks won the war. The veteran's answer will be very illuminating.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. If we won the war, who did we win it for?

Mr. CONNERY. Well, I might answer that in many ways. I think we won it mainly for the profiteers and the international bankers. Ask the man who went up in the Argonne and lost his leg or arms, was gassed or blinded. He will tell you that he fought the war and the big-moneyed interests won the war.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. We cannot collect our debts. We furnished the money to win the war and we cannot collect our debts.

Mr. CONNERY. We gave them a present of the first eleven billion they borrowed and now they want the other eleven billion canceled.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. And Sunday night at midnight I understand we gave the Chinamen fifty million more.

Mr. CONNERY. I hope not, although China always gave us a better break than most of the others.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The economy bill is coming before the House again, and it is my understanding that if we do not agree to the Connally amendment they will bring it back with a sales tax on it and we will have to vote for a sales tax in order to help the veteran. Is that right?

Mr. CONNERY. Well, I do not know. Of course, I would not want to say anything about the House conferees who are going to confer on the matter. As I feel now, if something at least as good as the Connally amendment is not offered, I am going to vote not to send it to conference, but to accept the Connally amendment. I would rather vote for the Trammell amendment, but under parliamentary procedure doubt if I can get the opportunity. The Connally amendment provides a 25-percent cut; the Trammell 15 percent.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. It is almost common knowledge that that is a fact, is it not?

Mr. CONNERY. I would not say that.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the House very much for its indulgence. I did not intend to take up so much time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, under the unanimous consent that was granted me to extend the remarks I made during the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], I want to discuss a little further the tax I proposed that Congress should levy upon petroleum stored by monopolies. Oil should be worth at least $1.25 per barrel. These huge combines with their countless tank fields beat down the price of oil to 10 cents per barrel, and then garner it away in their storage tanks, and then when they get ready to cut their melon and to declare their dividends they allow the price to go up and then unload. They should pay a tax on this storage.

My constituent, Mr. A. A. Spencer, is the general manager of the Exchange Petroleum Corporation, refiners and marketers of Liberty gasoline, and motor oil and greases, at Albany, Tex. I have an interesting statement from him which I want to pass on to the President and to the Ways and Means Committee for their consideration. It is the following:

THE EXCHANGE PETROLEUM CORPORATION,
ALBANY, TEX., June 2, 1933.

Hon. THOS. L. BLANTON,
Member of Congress, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: In a discussion with your son, Thos. L. Blanton, Jr., it was suggested that I write you, outlining a matter which I believe has merit and which will at this time serve to simplify a few of the problems which confront the oil business today.

The measure which I wish to propose would be revenue-producing to the Federal Government which, of course, is something that is now being given vital consideration.

As you are doubtless aware, it has been the custom of the major oil companies for the past 15 years, and even before the World War, annually to run the price of crude petroleum anywhere from 50 cents to $1 per barrel, running millions of barrels to storage and then advancing the price, making a tremendous profit on this one operation at the expense of thousands of independent oil producers. In fact, this very thing is what is going on right now throughout the United States, with a mid-continent posting of 25 cents per barrel on crude oil.

Using the present time as an illustration, the major companies have reduced the price of crude petroleum within the last few months nearly $1 per barrel, which will mean a profit of 300 percent to the major companies. This operation costs them practically nothing since gathering lines are a part of their normal operation, the only extra investment necessary being storage. All major companies have a tremendous amount of storage which was built years ago and paid for, doubtless, by the profits of one crude oil storage period. The upkeep on storage is very small, and the depreciation likewise is of small consequence.

Since the storing of oil is such a profitable transaction and the major companies have used this particular means to make the larger portion of their profit, and also have not actually made profit from refining and producing operations (as their independent competitors have been forced to do), they have made this profit wholly at the expense of the small producer. It certainly is, therefore, in line that the Federal Government should levy a tax which would be payable monthly on each and every barrel of oil carried in storage in excess of 30 days.

To my knowledge, no one has ever suggested such a measure—a tax which would be beneficial to the entire industry; a tax that would be borne by the party who is certainly able to bear it. If you will investigate, I am sure that you will find that practically every year since 1918 the major oil companies have forced the price of oil down, storing oil and then raising the price back up within a period of 12 months, making a profit from this price "juggling" operation of from 50 cents to $1.50 per barrel.

If we are to believe the propaganda that the major oil companies have put forth to the effect that there is far too much production today, and by reason of that tremendous overproduction crude oil has declined in value to where it is only worth 25 cents per barrel, then I say that this crude oil should remain underground in its natural reservoir and should not be run and stored in tanks subject to tremendous evaporation loss of that valuable part of the crude oil—gasoline.

A tax of say 2, 3, or 5 cents per barrel per month on storage oil would permit the Federal Government to share in some of the large profits which are made in the storage of crude petroleum and at the same time discourage that wasteful and extravagant method which has been employed in the past, accruing profit to the major oil company, and at the same time would encourage the conservation of our natural resources by forcing nonproduction at times of unjustifiable market.

Such a tax would also force the major oil companies to compete in business with their small independent competitors to make profit from their refining and marketing operations, as well as their production activities, a thing which they are not doing today, and have not been doing for the past several years.

The writer has watched with interest the present administration's efforts in their endeavor to rehabilitate, so to speak, industry, and there is one thing that is of great consequence and one that should by no means be overlooked, and that is the encouragement of the small industry, for I am convinced that this country is suffering not alone from a world-wide general economic depression but also that many, many men are out of employment as a result of consolidations, amalgamations, and mergers which were so popular a few years ago. The small oil concern employs more men per unit of production than the major companies, and this must not be lost sight of, for the more small concerns that are fostered and encouraged, the more men will be employed. The above suggestions with reference to the tax on storage oil are along this line.

This is a rough outline, and I have not taken time to go into the matter in detail, realizing that time for consideration of matters of this nature is limited in Washington. However, if you feel that this matter has merit—and I believe that you will find it has—I certainly should like to see this measure introduced at the present session of Congress and a law of this nature enacted at this time.

Very truly yours,

A. A. SPENCER.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be great merit in the suggestions made by Mr. A. A. Spencer. Careful consideration should be given to same, both by the Senate committee and our House committee. We must break up these big monopolies. They are throttling the very life out of the people. With oil down as low as 25 cents per barrel, there can be no new development. All development is at a standstill. And thousands of men who formerly had employment in oil fields as tool dressers, casing crews, truck drivers, and helpers are idle. This Congress should levy this tax on all oil storage.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1580) entitled "An act to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended", requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. DILL, Mr. SMITH, Mr. WHEELER, Mr. FESS, and Mr. METCALF to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1562) entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to the Levy Court of Sussex County, Del., to reconstruct a bridge across the Deeps Creek at Cherry Tree Landing, Sussex County, Del."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HAINES, for 2 days, on account of important business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD speeches made by my colleagues, Mr. BLACK and Mr. O'CONNOR, last night at the American National Conference at the Mayflower Hotel.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOMERS]?

There was no objection.

LETTER OF REPRESENTATIVE FISH PROTESTING ECONOMIC AND RACIAL PERSECUTION OF GERMAN JEWS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter I wrote to that conference, together with a copy of a resolution I have introduced in the House which was adopted by that conference.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what was the gentleman's request?

Mr. FISH. The gentleman just asked permission to put in 3 speeches, a speech by the majority leader, 1 by Mr. BLACK, and 1 by a third gentleman, at this meeting last night.

Mr. BLANTON. The request in regard to the speech of the majority leader was granted this morning.

Mr. FISH. It is the same as the request made on behalf of some others.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including herewith a copy of House Concurrent Resolution 19, introduced by me, which was approved by the American National Conference Against Racial Persecution in Germany at their meeting held on Monday, June 5, 1933, at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D.C. I am also including a copy of the letter which I addressed to Justice Stafford, one of the sponsors of this conference:

House Concurrent Resolution 19

Whereas the German Government is pursuing a relentless and ruthless policy of economic persecution and repression of Jews in Germany; and

Whereas it is the avowed intention of the German Government to deprive the Jews of their civic, political, and economic rights; and

Whereas the comparatively small number of Jews in Germany, not exceeding 600,000, or 1 percent of the German population, constitute a peaceful, law-abiding, industrious, and defenseless element of the population: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States regrets the continued persecution of the Jews in Germany and expresses its sympathy for them in their hour of trial, humiliation, and economic discrimination, and requests the President of the United States to use his good offices and make friendly representation to the German Government in the interest of humanity, justice, and world peace, to respect the civic and economic rights of their citizens of Jewish origin, and to put an end to racial and religious persecution.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., June 5, 1933.

Justice WENDELL P. STAFFORD,
American National Conference, Suite 863,
Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D.C.

DEAR JUDGE STAFFORD: I regret exceedingly that, owing to a previous engagement, I will be unable to attend your protest meeting against the tragic and inhuman attempt of the Hitler Government to destroy the economic rights of German Jews and deprive them of citizenship.

No nation, or no people, particularly the American people accustomed to equal opportunities under the law, can remain silent at the cruel, brutal, and systematic policy being pursued by the German Government to turn the hands of progress back 2 centuries and force peaceful and law-abiding Jewish citizens to return to the poverty and disease of the Ghetto.

The American people are shocked and horrified that any civilized government, and I speak as a tried and true friend of the German people, could in our day and generation undertake to outrage civilization by strangling through economic weapons a whole race. Stupid and ruthless leadership turned the world against Germany 20 years ago, and God forbid that it should again come to pass. By encouraging and promoting intolerable injustices to the Jews, the German rulers are prejudicing their own demands for justice before world public opinion.

The fight has just begun and must continue until human rights and Jewish rights prevail. I would appreciate the active and militant support of your congress toward securing a favorite report and action on my resolution requesting the President of the United States to make friendly representation to the Hitler Government regarding the economic and racial persecution of 600,000 German Jews, in the name of justice, humanity, peace, and friendly relations between nations.

Wishing your congress every success, and assuring you of my earnest cooperation, I am,

Sincerely yours,

HAMILTON FISH, Jr.

UNDER WHOLESOME AND JUST LAWS WISELY AND SYMPATHETICALLY ADMINISTERED, THE SO-CALLED "COMMON" PEOPLE AND "MIDDLE CLASSES" MAY NOW WITH CONFIDENCE HOPE FOR BETTER TIMES AND A MORE EQUITABLE SHARE IN THE NEW WEALTH THAT ANNUALLY ACCRUES TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, when the record of this administration is written, the future historian will say that when Franklin D. Roosevelt became President the American people were facing an economic abyss; that our mills and factories were idle, our industrial structure disintegrating, our railroads seemingly facing inevitable receiverships, our merchants, shopkeepers, and small tradesmen dangerously close to if not already in the pit of insolvency, agriculture bled white and prostrate, our banking system broken down by maladministration and unconscionable practices, our commerce stagnant and unremunerative, our business activities unprofitable, our masters of finance and captains of industry stupid, impotent, and devoid of constructive leadership, the masses mercilessly exploited and plundered, and social injustice in the saddle in every one of the 48 States.

He will not fail to record the amazing fact that in a great nation of limitless resources and boundless wealth 13,000,000 men and women who previously had been gainfully employed were idle, walking the streets seeking employment, and begging for bread; that millions of men, women, and children were underfed and undernourished, though our granaries and warehouses were filled to overflowing with food commodities that could be bought at cutthroat prices. In short, that the people of the United States were facing ruin; that our agricultural, industrial, financial, and commercial structures were tottering, our institutions threatened, and our social order endangered. And after accurately describing conditions on March 4, 1933, the unprejudiced historian will say that on his accession to office President Roosevelt resolutely set himself to the task of bringing order out of chaos. That he laid a strong hand on the helm of the almost stranded ship of state, promptly initiated remedial policies that were benevolent and revolutionary but not dangerous nor destructive; that he boldly attacked waste and extravagance in the expenditures of public funds, quickly effected numerous and far-reaching economies in the operation of boards, bureaus, and commissions, abolished useless Government activities, and the first year of his administration reduced operating expenses of the Government more than a billion dollars; that he formulated and secured the enactment of numerous measures that amazed slow-going statesmen and students of political economy, and which marked a radical departure from long-established formulas for the treatment of national ills; that he accepted no principle or policy simply because it was ancient or long-approved, nor did he reject any formula, theory, or program on the sole ground that it was new and untried; that he measured every governmental policy by the yardstick of economic soundness, its workability, and its adaptability to accomplish the desired purpose; that with the stroke of a pen he cut the Gordian knot of bureaucracy and untangled age-old departmental red tape; that his policies, boldly conceived, carefully formulated, and wisely administered, lifted the pall of depression, restored normal conditions, and revitalized and revivified every vocational group and every branch of human industry.

Probably no Congress in our national history ever enacted more constructive, comprehensive, forward-looking, epoch-marking, and benevolent legislation than the one now in session. Under the leadership of President Roosevelt, Congress created agencies to restore our national credit, refinance our bankrupt National Treasury, tremendously reduce our Government's operating expenses, conserve, strengthen, and stabilize our banking institutions, refinance and otherwise rehabilitate agriculture, quicken industrial activities, stimulate the flow of commerce, dissipate fear, establish confidence of the masses in their Government, and encourage the people to right-about-face and begin their march toward better and more prosperous times.

When I contemplate the recently enacted legislation, measuring my words and speaking deliberately, I assert that in all the tide of time, no other self governing nation has ever accomplished so much in such a short space of time. The attitude of the American people toward their Government, their Congress, their institutions, and toward one another has materially changed in the last 3 months. Confidence has displaced despair. Courage has supplanted fear and indecision. Then they were controlled by doubt and desperation. Now they are inspired by a new hope, a new initiative, and a bold resolution to cut a pathway out of this wilderness of serfdom to ease and economic independence. Then they saw only clouds and storms. Now the sun shines, fortune smiles, and the future promises adequate rewards for their labors. Then they were a discouraged and defeated army in disorderly retreat. Now they are united, confident, and militant, advancing all the line. Then they were weary with the disappointments and disasters of an unfriendly destiny. Then they were in the shadow of a starless night. Now the sun of prosperity is rising with healing in his wings. Every vocation is taking on new life.

Under wholesome and just laws, wisely and sympathetically administered, the so-called "common people" and "middle classes" may now with confidence hope for better times and a more equitable share in the new wealth that annually accrues to the American people. A new spirit inspires and dominates the people. A new purpose actuates those intrusted with the administration of our national affairs—a purpose to rule wisely, righteously, and justly; an inflexible determination to conserve our national welfare, promote the well-being of the people, not of a favored few people only, but to bring to the myriad millions of forgotten men and women equal enjoyment of the blessings and benefits of our free Government and their just and proper share of the wealth and prosperity of the Nation.

In the history of the world, in the experience of every nation, there have come times of peril and emergencies of such magnitude as to shake the foundations of society and threaten national disaster. In every great crisis a heroic figure has arisen, generally from the ranks of the common people, whose personal and political integrity, genius, vision, patriotism, and far-seeing statesmanship saved a nation from the evil consequences of their own folly, preserved the state, and averted social and political revolution. Our beloved country is no exception to this rule. On frequent occasions, in periods of Nation-wide unrest, when the perpetuity of our institutions hung tremblingly in the balance, a Jefferson, a Jackson, a Lincoln, a Wilson, or a Roosevelt has boldly challenged the forces of destruction, averted disaster, and preserved inviolate our benign institutions.

And but recently, in a period of unprecedented danger, when seemingly every vocational group was being rapidly reduced to penury and impotence, when the ability of our Government to solve our economic problems was being seriously challenged, the American people in their desperation and despair, with practical unanimity drafted another Roosevelt to lead them out of the miry slough of despond, and out of the bogs and quagmire of financial, economic, and political idiocy and impotence. Judging by the phenomenal accomplishments of the first 3 months of his administration, we may with assurance assert that he will not disappoint the expectations of the American people.

As Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I presided while the National Industrial Recovery Act was being debated. This is one of the most important of the President's proposals for the restoration of prosperity and to return to normal national life. It is essentially an emergency measure, and I supported it on that theory, although I doubt the wisdom, workability, and constitutionality of some of its provisions. The President requested its enactment without substantial amendments. It is my conviction that the good that will be accomplished by its enactment and sympathetic administration will amply justify our acceptance of the objectional features of the bill. It is predicated on the admitted fact that we are suffering from a national emergency of stupendous and unprecedented proportions; that adverse economic conditions have been productive of wide-spread unemployment; that industry is disorganized, discouraged, and staggering toward prostration and the bottomless pit of disaster; that interstate commerce is burdened and sluggish; that the standards of living of the American people have been undermined and fallen to distressingly low levels, and that their purchasing power has been amazingly reduced, and in many instances entirely destroyed.

The National Industrial Recovery Act proposes to remove obstructions to the free flow of commerce, provide for the general welfare by promoting the organization of industry for the purpose of cooperative action among trade groups, induce and maintain united action of employers and employees under adequate governmental sanction and supervision, eliminate unfair competitive practices, reduce and relieve unemployment, improve standards of labor and otherwise rehabilitate industry, and conserve our national resources.

This measure includes what is known as the public-works program, for which the sum of $3,300,000,000 is provided, of which sum $400,000,000 is allocated by an equitable method among the several States to be expended in the construction of highways.

The public-works program is exceedingly comprehensive and embraces practically all varieties of public construction by the Federal Government, States, municipalities or other public bodies, including projects aided under previously enacted emergency-relief measures, as well as all projects made eligible for loans under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. It is conservatively estimated and generally believed that under this Industrial Recovery Act within a short time approximately 6,000,000 men and women will be given employment.

It would be difficult to overappraise the beneficial effects of this measure. The employment of 6,000,000 workmen will add tremendously to the buying power of the American people. The benefits will be reflected in the rapidly expanding activities of every vocational group. There will be a greater demand for all kinds of food products, which will mean a substantial advance in farm commodity prices. All lines of industry and business will share in the prosperity and increase of purchasing power which will inevitably flow from transferring 6,000,000 people from idleness to the grand army of employed and contented wage earners.

The agricultural classes are already receiving substantial benefits from the legislation enacted by Congress on the recommendation of the President. The Agricultural Credits Act of 1933, which provides for the refinancing of farm mortgages over a long term of years at a low rate of interest, and which also provides for emergency loans to farmers, will go down in history as the most benevolent, progressive, and far-reaching legislation ever enacted for the agricultural classes in the entire range of human history. It will tremendously aid in the rehabilitation of the American farmer and a restoration of agriculture to its rightful place among prosperous occupations. By a reduction of governmental expenses an indirect tax burden of $25,000,000 will be lifted from the shoulders of American farmers. Livestock and grain prices, in fact all farm commodity prices, are steadily advancing. In the last few weeks the aggregate increase in farm-commodity values is approximately as follows:

Livestock increased	$530,000,000
Wheat increased	200,000,000
Corn increased	550,000,000
Oats increased	120,000,000

In other words, since Mr. Roosevelt became President, under the inspiration of his commanding and magnetic personality, and as the direct result of his wise and wholesome policies, approximately $1,400,000,000 have been added to the ultimate probable income of American farmers which will be materially augmented from substantial increases in prices of dairy products, poultry, and other minor farm commodities. This means hard cash in the pockets of the producers and furnishes convincing evidence that better times are coming for the agricultural classes.

SAFE AND SANE NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing an address which I delivered yesterday to the National Association of Reserve Officers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to print, I offer as my remarks the following address delivered by myself June 5, 1933, to the National Association of Reserve Officers at Chicago, Ill.:

Mr. President and Reserve officers, in that admirable volume by Richard Stockton entitled "Inevitable War", recently off the press, he summarizes our national-defense policies in these few words: "Thirty successive Presidents of the United States, beginning with George Washington and including Herbert Hoover, have given us six cardinal principles of military policy. We must be peaceable; we must be prepared; preparedness tends to prevent war; our main Army must be citizen soldiers; we must have some soldiers on permanent duty; and we must have an adequate Navy. These are good principles, and I am glad to follow them." To this I would respectfully add that we should have an air force equal to that of any other nation in the world. With some small countries, occupying the same continent, as in the case of Europe, aircraft may constitute a weapon of offense, and may be used for destructive and surprising invasion. But not so with America, due to our detached position, occupying the expanse of half a continent, with great oceans to the east and to the west, and with friendly republics to the north and to the south, for us an air force is essentially defense. Furthermore, I believe that for every dollar invested in air power we obtain a higher percentage of defense than a dollar invested in any other form of defense. With aircraft based upon our shores we could meet an enemy fleet and a hostile convoy 500 miles at sea and beat down enemy aircraft operating in conjunction with the enemy fleet, and then the fleet would be at the mercy of our aircraft and of our fleet. We could be sure of beating down the enemy aircraft, because necessarily the enemy planes would be limited in number, whereas with ours based upon land, and with our entire air forces at our instant command, we could sacrifice plane for plane until there would be complete annihilation of the enemy air force, and we would still have remaining sufficient force to prevent the invasion of our shores.

NATIONAL DEFENSE A PARAMOUNT DUTY

The preamble to the Constitution of the United States expressly declares that one of the four primary objects for the formation of a more perfect Union by the abandonment of the Articles of Confederation and the adoption of the present Federal Constitution was to "provide for the common defense." It is a significant fact that every President of the United States from Washington down has solemnly declared that national defense is a national duty that we dare neglect at the peril of our national life. Relatively few of our Presidents have been soldiers as such. Not one of them was a professional soldier. A few were conspicuous citizen soldiers, but with striking unanimity they agree that an unarmed nation is an invitation to war. To the practical man, this is complete confutation to every proposal of the pacifists and the idealists that urge abandonment of arms and armaments as being themselves provocative of war. The messages of the Presidents reflect the thought of the picked men constituting their Cabinets. It is safe to say that every Presidential message is a representative cross section of the best opinion of the statesmen of the time. If, therefore, every Cabinet of every President has approved of the expressions that national defense is a paramount duty, then we may safely conclude that convictions of our duty to arm and to prepare to defend ourselves against any possible enemy from any quarter do not arise from militaristic and professional sentiments of ambitious soldiers, but are the sober feelings of the masses of men and women who love their country.

PEACE THE PRIMARY OBJECTIVE

Reverting to Mr. Stockton's résumé, we recall that the first policy to be pursued by our Nation is that of peace. We are a peaceful nation. We seek neither the territory, nor the wealth, nor the commerce of any other nation. We have vast untouched resources that for generations will tax the energies of our people to develop. Our very form of Government inhibits any aggressive militaristic policy. Annual appropriations for the Army and the Navy keep our armed forces in constant control of Congress, and therefore instantly responsive to the popular judgment. No war can be declared except by Congress, and our history shows that Congress has never precipitately rushed into war, but as a matter of fact has, in each instance, been virtually pushed into war by wellnigh unanimous popular sentiment. So long as our Constitution stands and is respected, and our representative system of government continues, then just so long will it be impossible for this country to begin any aggressive and imperialistic war. The desire of the people is for peace; the hope for our prosperity is peace; the object of our prayers is peace; the aim of our defense policies is peace; the purpose of our Army and our Navy is to preserve peace.

PREPAREDNESS FOR PEACE

The common sense of responsible public men dictates adequate preparedness to prevent war. Ofttimes the idealist thinks he has answered the arguments for preparedness by asking the questions, "Where is the enemy you expect to fight? What nation has made hostile gestures? Why waste all this money while the whole world is at peace and while other nations seek peace with the same sincerity that we do?" I invariably answer: "I do not know where the enemy is, but I do know that when I do learn where the enemy is, when I do know who the enemy is, then it will be too late to prepare." It is too late to take out insurance after the house is on fire. It is too late to take out life insurance after death rattles are in the throat. It is too late to begin to build a fleet and to organize and train its crews, and to build martial aircraft and to train men to use them, and it is too late to train men in the use of land armaments after the enemy appears and darkens the skies with his air forces and blockades our ports with his fleet and sets his foot upon our shores. The wise man keeps his property and his own life adequately insured all the time. Mark you, the significance of the word "adequate." Overinsurance of property tempts to incendiarism. Overinsurance of one's life tempts to suicide. In like manner excessive equipment for war and inordinate training for war may undoubtedly precipitate war. Hence the title of this address: "A Safe and Sane Policy for National Defense."

WHAT IS A SAFE AND SANE POLICY FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE?

All men agree that defense forces, agents, and instrumentalities should be big enough to make the country safe. On the other hand, they should be small enough to keep the country sane. Very heavy armaments and very large military establishments are apt to breed overconfidence and to develop an aggresive spirit. There must be a middle course somewhere, and that is the course for all disinterested, forward-looking Americans to seek and to take. All history teaches that aggressor nations, nations with imperialistic policies, are doomed to die. In like manner history demonstrates that defenseless nations, nations unprepared to meet aggressor neighbors, also die. But nations like Switzerland, that keep themselves ready to beat off an invader and yet pursue a policy of mere self-protection, live on in peace, and with the minimum of burdens for military service and military expenditures.

The National Defense Act is limited in its application to land forces. But a true National Defense Act would contemplate every agency, instrumentality, and force to be employed in defending the Nation against aggression. Thus an all-comprehensive National Defense Act would include the fundamental policy of defense, and would organize the forces for the administration of that fundamental policy, whether such forces be operating on the water or under the water, or cperating upon the land or above both land and water. Thus the totality of national defense comprehends submarines, sea mines, surface ships, land troops, and air forces, whether said air forces be operating with land troops or with the fleet or independently.

To the mind of the ordinary citizen national defense is a single thought. If invading forces may be beaten back from the air, it is air force that the ordinary citizen is concerned with. If, however, invasion may be prevented by water craft, then it is ships the ordinary citizen is concerned with. If the enemy lands either from the air or from the water, and if its advance to the interior may be prevented by land troops, then it is land troops that occupy the center of the stage with the ordinary citizen.

It is true that under our organization defense forces are cut up into the Army and the Navy, and each, in turn, is subdivided; but such subdivision is for more convenience of administration, and all are subject to the unified command centering in the President as Commander in Chief.

Before we lay emphasis upon any one branch, it is necessary for us to ascertain what is our national policy, as determined by our history, by the nature of our institutions, by our industrial and economic and commercial needs, and by our geographic situation. The size of our country, with its variety of climate, of soil, of resources, renders us almost self-sufficient. Ninety percent of our commerce is domestic commerce. For our future development, even until we shall number 300,000,000 or 500,000,000 people within our frontiers, it is not necessary for us to contemplate dependence upon any other part of the earth's surface for our subsistence and happiness. We have barely scratched the surface of our national resources. This applies particularly to agriculture. As we shall enrich our somewhat impoverished lands, as we shall develop marginal lands, as we shall bring new lands under the plow, by clearing and by draining and by irrigation, we will be able to feed and care for several times our present population.

Our fixed and invariable policy has been mere defense. By our power we drove Spanish authority from the island of Cuba, and then set Cuba free. We acquired the Philippine Islands, and are now setting them free. We do not desire one single foot of foreign soil. We do not seek dominion over any alien people. We wish for all the nations of the earth the same independence, the same progress, and the same happiness we are earnestly seeking for ourselves. We believe that our own true economic prosperity can be achieved only as our sister nations are prosperous. Fortunately we are situated between two great oceans, with friendly neighbors to the north and to the south; and if ever there was a nation qualified to feel and to exercise true neutrality, to be impartial umpire in world affairs, to be the friend of all and the enemy of none, that Nation is America. It would seem that Providence has placed us in this situation in order that we might lead mankind out of the narrowness, the prejudice, the selfishness, the fear and the dread that fill the minds, and dominate the policies of the nations of the Old World, occupying relatively small areas, living close to each other, that are arrayed against each other by age-old tradition, and unfading memory of invasion, of frightfulness and of injustice perpetrated by unequal treaties, signed by the point of a bayonet.

What, then, is the defense policy of America? Let us think of the problem as a whole, and not of its several parts, however important each may be. The American statesmen must declare and administer that policy. War has been defined as a means of accomplishing a nation's policy by force. So far as America is concerned, war may appropriately be defined as the means of preventing another nation from accomplishing its policy at the expense of America, either of American territory or of America's rights. We have no land-grabbing policy. We seek no commerce, save that which we can win by good will and merit. But we must be realists. We must recognize the lessons of history. We must know that in the course of events situations do arise whereby uncontrollable passions are provoked, when the voice of reason is hushed, and when war seems the only alternative. Due to the situation above described, we believe that America can keep cool the longest, that she may be able to reason, after others fail. But America must be ready if another nation, prompted by greed or hatred or revenge, shall defy our rights and make war upon our people.

In contemplation of such a situation, what is our plain duty? Manifestly our duty is to be reasonably well prepared, to be both safe and sane.

OUR CHIEF RELIANCE IS THE CITIZEN SOLDIER

All our Presidents and public men have emphasized the importance of our policy of relying upon the citizen soldier in time of war. It is true that we must have some soldiers on permanent duty; some soldiers must devote their whole lives to the study of military problems, in order to instruct and the better train citizen soldiers through the years of peace, and especially to staff the huge armies of citizen soldiers in time of war. Just how large this Regular Army should be is a practical question and must be solved like every practical problem. The National Defense Act of 1916, as amended in 1920, is not sacrosanct. It was not formulated by inspired men, but by practical, common-sense men. It has been amended many times and in many important respects, and will undoubtedly be amended in the future. The Congress that enacted it had no better nor broader information, nor any purer motives, than the Congress now sitting nor the Congress that will sit 10 years hence.

But one thing that all must agree upon, relative to the Regular Army, and that is that it should at all times be at the highest possible state of efficiency. There should be the minimum of drones and deadwood within its personnel. Each individual should be constantly and instantly stimulated to make of himself the very best teacher-soldier possible. He is not merely training to lead in war, but he is training to instruct and to inspire citizen soldiers who are training in time of peace. With this principle in mind, I have long insisted that wholesale lopping off of Army officers by any arbitrary standard of age or length of service is unwise, prejudicial, and demoralizing. Many an officer at the age of 60 is better than some other officer at the age of 40. It is a personal question and not a group question. Therefore, I advocate the more efficient functioning of class B boards. I insist that the officer who does not measure up in character, in ability, and technical skill, should be eliminated. The Regular Army should be a great continuous competitive contest. Those who strive hardest and exert themselves the most should win the honors and receive the emoluments. Any other system leads to stagnation and drifting and inefficiency. In this complicated and practical problem of what is "adequate" defense, the taxpayer must be considered. Every dollar taken from the taxpayer above that which is absolutely necessary to maintain adequate defense, is an unjust burden. No city would wisely have an unnecessarily large and expensive fire department, nor police department, nor health department. These must be large enough to prevent or check fires, to preserve order, and to protect health, and no larger. The business man must solve this problem in fixing his fire insurance and life insurance. He not only wants a solvent company, but he wants the lowest rates, and the minimum amount, commensurate with adequate protection.

And so it is with the Congress which represents the people who produce the Nation's wealth, who perform its work, who bear its burdens, and who pay its taxes. Undoubtedly the people, as voiced by every President, and as dictated by common sense, demand adequate, safe, and sane national defense, and are willing to pay every dollar necessary to insure it. But at the same time the people resist extravagance, wastefulness, duplication of effort, inefficiency, and any system that leads to stagnation, drifting, and dry rot. For these reasons the sound judgment and the practical sense of the statesmen of America have from the first relied upon the citizen soldier for our chief defense. There is nothing so mysterious about the art of war as to make it impossible for a citizen, while engaged in his ordinary business pursuits, to acquire both the knowledge and the training necessary to render him ready to take the field the instant that war breaks. Washington, while busy as a farmer and legislator, was incidentally acquiring the knowledge and experience necessary to equip him to lead the armies of independence and to place him among the foremost soldiers of history. Thus it was that Andrew Jackson, while practicing law and farming and merchandising, acquired the information and training to become such a soldier as to destroy the force and break the pride of British regulars that had followed Wellington. The war between the States developed many soldiers of conspicuous ability and of commanding personality, who came fresh from the walks of civil life. So the rank and file of American armies in every war have been quickly recruited from the civil population. In the World War the ratio of citizen soldier to Regular Army soldier in the ranks was about 30 to 1.

THE NATIONAL GUARD COMPOSED OF CITIZEN SOLDIERS

Notable among the citizen soldiers are the officers and men of the National Guard. These citizens are taking a part of the time that might otherwise be devoted to business or pleasure, and are equipping themselves for that unknown moment when war may burst. It is the highest patriotic service. It is strictly volunteer. To volunteer after war breaks may be the sure way of escaping a subsequent draft. Certainly, the stimulation and enthusiasm of the moment, with the tocsin sounding in every ear, with the bugle blast upon every breeze, with the flag meeting every gaze, make it easy then to volunteer to help defend the Nation's life. But during all these dull years of peace, when the heedless millions seem to decry even the thought of war, when the masses yield to the delusive suggestion that there is no enemy and there will be no more war, the National Guardsman, conscious of the lessons of history, knowing the realities of life, tears himself from his family and fireside and selfish pleasures and goes out to train for that unknown zero hour. Hats off to the National Guard. Hats off to the peace-time volunteer. Hats off to the officers and men who, at the minimum of expense, are preparing the maximum of defense.

PATRIOTIC SERVICE OF RESERVE OFFICERS

All that we have said about the citizen soldier and the National Guard applies with equal force and emphasis to the Reserve officer. He, too, is a volunteer in peace time. He receives no drill pay, except when at the annual encampment. He devotes his evenings to military correspondence studies. He reads his service magazines and reads the latest books of military policy, and especially books dealing with his particular arm of the service. The Reserve officer is a stabilizing force in his community. He forms sentiment among his business and social friends for adequate defense. He is not prompted by personal ambition nor the hope of high military honors. He knows that when war breaks he will be the flotsam and jetsam of organization. He will be thrust here and there, as convenience and necessity may dictate. He is subject to call by Presidential order, and must leave business and family on shortest notice. But from rather intimate contacts with the Reserve officers since the close of the World War I can testify with the greatest sincerity and without any desire to flatter my audience, and as I have often testified before my colleagues in Congress, that the Officers' Reserve Corps is not only an indispensable part of our national defense program but that matching dollar for dollar of investment in preparation we get more genuine defense, more efficient preparedness, out of the Reserve officers, taken as a group, and including every branch and arm of the service, than from any other constituent of national defense.

The last item in the summary by Colonel Stockton is an adequate Navy. Truly all men must agree that in this modern world, with the oceans, more than ever before, lanes of commerce, and with our ships steaming over all the seas and our aircraft flying in all the skies, a navy adequate for the defense not only of our shores but of our far-flung commerce is absolutely necessary. Our peace-loving and unselfish people are perfectly willing to agree to treaties to restrict our armaments to any fair basis of parity, in keeping with the enlightened thought of the world and economic requirements.

But we will not lead in disarmament. Others may not follow our example. Disarmament must proceed equally by all nations, at the same time. We consider the taxpayers' burden, but we must look far into the future, lest the intolerable burdens of indemnities, imposed by victorious foe, and the unspeakable humiliation of defeat, would set back the progress of freedom and civilization. The example of America, her freedom for the individual, her opportunity for the poor and friendless, her devotion to high ideals, have for a century and a half been the sustaining hope of all humanity. Our duty to ourselves, and our duty to the whole world, call upon us to face the grim realities of the times, and to be reasonably prepared for such emergencies as may happen at any moment.

With malice toward none, and with charity for all, America must continue in the way pointed by Washington, and repeated by every great American that has followed him in the leadership of our people. The safe and sane middle course must be pursued. Excessive militarism and aggressive wars are unlikely, but certainly must be avoided. On the other hand, we must not surrender to mere idealism. We must not forget that humanity is essentially what it has been throughout history. If we neglect the lessons of history now, then America's rise and fall may be but another chapter in history's long list of powerful nations gone down to ruin, and America prove but a mournful lesson to other nations that shall in time rise upon the ashes of our ruins.

TAX ON STORAGE OIL

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks made with respect to placing a tax on storage oil, and in this connection I should like to incorporate a short statement made by one of the leading independent oil men in the South.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

THE ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the St. Lawrence waterway.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, on the reading of Senators ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, of Michigan, and ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin, both Republicans, prepared arguments in the Senate on Monday, May 29, as to why action on the treaty should not be longer declared, I cannot understand why the Wisconsin Senator led an attack upon Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND, Democrat, of New York; but after a little study I have come to the conclusion that the strenuous efforts which have been made to aline a Senate majority against consideration of the treaty at this present session are meeting with results, and as the time goes on "the compelling reasons, grounded in public welfare and in sound public policy", are not as sound and compelling as was at first believed.

In the 6-point argument advanced by Senator VANDENBERG in which he pointed out, first—

Because it offers direct and specific encouragement to the economic welfare of the great American mid-continent.

By the great American mid-continent, I conclude the Senator referred to the 23 States of the Mid West which have expressed a desire that the seaway shall be built. The roll includes California, Colorado, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, South Carolina, Utah, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

The Senator was in error when he included Illinois in the roll, for on May 16, 1933, a joint resolution of the Senate and General Assembly of the State of Illinois passed a resolution petitioning the Senate of the United States to disapprove and refuse to ratify the proposed treaty.

The following is a copy of the resolution:

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, Edward J. Hughes, secretary of state of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that the following and hereto attached is a true photostatic copy of Senate Joint Resolution No. 27, the original of which is now in file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of the State of Illinois. Done at the city of Springfield this 25th day of May A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] EDWARD J. HUGHES, Secretary of State.

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
Fifty-eighth General Assembly, 1933.

Senate Joint Resolution 27

Whereas a treaty relating to the St. Lawrence waterway has been negotiated between the United States and Canada which is now before the Senate for ratification; and

Whereas this treaty internationalized Lake Michigan, a body of water entirely within the limits of the United States, and places the control in an international joint commission; and

Whereas it embodies the order of the Supreme Court reducing the flow of water from Lake Michigan into the Chicago River to 1,500 cubic feet per second, and thereby makes this order unchangeable except by international agreement; and

Whereas 1,500 cubic feet per second, as provided in the treaty, is inadequate for the needs of the waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf, and is therefore injurious to the entire Mississippi Valley; and

Whereas by the terms of this treaty the cost of the undertaking is borne mainly by the United States and the benefits therefrom are received mainly by Canada; and

Whereas not only are valuable rights of the whole United States surrendered by the treaty for no adequate consideration, but it constitutes a gross injustice to the State of Illinois against which Illinois should have the joint protection and support of its sister States; and

Whereas our two United States Senators, LEWIS and DIETERICH, are making a steadfast fight on behalf of the people of this State against the treaty in its present form: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Fifty-eighth General Assembly of the State of Illinois (the house of representatives concurring herein), That the General Assembly of the State of Illinois petition the Senate of the United States to disapprove and refuse to ratify the proposed treaty, to the end that a fair to just agreement may be negotiated between the United States and Canada; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this preamble and joint resolution be transmitted forthwith to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives of Congress from the State of Illinois.

Adopted by the senate May 16, 1933.

THOMAS F. DONOVAN,
President of the Senate.
A. E. EDEN,
Secretary of the Senate.

Concurred in by the house of representatives May 16, 1933.

ARTHUR ROE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
CHAS. P. CASEY,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

In the annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the fiscal year June 30, 1932, on page 66 will be found a summary of internal-revenue receipts, by States. Of the 22 remaining States named in the Senator's roll, the total tax paid by them was $307,053,074.66, or 19.71 percent of the total tax, while New York State alone paid $394,989,203.91, or 25.36 percent of the total tax, and 55.93 percent was paid by the remaining 25 States.

Now let us turn to the Commissioner's report of the same year and make a study of the summary of income-tax receipts from corporations and individuals paid by the 22 States on the Senator's roll. Of the total amount paid, $1,056,756,697.54, only $235,019,676.19 was paid by the 22 States while New York State alone paid $348,550,738.13.

From the above figures it will and can be readily seen that the great American mid-continent would benefit, as far as their proportionate share of cost is concerned.

It does not appear that there would be any benefit to the American people sufficient to outweigh the burden of debt and taxation which will necessarily result from the cost of the projects. The cost is summarized by the Institute of Economics of the Brookings Institution as follows, the cost incurred jointly for navigation and power being allocated entirely to power:

For navigation:
Improvements in St. Lawrence River	$159,000,000
Improvements in interconnecting lake channels	90,000,000
Improvements in lake harbor and port facilities	250,000,000
Welland Ship Canal (under construction by Canadian Government)	115,000,000
Total	614,000,000
For power:
Improvements in International Rapids section	301,000,000
Improvements in Sonlanges section	84,000,000
Total	385,000,000
Combined navigation and power costs	999,000,000

The annual charges against the shipway—that is, interest and depreciation on the capital investment and maintenance and operation of the route—are estimated at approximately $40,000,000 a year. If the so-called "joint costs" common to both navigation and power were allocated entirely to power, the charges would amount to approximately $36,000,000 a year.

It will in all probability exceed the present estimates by hundreds of millions of dollars.

The officially published costs of the complete St. Lawrence project have been greatly understated, to such an extent as to be badly misleading. As far as they have gone, the engineering reports are understandable. Instead of a total cost of $543,429,000 [1] it is believed that the public should be apprized by the fact that the total eventual cost will aggregate not less than $903,829,000, as follows:

Engineers' estimate (as published)	[1] $543,429,000
Lock duplication	[2] 18,700,000
Compensating works	[3] 100,000
Channel deepening	[4] 25,000,000
Welland Canal deepening	[5] 25,000,000
Power projects in Canadian territory	[6] 262,000,000
Montreal Harbor	[7] 4,600,000
Private capital required to improve harbors	[8] 25,000,000
Total	903,829,000

Upon whom will the original cost fall and upon whom will the cost of maintenance and operation fall? In giving consideration to the probable ultimate cost to each State and having at hand the various and divergent estimates, recourse should be made to the average of estimates prepared by different individuals or organizations who have given study to this project. Including President Hoover's figures, the average would be $914,857,250. If based upon the same percentage as internal-revenue receipts are based, the cost to each State would be as follows:

State or Territory	Percent of total	Amount
Alabama	0.17	$1,545,257.33
Alaska	.01	91,488.57
Arizona	.06	548,914.35
Arkansas	.07	630,400.00
California	4.90	44,828,005.25
Colorado	.35	320,200.04
Connecticut	1.31	11,984,629.98
Delaware	1.06	9,697,486.85
District of Columbia	.54	4,940,229.15
Florida	.54	4,940,229.15
Georgia	.28	2,561,600.30

In addition, New York is to pay $89,000,000 because of power rights.

In his second point the Senator says:

Because it is a practical and primary contribution to farm relief.

Now, who gets the benefit of the reduced freight rates to Europe as the result of the building of this waterway? Does the American producer get the benefit or does the European consumer get the benefit of the reduced freight rates? That is a question that cannot be answered definitely. It all depends upon the question whether in the terminal market it is a buyer's market, at the time the freight arrives or whether it is a seller's market at that time.

In 1929 the American railroads reduced the cost of transporting wheat to the Atlantic seaboard for foreign export, in order to help the wheat situation, and immediately in the Liverpool market Argentine and Australian wheat was reduced in the same amount that the freight rates were reduced in the United States, so that the benefit of the freight reduction and the loss of railroad revenues went to the European consumer and not to the American wheat grower. That could readily apply and would no doubt generally apply with reference to reduced water freight rates on wheat originating in Duluth or automobiles originating in Detroit, South Bend, Cleveland, or Buffalo.

I want to ask another question. If, after we have built this seaway through Canadian territory, in large part with our money, what is then to prevent Great Britain from putting a tariff on American wheat and excluding it from the Liverpool market and letting Canadian wheat go over this seaway, built with our money, free of charge? What is to prevent her doing that? If she does do it, we become the international boobs of the world. What is to prevent her putting a tariff upon automobiles made in Detroit, after we have built the seaway, and allow Canadian-made automobiles to go freely to the English market over a seaway built with our money, contributed in part by the American automobile manufacturers?

That is exactly what Great Britain has done by the Ottawa compact. She has put a duty on American wheat and allows Canadian wheat, if shipped through Montreal, to go in without duty; but if that same Canadian wheat is brought down to New York or Philadelphia and shipped, then she puts a duty on it.

The third reason advanced was—

Because it is a practical and primary contribution to the recapture of American export trade.

The commerce of the Great Lakes is recorded in such large figures that it stirs the imagination of the rest of the world. In normal times from 120,000,000 to 135,000,000 tons are transported annually. The accomplishment is more startling when it is realized that this is done in a short period of 7½ months, beginning sometime in April and ending in the fore part of December. The amount of business that passes up and down the Detroit River in the same time of year approximates 100,000,000 tons. This will give you an idea of the size and magnitude of the trade on the Lakes.

If I may make just 1 or 2 comparisons, in the year 1928 there passed through the Suez Canal approximately 32,000,000 tons, representing a big part of the trade between the East and the West. In the same year there passed through the Panama Canal 29,000,000 tons. Now, you will bear in mind that I said that the passage through Detroit is a hundred million tons in normal times.

Now, to the outside world it is easily believable that a large part of this business is seeking an outlet to the sea. I should like to analyze it.

As the biggest commodity carried on the Lakes in a big year is iron ore, which originates back of Lake Superior in the ore mines there and back of Lake Michigan in the ore mines behind Escanaba and finds its way down the Lakes, some of it through the Soo and Mackinac to the steel plants at Chicago, the rest of it going on to Lake Erie for the great steel plants in the Mahoning Valley and Pittsburgh, while some of it goes to the steel plants at Buffalo. In a big year that totals anywhere from 60,000,000 to 65,000,000 tons. That is the eastbound traffic. As far as that is concerned, it is not connected with the St. Lawrence River project. It has nothing to do with it and has not any interest in it.

There are 40,000,000 tons of coal that originates largely in the West Virginia and the Pittsburgh districts, with a very small amount of anthracite from the Pennsylvania district, that finds its way to Lake Superior and Lake Michigan points, and from there is distributed into the interior. As far as those 40,000,000 tons are concerned, they do not seek an outlet to the sea.

The next big item is stone. In a big year we move about twelve or fifteen million tons of stone. It originates largely in Michigan and is shipped out of ports like Alpena, Rogers City, and Rockport. It follows in the wake of the iron-ore cargoes. It is used for fluxing purposes. Most of it is used in steel plants for that purpose. There is a small amount of it used for road building and for making cement, but that is the minor part of it.

The next item of importance is grain. In a big year we will move anywhere from 10,000,000 to 15,000,000 tons of grain on the Lakes. At least two thirds of that is Canadian grain, and I venture to say that we are not interested in that proposition.

Translated into bushels, the range in difference is anywhere from two hundred and fifty to three hundred million bushels.

As I said before, at least two thirds of that is of Canadian origin, and we have no concern with it. Probably one third is American grain. Now, we cannot say that all of that one third of the American grain is interested in an outlet to the sea. We will admit that with the big population we have in this country a substantial part of that grain is never intended for export. It is used for milling purposes in our own country. The city of Buffalo has become the greatest milling center in the world. The shipments of large amounts of grain come down the Lakes to Buffalo and end there. The grain is converted into flour and used locally.

I do not think it is difficult for anyone to visualize that the amount of grain that this country is going to dispose of will not become less with the population increasing.

The fourth reason is the weakest one offered:

Because it is one of the greatest make-work projects which can be dedicated to our war upon unemployment.

I may be mistaken, but I can visualize, if the St. Lawrence River project is developed and the gates are thrown wide open, that we can have the foreign ships built by cheap labor in foreign countries, labor that is not accustomed to the standards we have in this country, vessels manned by Chinese coolies in many cases, or others worse, that such ships could when times are bad send their boats up occasionally to the Lakes and try to eke out an existence on the low rates that have developed.

As a temporary work-relief measure the St. Lawrence appears in no better light. Nobody knows definitely how much labor would be employed, but it is definitely known that Canadian labor would profit more than American labor.

Only 115 miles of the route, from Prescott to Cornwall, is in international territory. The rest of the route is entirely within the Dominion. Obviously Canadian labor only would be used for work within the Dominion. American labor presumably would have to share opportunities for employment in the international section.

In the fifth reason the Senator says:

Because the criticisms of the undertaking are always more apparent than real.

One of the many objections to the Government's engaging in this tremendous speculation seems conclusively to require that we should continue to oppose it, as it should not be forgotten that in the event of the United States being at war with some other country international law would prohibit England from allowing the United States to use the St. Lawrence channel. It is not permissible for belligerents to ship through neutral territory. The moneys of the United States should be spent in developing waterways which would be available under all circumstances when a war emergency arose, for it is during such emergencies that great transportation congestion develops. Nations always avoid, if possible, having their foreign trade move through a port located in a foreign country.

It can be further stated that the canal is more likely to result in import merchandise being laid down in the West at lower prices. For instance, Scandinavian pulp for paper mills is already shipped to Great Lakes ports and is proving a great injury to this industry in the United States.

The Montreal Star, which no doubt represents the opinion in that section of Canada, appears very pleased with the treaty, according to an editorial published soon after its conclusion. Among other things it states:

The cost of Canada could not well be less. We get a half-billion enterprise, not counting the expenditures on power plants, for less than forty millions. Thirty-eight million dollars, to be exact.

Senator VANDENBERG says:

A sixth reason might well find itself in the aspirations of the New York Power Authority to extend to the great northeastern section of the Nation another of the great public-power developments which may have within it such vast advantages for the people.

The Joint Board of Engineers report outlines a complete development of the power resources of the river by the construction of additional power works with an inflated capacity of approximately 5,000,000 horsepower at a total cost of from $620,000,000 to $650,000,000.

The existing water power and steam plants in the section of the United States which could be economically reached from the St. Lawrence territory by the transmission lines are quite adequate to meet the industrial development for many years to come.

The power production contemplated cannot be counted upon to liquidate the canal outlay. The value of hydroelectric power has in the last 10 years heavily depreciated, owing to the remarkable developments in efficiency of steam-power electric plants. So there is not likely to be a market for power in the large cities which have steam plants located at tidewater. In substance, the Government would be engaging in a most hazardous power speculation when the taxpayers of the Nation are already overburdened as a result of the enormous increase in recent years of Government services and public improvements, Federal, State, and local.

Senator LA FOLLETTE represents that Wall Street is the villain in the plot to defeat the St. Lawrence treaty. Dwelling upon the fact that the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York has reported against the project as economically unsound, he points out that J. P. Morgan & Co. is represented in that organization by 13 members. Therefore, he argues that this "superdirectorate of American business" is leading the fight to defeat the treaty.

It is all just as simple as that to the Senator from Wisconsin. But interesting as his representations may be, they are far from convincing. Elon H. Hooker, who was chairman of the committee of the chamber of commerce that made a study of the St. Lawrence project, declares that the Morgan firm "never made any statement or suggestion of any kind to the chamber or to my committee" regarding the enterprise. As to that, there is nothing on record covering all the years that the seaway plan has been under discussion to show an interest in it on the part of the Morgan firm.

The representations that Senator LA FOLLETTE makes in regard to Morgan influence as to the seaway can be set down as plain blather. It is an attempt to capitalize for the project the situation that finds Morgan's firm under fire before the Senate Banking Committee. No thinking person will be fooled by his pyrotechnics. Senators WAGNER and COPELAND accurately express the sentiment of New York State in opposing the seaway treaty as economically unsound.

Before we spend our taxpayers' money in Canada we ought to see to it that the rivers, harbors, and the lakes of our own land are properly developed and improved. What will the total estimated damages to our railroads, our seaports, our canals, and our mills, elevators, terminals be as a result of the necessary readjustment which will take place if the St. Lawrence Canal is opened?

Our policy and slogan should be "United States money for the United States waterways, built by United States labor, and wholly within the United States."

AMERICA—ON THE SEA AND IN THE AIR

Mr. BRUNNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech delivered by former Gov. Alfred E. Smith on the maritime bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRUNNER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following radio address of Alfred E. Smith, editor in chief of the New Outlook Magazine, over radio station WEAF and the National Broadcasting Corporation network, Maritime Day, May 22, 1933:

It is a pleasure for me to cooperate with the men interested in furthering the cause of the American merchant marine in the celebration of a national maritime day. I can make no claims to a seafaring youth, but ships and the meaning of ships were things not unknown to the youth of my generation which enjoyed playtime adventures along the docks of the East River years ago. We saw ships there in those days. I remember that they entered in a very useful and practical way into one of my favorite sports. That sport was the using of the bowsprit of a ship as it overhung a dock as a sort of trapeze. There was one very interesting lesson about shipping which I learned in my search along the docks for a bowsprit to be used as a trapeze. The boats that were loaded were the ones to look for. A boat without cargo rode so high that it was impossible for us youthful trapeze artists to reach the bowsprit. The trick was to find either those which had not yet been unloaded or those which had been loaded preparatory to clearing for sea again. We came to know those ships which came in well loaded and those which, loading and unloading, made a quick turn-around. We came to see from our own viewpoint that cargo was an important factor in shipping.

We have a habit, however, of forgetting the lessons of the past. There was a very important lesson concerning shipping which was taught us as a result of the World War. When we went to war in 1917 we were woefully lacking in ships.

A merchant marine and an air transportation system play an important part in the scheme of national defense.

In case of a war where we are involved it is of invaluable assistance to have an adequate merchant marine for the transportation of troops and supplies and for use as auxiliary armed cruisers. The personnel is also of the greatest utility in furnishing a proper reserve of men trained in the ways of the sea for the Navy.

In event of a war, such as the beginning of the Great War in 1914, a merchant marine is of equal use in assuring us of transportation for our products in keeping up our foreign trade (we had but 17 ocean-going vessels available in 1914, and when ships of the other countries that had been carrying more than 90 percent of the American exports were withdrawn for use by their own countries, millions of dollars were lost by American farmers and manufacturers through inability to get shipping for their products).

As a result of our unpreparedness we spent 3½ billion dollars, through the Shipping Board, building 2,300 ships, which, as usual when things are done that way, resulted in the waste of hundreds of millions in the building and the waste of most of the balance in the end, as the ships were entirely unsuited for commercial traffic in peace time. Some of our rivers have been clogged for years by the hundreds of ships moored in them, useless for anything except scrap.

And here is what this error of our ways really cost us:

Building program, $3,500,000,000.

Annual interest on the bonds put out to finance the building, $100,000,000.

More than a hundred-million-dollar loss to American farmers and manufacturers through inability to export their products.

The Jones-White Act of 1928 provided for Government loans to companies at low rates of interest to build ships and 10-year mail contracts on a basis that would enable them to be operated successfully upon American wage and living standards.

Due to American wage scales and living standards it costs more to build ships here than abroad and it also costs more to operate them. As a result of the Jones-White Act, in the past 5 years American ship lines have constructed 42 fine new ocean-going vessels costing more than a quarter of a billion dollars, giving employment during the depression to thousands of workmen. In these same 5 years, private initiative, backed by intelligent legislation, has added a new arm to American commerce with a national system of airways between this country and the markets of 32 nations. Today this merchant marine of the air has attained world leadership. Our aircraft factories are building a fleet of flying clipper ships, the largest merchant aircraft, to hold this supremacy and to win for America its rightful place on the fast developing trade airways of the world.

We have put the American flag back upon the world's main trade routes and created a reservoir of men and ships available for national emergency. It is the duty of every American to remember that now that we have at last consolidated our position again on the high seas—an achievement in which he has a direct and personal interest—that he must lend his support and patronage to his country's shipping.

In the North Atlantic trade, which is the most active in the world, of the 20 or 25 percent of the passengers who are foreigners, the proportion selecting American steamers is almost negligible, while of the remaining 75 or 80 percent who are Americans, more than half use foreign vessels. In short, the German, French, and British steamers are invariably selected by their citizens, yet Americans are the chief support of these foreign-owned lines to the neglect of their own. The results of this neglect are not often felt at once, but in the long run they will rise up as a damper on export trade and an actual threat to security in case of war or other national emergency.

We have a half-billion-dollar annual bill for marine freight and passenger service, which the American public pays. Of this amount, fully two thirds goes to foreign shipping and the bulk of this share, estimated at 85 percent, is not spent in this country. In other words, upward of 60 percent of the amount we pay for shipping service in the international trade leaves our country and is spent abroad. Add this sum to our national income, and thouands of Americans could be put to work.

The statistics here given are intended to awaken lively interest in our merchant marine on the part of our citizens. It means much to the country, adds materially to our prosperity, should be a large part of our national concern for trade both at home and abroad, and let us hope that this celebration of Maritime Day may influence all who can be brought within our influence to the end that this important national and business question be the concern of all of our citizens.

REDUCTION OF VETERANS' PENSION

Mr. STUDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert a letter regarding a flagrant case of injustice to a veteran, the letter being from the veteran, together with some exhibits and telegrams.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. STUDLEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter regarding a flagrant case of injustice to a veteran, the letter being from the veteran, together with some exhibits and telegrams:

NEW YORK CITY, June 3, 1933.

Hon. ELMER E. STUDLEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE STUDLEY: Feeling that you are interested in matters affecting veterans and particularly in connection with the ruthless and unjust cuts being accomplished under the so-called "Economy Act", I herewith present my own case, which I believe shows up the manner in which the work is being carried out.

In 1930 I was examined and rated 50 percent disabled as a result of a fracture of the skull, which resulted in residuals of intercranial injury, impairment of sight, hearing, etc. The disorder was classed as neuropsychiatric and my compensation was fixed at $40 a month. It has remained at that figure till now (see copy no. 1 annexed).

In 1931 I was informed by the Veterans' Bureau that I was suffering from a service-connected injury, being 50 percent disabled (see copy no. 2 annexed).

In 1932, being aware of the so-called "advantages" open to disabled veterans in the Civil Service, I applied for and took an examination for the position of assistant attorney. I was granted a percentage of 92.24 and my name should have gone to the head of the list (see copy no. 3 annexed).

On June 12 I received a letter from the Civil Service Commission notifying me that my condition as reported by the Veterans' Administration showed me to be physically unfit for employment, and as a result my name was removed from the list (see copy no. 4 annexed).

I have just received a letter from the Veterans' Administration notifying me that I am now cut to $8 a month for my direct service-connected disability.

This has been done despite the fact that there has been no change in my physical condition since the Civil Service refused to employ me. As a matter of fact, no physical examination was had to determine if there had been any change in my condition.

I fail to see that proper provision is being made for the war disabled, and I urge that the matter be taken up on the floor of the House to the end that a percentage limitation be placed on the cuts affecting service-connected cases authorized under the act in order to insure just treatment.

Respectfully,

GODFREY VON HOFE.

RAD–4A. Von Hofe, John Godfrey. C–1052586

Mr. JOHN GODFREY VON HOFE,
24 Colonial Avenue, Forest Hills, Long Island, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: By reason of review and decision of rating board on January 3, 1930, your award of compensation in the above-entitled claim has been amended as follows:

Forty dollars per month from January 3, 1930.

This award is made in accordance with the schedule of disability ratings authorized by the War Risk Insurance Act, as amended, and the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and is based on reports of medical examinations and other evidence on file. Your occupation at the time of your enlistment is shown to have been student, college.

If you should change your present address, the regional office must be immediately notified. All future communications with reference to this case must bear the compensation number C–1052586 as well as your full name and complete rank and organization.

By direction:

W. T. FITZGERALD,

Mr. GODFREY VON HOFE,
Forest Hills Post, No. 630, the American Legion,
24 Colonial Avenue, Forest Hills, Long Island, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: This will acknowledge receipt of your communication dated November 18, 1931. In reply thereto, please be advised that the records in this office indicate that you are in receipt of an award of disability compensation. This award is based on disabilities incurred in or aggravated by service which are found to disable you to the extent of temporary partial 50 percent.

If there is any further information that you desire relative to your claim we shall be glad to furnish it to you.

All future correspondence relative to this case should bear your full name, correct address, and C number, as given above.

REPORT OF RATINGS, ASSISTANT ATTORNEY EXAMINATIONS, VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., June 13, 1932.

GODFREY VON HOFE,
24 Colonial Avenue, Forest Hills, Long Island, N.Y.:

It is important when you write or make personal inquiry of the Commission relative to your standing or chances of appointment that you state the date and title of the examination and your correct rating. To do so will hasten a reply to your inquiry.

Your ratings in the examination taken on February 16, 1932, are as follows:

Questions in law	81.67
Education, professional experience, and fitness	83.00
(Subject to oral and character investigation.)
Average percentage	82.24
Disability preference allowed (10 points added)	92.24

Very respectfully,

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. GODFREY VON HOFE,
24 Colonial Avenue, Forest Hills, Long Island, N.Y.

SIR: As the result of information recently received from the Veterans' Administration regarding your physical condition, the Commission is of the opinion you are not physically qualified for the position of assistant attorney, and regrets, therefore, to inform you that your eligibility on that register with a rating of 92.24 has been canceled.

By direction of the Commission.

Very respectfully,

E. C. BABCOCK, Secretary.

In reply refer to RAD-4-A. C-1052586.

Mr. JOHN GODFREY VON HOFE,
24 Colonial Avenue, Forest Hills, Long Island, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: A review of all claims in which payments of benefits were being made on March 20, 1933, was undertaken for the purpose of determining entitlement to benefits provided by Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government."

Your claim has been carefully reviewed in accordance with the provisions of the above-entitled act, and on the evidence of record in your case it has been determined that you are entitled to and there is being approved in your favor, effective July 1, 1933, an award of pension in the amount of $8 monthly on account of injury incurred in war-time service.

Regulations promulgated pursuant to the provisions of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, provide that, except as to degree of disability, an application for review on appeal may be filed within 6 months from the date of this notice, or July 1, 1933, whichever is the later date. In the event you contemplate filing such an application it is suggested that it be deferred until after July 1, 1933, when the condition of the work incident to the review of claims will permit of expedited action on application of this character.

WASHINGTON, D.C., June 5, 1933.

Hon. ELMER E. STUDLEY,
House Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

As commander in chief of the United Spanish War Veterans, I am urging you to give your support to the Connally amendment to the independent offices appropriation bill, which limits the reduction of pensions to Spanish War veterans to not more than 25 percent. While I feel this is a most drastic cut, the fact remains that by the adoption of the amendment thousands of Spanish War veterans will be able to live without the necessity of applying to local charity organizations, which would be the case after July 1 if present regulations are put into effect. As President Roosevelt stated in his regulation no. 12, veterans of the Spanish War are severely handicapped—in fact, almost debarred—from proving service connection 35 years after their muster out of service, and we feel that the Connally amendment meets the existing problem in an acceptable manner to both the veterans and the taxpayers.

WILLIAM J. OTJEN.

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 604. An act amending section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes", approved December 29, 1916 (ch. 9, par. 1, 39 Stat. 862), and as amended February 28, 1931 (ch. 328, 46 Stat. 1454);

S. 687. An act providing for the establishment of a term of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida at Orlando, Fla.;

S. 1278. An act to amend an act (Public, No. 431, 72d Cong.) to identify The Dalles Bridge Co.; and

S. 1815. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Owensboro, Ky.

BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on June 5, 1933, present to the President, for his approval, a bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 5329. An act creating the St. Lawrence Bridge Commission and authorizing said commission and its successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near Ogdensburg, N.Y.; and

H.J.Res. 192. Joint resolution to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be privileged at any time within the pleasure of the Speaker to address the House for perhaps 30 minutes with reference to the subject of pending orders by the Interior Department with reference to the closing of all the Indian boarding schools in the United States. I feel this is a problem which my colleagues ought to understand better than they do, and I should like to have this privilege at the pleasure of the Speaker at any time except today.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule we are observing with respect to requests to address the House, a request may not be made to address the House except on the day the Member expects to speak.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FISH. The Speaker pro tempore during the absence of the Speaker wrote down a list of Members in sequence.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has the list.

Mr. FISH. Will it be followed?

The SPEAKER. Yes; it will be followed.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I might speak a little now if I may be permitted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman at the present time. There are four or five ahead of him. After the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER], the Chair can recognize the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the speech made by Representative BLACK, of New York, yesterday at this conference which has been referred to be inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may state to the gentleman from New York that such a request has been granted twice already.

Under the previous order of the House, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN] for 5 minutes.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding I ask unanimous consent that the remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] at the Mayflower Hotel last night may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address by Representative JAMES M. BECK, of Pennsylvania, at a dinner at the Hotel Mayflower, Washington, D.C., Monday, June 5, 1933:

THE HITLER PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS

We are met as the representatives of many religions to add our protest to that of innumerable others against the harsh and cruel treatment which the present rulers of Germany have seen fit to give to a section of their own people.

If we are challenged to give a reason why we should concern ourselves with the internal affairs of Germany, it is enough to say that when any nation enters upon a course which violates the fundamentals of liberty, it becomes a matter of the deepest and legitimate concern to the whole civilized world. Such was the attitude of the great nations of the world, including Germany, when Russia, under its Czarist regime, entered upon a like persecution of the Jews, not because of anything they had done but because they were Jews.

Ordinarily it is better that this or any nation should not interfere with the domestic affairs of another nation, and ordinarily such interference is calculated to do more harm than good. Such, however, is not the fact when a nation is guilty of an affront to the moral conscience of mankind. It then truly becomes the concern of civilization, which is a reasonable entity—even though now an inchoate organization—and no nation is so great or powerful that it may not be haled to the bar of the high court of civilization.

No one ever expressed this thought more nobly than Thomas Jefferson in the immortal Declaration of Independence. It is an error to suppose that the great Declaration was the formal act of severance which created the United States a new Nation.

This severance had been effected by the formal resolution of July 2, and indeed our Nation came into existence when the Continental Congress declared war. As this act of severance could only be justified by moral and not legalistic causes, it required a justification at the bar of history, and it was for this purpose that the eloquent pen of Jefferson was employed. Jefferson himself recognized this, for in the noble opening sentence of the Declaration he said that when a nation enters upon an unusual course "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation."

This necessarily implied that there was a law of right and wrong which governed nations as well as individuals. It suggested a belief in a universal conscience of mankind, which would judge any nation, however great in power. The very essence of this moral conscience is the great ideal of the Jewish prophet that nations, as well as individuals, should "do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly before our God."

Those who have regarded this moral conscience of the world as a mere rhetorical phrase or an idle illusion should take note how swiftly its great court of world opinion has pronounced sentence upon the cruel treatment by the present German dictator of one section of the German people.

Trajan once said that the possession of absolute power had a tendency to transform even the most humane man into a wild beast. Judge Black, in his great argument in the case of ex parte Milligan, recalled the fact that Robespierre in his early life resigned his commission as judge rather than pronounce the sentence of death, and that Caligula passed as a very amiable young man before he assumed the imperial purple. The story is as old as humanity that the habit of cruel persecution "grows by what it feeds upon."

In his inner conscience Hitler must now be hearing the beating of the wings of those avenging angels of history, who, like the Eumenides of classic mythology, are the avengers of the innocent and the oppressed. As the great Greek dramatist, Æschylus, said: "Greatness is no defense from utter destruction when a man insolently spurns the mighty altar of justice." This is as true today as when it was written, more than 2,000 years ago. It is but a classic echo of the old Hebraic moral axiom that "the Lord God of recompense shall surely requite."

The most powerful and self-willed ruler of modern times learned this lesson to his cost. Probably no two instances contributed so largely to the ultimate downfall of Napoleon as his ruthless assassination, under the forms of military law, of the Duke d'Enghien, and the equally brutal murder of the German bookseller Palm. The one aroused the undying enmity of Russia, and the blood that was shed in the moat of Vincennes was washed out in the icy waters of the Beresina. The fate of the poor German bookseller, whom Napoleon caused to be shot because his writings menaced the security of French occupation, developed as no other event the dormant spirit of German nationality, and the Nuremberg bookseller, ruthlessly shot as was Miss Cavell in the World War, was finally avenged when Blücher gave Napoleon the coup de grâce at Waterloo. No one more clearly felt the invisible presence of his nemesis than did Napoleon. All his life, and even in his confinement at St. Helena, he was ceaselessly attempting to justify to the moral conscience of the world his ruthless assassination of the last Prince of the House of Conde.

This terrible judgment of history was never better expressed than by Lamartine in the following language:

"A cold curiosity carries the visitor to the battlefields of Marengo, Austerlitz, Wagram, Leipsic, Waterloo; he wanders over them with dry eyes, but one is shown at a corner of the wall near the foundations of Vincennes, at the bottom of a ditch, a spot covered with nettles and weeds. He says, 'There it is.' He utters a cry and carries away with him undying pity for the victim and an implacable resentment against the assassin. This resentment is vengeance for the past and a lesson for the future. Let the ambitious, whether soldiers, tribunes, or kings, remember that if they have hirelings to do their will and flatterers to excuse them while they reign, there yet comes afterward a human conscience to judge them and pity to hate them. The murderer has but one hour; the victim has eternity."

Thus we may say of those unhappy victims of the present persecution in Germany, who are being proscribed, beaten, robbed, and exiled by Hitler and his Nazi band, that the latter have at the moment their one hour, but the victims of this persecution, which, in this twentieth century, is a monstrous anachronism, have an eternity to hale their oppressors to the bar of justice.

I doubt very much whether the German people are sympathetic with these persecutions. I prefer to think that they are silent because they are powerless and in despair. Germany is the land of Goethe and Schiller; of Bach, Beethoven, Shubert, and Wagner; of Kant, Humboldt, and Koch; and it is hard to believe that a land that has contributed so much to civilization could be sympathetic with the persecutions of a peaceful and unoffending race. I prefer to think that Germany's unparalleled misfortunes have led a despairing people to acquiesce in the cruel reign of a dictator. My admiration for German art, literature, and science makes me believe that if the German people are not today ashamed of the acts of Hitler, they will be so in the near future.

It is true that Germany's too-easy triumph over France in 1870 developed in the German mind a spirit of megalomania, which was one of the great causes of the World War. During that titanic conflict the German people, encircled by a world of enemies, developed a baleful spirit of racial hatred. With the downfall of the Empire there came into being a nobly conceived Republic, and, under the masterful spirit of Stresemann, it gave promise of a better day for Germany and the world. In it lay the real hope of peace in Europe had other nations, and especially our own, lent to the infant German Republic a helping hand. This the allied nations failed to do, and in this lies our share of responsibility for the present moral debacle in Germany. A little magnanimity on the part of the Allies in their hour of triumph might have laid the foundations for an enduring peace, but the war psychosis of 1918 made it impossible to have any sane solution at that time.

Unfortunately, it was not possible to defer the Versailles Conference until civilization had regained its sanity. The Versailles Treaty was one of the colossal crimes of history.

Even then a lasting peace might have been secured if the European nations had extended to the German Republic a helping hand. This they refused to do, and Germany was driven to despair. The Republic perished, and with it the best hope for future peace. Until the Republic can be restored let the other nations, conscious of their share of responsibility, protect the German Jew, so far as possible, by the mighty force of world opinion. The Jewish race in Germany has made great and noble contributions to civilization, and their illustrious writers, musicians, and philanthropists will be gratefully remembered when the name of Hitler will be, even in Germany, a shameful memory. To believe otherwise would be to disbelieve in God, who is the common Father of us all. With faith in Him, we may recall the words of the old Teutonic verse:

"Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small; Though with patience He stands waiting, with exactness grinds He all."

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, it is becoming increasingly apparent from expert testimony before committees of Congress and expressions in speeches and papers throughout the country that the present income tax laws are breaking down.

In this House of Representatives an effort was made to authorize a general manufacturers' sales tax in order to prevent any increase in income-tax rates, but it was defeated by a vote of approximately 2 to 1. It is now certain that this question of taxation to balance our Budget must be met. For this purpose I introduced a bill, and regarding this bill I desire to make a few remarks.

Equitable distribution of the costs of government and balancing of the Federal Budget by collecting revenues from sources best able to pay should be the prime objectives of sound taxation legislation.

With this in mind, I have introduced a resolution to authorize the Committee on Ways and Means to investigate the expediency of a gross income tax as a substitute for the present net income tax. The committee is requested to report its findings, together with recommendations for legislation, within 90 days after the present Congress reconvenes.

Abundant evidence that the man with small income pays his Government an amount far out of proportion to that which comes to the Treasury from corporations and individuals with large incomes is found in every income-tax inquisition to date. A system of taxation which allows such a condition to continue cannot be justified.

Corporations and recipients of large incomes, armed with expert advice, have found it possible to obtain deductions and employ bookkeeping devices which leave but a skeleton of their earning structure subject to a Federal levy. This has been amply proven in the current hearings before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. I seek to correct these and other objectionable features of the income tax law through the adoption of a more equitable method of taxation. [Applause.]

The income tax, while desirable on the principle of ability to pay, does not conform with that principle in its practical application.

A law which requires every person, corporation, partnership, and business association to file a return showing the gross incomes for the year avoids the annoyance of filling out the complicated document now demanded by the Government in its collection of net income taxes. It removes from the man unable to employ experts the penalty of losing the benefit of deductions which the manipulation of books and accounts has proven possible in the case of his more fortunate brother. It places all taxpayers on a basis of equality.

The man whose trade, business, or occupation brings him the largest return from the general public should pay most for the public institution of government.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I yield.

Mr. SHANNON. Has the gentleman any figures to show what the son of J. Pierpont Morgan, the magnificent, would pay under a gross income tax? He does not pay any income tax now.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. My bill calls for an investigation of this very subject and will develop that fact.

Mr. SHANNON. Has the gentleman any idea what he would pay?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I have not.

A gross income tax removes the incentive to make erroneous return—erroneous because of unjustified deductions—and makes the administration of the income tax law more simple and less expensive. In short, it taps every source of revenue in a proportion and manner that leaves little ground for attack or criticism.

I have no desire to force my beliefs in this matter upon the Congress without due consideration. Therefore I am asking that a thorough inquiry be made by the Ways and Means Committee, the tribunal best acquainted with such matters. I am satisfied that the propriety and justice of the gross income tax as a substitute for the net income tax will readily be recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I yield.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman says his bill will tap every source of income. Will it not also tap the sources of income of men who have not enough income to provide the wherewithal to live?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Yes; on the same principle that the taxing powers of a community or State tax all property.

Mr. BOYLAN. Under the present income tax law certain exemptions are made. Under the gentleman's plan, even though a man had not enough income to provide food, he would have to pay a tax on it.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. He would have to pay on his gross income; but under my proposition there would be no such exemptions as would permit Mr. Morgan or any other individual or corporation to evade paying a tax in support of his Government.

Mr. BOYLAN. Would the gentleman's bill provide for any exemptions; and if so, what?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. My bill would provide for no exemptions.

Mr. BOYLAN. Then, if a man did not have money to buy food, but if he had $10 of income, he would pay a tax, would he not?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. The only way I can answer that question——

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes or no—would he or would he not?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I think it is fair for me to answer the question in my own way.

Mr. BOYLAN. That is true.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. And my own way to answer the question is this: If you own a piece of property that is not paying you a net income you must pay taxes on that property regardless.

Mr. BOYLAN. Let us take the case of a man who has an income of $1,000 a year and it is costing him $2,000 to live and support his family. Under the gentleman's bill, would he have to pay a tax on the $1,000?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Yes; but you cannot prove a rule by such exceptional instances as the gentleman now states. It is presumed that the people, with rare exceptions, will be able to earn a living.

Mr. BOYLAN. In other words, the gentleman's bill taxes poverty and want, does it not?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. No.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman admitted that it did.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I certainly did not.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEALEY. Does not the gentleman think his bill would be more equitable if it exempted foodstuffs, medicines, clothing, and the necessaries of life under a general manufacturers' sales tax?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. To my mind this bill is a substitute for a general manufacturers' sales tax and a substitute for a net income tax, and meets the objections to both systems in such a manner as to make it equitable and fair, as near as any taxation system can possibly be made fair.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. Does not the gentleman think that if the necessaries of life were exempted from any tax under a general sales tax, this would take care of the man mentioned by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN], and whatever income he had would not be taxed to any great extent if the necessaries of life were exempted?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. That may be so; but it is my opinion that if we are going to pass legislation, we should pass it in the first instance under such arrangements as will leave no room for doubt or argument. If you allow exemptions, you leave holes in the bill. Let us include everything, and in this way reach a more equitable arrangement than in any other possible way.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will it not work out something like the economy bill? You left a lot of latitude in that bill.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. The gentleman is not accusing me of that?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I do not know. I have not checked up on the gentleman.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Is it not a very difficult matter to determine just what are the necessaries of life? The gentleman has referred to exemptions of necessaries of life. One of the most difficult things I can imagine is to determine in a satisfactory way just what are necessaries of life; and, moreover, is it not a fact that if you exempt food and clothing and medicines, as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY], then you must levy a higher rate on other things that are equally as essential. The more exemptions you have the higher rate you must put on things that you do not exempt that are equally as important as the necessaries of life that are exempt.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I am obliged to the very able chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee for his observation.

Mr. ELTSE of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I yield.

Mr. ELTSE of California. Under the gentleman's plan, would all charitable relief, for example, be taxed? Is the gentleman going to provide for any exemption at all?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I had not thought of charitable relief, and I am very much interested in organizations of that kind, as I serve on several boards; but for the purpose of making this a real bill, I would include everything.

Mr. DUNN. If the gentleman will yield, I should like to know from the gentleman, who asked the question as to whether charitable agencies would be included, where those organizations are that are charitable agencies?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. That is outside the question involved here.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I can answer that question if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. No; we are getting away from the subject.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman permit me to answer the question?

Mr. DUNN. Go ahead and answer it.

Mr. HOEPPEL. The international charitable agency is the United States Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I thank the Members of the House for their attention. [Applause.]

VALIDATION OF COLLECTION OF INTERNAL-REVENUE TAXES

Mr. DOUGHTON, Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted a favorable report on the bill (H.R. 5905) to validate collections of internal-revenue taxes, stayed by requests or claims for credit, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

INVESTIGATION OF THE ACTS OF RECEIVERS, TRUSTEES, AND REFEREES IN BANKRUPTCY

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, to accompany House Resolution 145, authorizing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into and investigate the matter of appointments, conduct, proceedings, and acts of receivers, trustees, and referees in bankruptcy, and so forth.

REPORT

(To accompany House Resolution 145)

The Committee on Rules having had under consideration House Resolution 145 reports same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution do pass.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOWARD). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. There are several Members here who have been waiting to hear the speech of the gentleman from Nebraska, who now occupies the chair, and I want to ask the Chair if he thinks it is fair to us for him to allow the Speaker thus to shelve him and put him into the chair where he cannot speak?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not consider that a parliamentary inquiry, but he will answer it. The Chair will say that the gentleman from Nebraska is a little old-fashioned and his first object is to be of service to the Speaker. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is recognized.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, many of us who voted for the economy bill—and were glad to vote for the economy bill—at the outset of this administration believed what the President said—that the veterans would be treated justly, fairly, and humanely; and further, when we voted for it, not one Member of Congress suggested that there be any cut whatever in the service-connected cases.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Not until I make a connected statement. Not one single person on the floor of this House made any suggestion whatever that the service-connected veterans should have their compensation cut at all. So far as I can remember, the Economy League never made any suggestion at any time to reduce compensation of service-connected veterans. I do not know that anyone in the country urged that service-connected cases should be cut.

Mr. McFARLANE. I want to ask the gentleman a question right on that point.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman will have plenty of time after I get through. So the Members, at least on this side, voted for the economy bill under a misapprehension as regards service-connected cases.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to do this but I will be forced to make the point that no quorum is present. If the gentleman cannot yield for a question I make the point that there is no quorum here.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York has been waiting since 12 o'clock to address the House in the time allotted to him. I am sure my colleague is fair, and I hope he will withdraw his point of no quorum. Every Member here should be accorded the right to be heard, regardless of whether his colleagues agree with him or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FISH. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Texas for a question.

Mr. McFARLANE. I was going to ask this question. The National Economy League has been for 3 or 4 years giving the breakdown where they expected to make the cut, and every Member of Congress has been charged with the knowledge for 3 years at least of knowing where the cut would be made.

Mr. FISH. I deny the statement of the gentleman from Texas absolutely. The Economy League did not suggest a cut in the service-connected cases of 50 percent or, in some cases, of 60 percent, or any cut whatever.

Mr. McFARLANE. They suggested a cut of $450,000,000, and you could not make that without cutting the service-connected cases.

Mr. FISH. I repeat that they never suggested a cut in the service-connected cases, particularly the combat-service cases at any time.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. FISH. Yes; if the gentleman will make it brief.

Mr. HEALEY. The gentleman was told over and over again, as were other Members of Congress, that it was the intention to save $400,000,000. So it was only a problem in arithmetic that to save $400,000,000 it would be necessary to make a cut in the veterans' service-connected cases.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman will not find a single statement emanating from any spokesman of the administration, including Mr. Douglas, the Director of the Budget, prior to the passage of the economy bill even suggesting a cut in the compensation of the direct service cases.

The fact is that compensation in the direct service-connected cases and battle casualties have, under Executive order and Veterans' Administration regulations, been reduced from 29 percent to as much as 68 percent. Is that dealing fairly with those disabled in the World War?

The reason I rose to speak today is the fact that the people back home do not understand the facts and may reach an erroneous conclusion. They do not realize that the Congress is discussing only the service-connected cases. They do not realize that over 450,000 veterans have been cut off the rolls already, and that they are non-service-connected cases. Not a single Member of this House, and, so far as I know, practically no veteran, has raised a question as to cutting these 450,000 non-service-connected veterans from the Government pension lists, but the people back home do not realize that we have already agreed to this action. They do not realize that all that we are discussing now is the question of how much we should cut the service-connected cases. I feel confident, and I believe you gentlemen representing your districts must realize, that the American people who made promises and pledges to the disabled veterans, who said that nothing was too good for them during the war and just after the war, never for a minute would propose or sanction any such drastic action as to cut down the compensation of the service-connected veterans regardless of what was said about saving $400,000,000 at the expense of the veterans by the Economy League.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman says that no Member of this House has thought of these cases except the service-connected cases. At the White House, at the first conference, when this bill was read, I called to the attention of Mr. Douglas, when he was reading the bill, the fact that when you take these non-service-connected cases, where they get $12 a month and could not have paid an income tax the previous year—and it took 25-percent permanent disability in order to get the $12 a month—when you took them off the rolls of the Federal Government you put them on the rolls of the small cities and on the backs of the small taxpayers to look after them.

Mr. FISH. That is true, of course.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Are we not all personally responsible for the natural consequences of our own votes?

Mr. FISH. Absolutely; and I am not apologizing for the vote that I cast or for the vote of any Republican for the economy bill. We would have done the same thing, and would do it over again upon the face of the facts presented to us. We followed the President. We believed that he would treat these veterans fairly and justly and humanely, as he said he would. But he has failed to do so in the direct service connected disability cases.

I have no patience with all this talk of saying, "Oh, it is somebody else", the President is not to blame. The President is responsible; he asked for this power and we gave him the authority, and it is on his responsibility that these drastic cuts are made. It is not the responsibility of the Director of the Budget or the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. It is the President of the United States who is entirely responsible, and I am glad to see that he now acknowledges that responsibility and says to Congress that he will keep Congress in session all summer unless we provide sufficient revenue to take care of the Connally amendment.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is it not our own responsibility also?

Mr. FISH. It certainly is.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is big enough, and I respect and I admire him——

Mr. FISH. And I admire the gentleman from Massachusetts also, and know that he is a good friend of the disabled veterans.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from New York is big enough to assume his own responsibility, and each and every one who voted for the bill is responsible in part for its passage. I am responsible for my vote. I voted against it. I voted for other bills that probably I could be criticised for, but I cannot pass the buck by handing it over to the President in my own individual case. He may be responsible to some extent, but in the first instance are not we all responsible individually for that which naturally and properly belongs to our own vote, irrespective of what we personally intended?

Mr. FISH. Of course that is our own responsibility. The vote has been cast. The only thing that we can do is to remedy the situation and correct a wrong and an injustice to the disabled veterans. I know I am speaking the truth when I say that there are a great many Members on both sides of the House who never for a moment realized that the service-connected veterans would be compelled to take cuts averaging from 30 percent to 70 percent. Is not that the fact? The situation before the country is simply this: If the President comes down here before Congress and appeals to the country the people will simply have presented to them a plea to balance the Budget and a request for additional taxes. The fact that 450,000 nonservice veterans have already been cut off the rolls will not be known back home. Nor will the American people realize that the service-connected veterans have had their compensation cut on the average of 50 percent. They will not realize that no business organization, no Economy League, no other group has ever asked for these cuts to direct service-connected cases that have been wished upon us. I for one believe the Connally amendment does not go far enough. If I get a chance, I shall vote to amend the Connally amendment and limit the cut to 15 percent. I see no reason why we should go beyond 15 percent when we failed to reduce our own salaries and the salaries of other public officials and Civil Service employees beyond 15 percent. That is sound, and at least a logical deduction.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman knows, of course, that the experts who have been dealing with this question for the President—the President's agents—have been studying a revision of the regulations for 6 or 8 weeks. I am informed that today revised regulations are being promulgated and published by the President. Under those regulations I understand that no man whose disability is directly connected with the service is cut more than 25 percent, and the average cut is 18 percent for service-connected cases. Would that satisfy the gentleman?

Mr. FISH. Well, that is a great improvement, and it might satisfy a majority of the House and Senate. So far as I am concerned, if I have a chance to vote, I will not vote to cut any veteran with service-connected disability beyond 15 percent.

Mr. WITHROW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. WITHROW. Probably the information given by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] is on a par with the information that was given us before when we were about to vote on the economy bill, that the President was going to treat the veterans right.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I think he will.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin intimate that he does not have confidence in the President?

Mr. WITHROW. I have confidence in the President, but the President is not handling this. General Hines, Veterans' Administrator, and Mr. Douglas, Director of the Budget, are handling this, and I do not have confidence in those two men when they are dealing with veterans' affairs.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman has confidence in his President, why does he not give him a chance?

Mr. WITHROW. The President is not handling this.

Mr. BLANTON. The President is handling this entire Government just now. And the people have confidence in him. And I believe that he will remedy these injustices.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOWARD). The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The gentleman knows that every one of the regulations is signed "Franklin D. Roosevelt"?

Mr. FISH. And all Executive orders, too.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Every single one.

Mr. FISH. There is no question about the President's responsibility, except so far as the press is concerned. They place the responsibility on General Hines and former Congressman Douglas and on almost everybody but the President.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman this question: Does the President include in his recommendations leniency for the poor men who are suffering from tuberculosis in the hospitals and who are now hemorrhaging as a result of fear that their compensation will be taken from them, as the gentleman knows, some of whom have already died?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Is that a permanent and total disability?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes. Also, does he include compensation for the men who are not permanently and totally disabled, but who are too ill to earn a livelihood?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I have not seen the regulations. They are to be published in the afternoon papers, I understand; and the permanently totally disabled ex-service man, whether service connected or not, is taken care of in accord with and as set out in the ratings and figures set forth in the regulations. I have not seen the rates and figures.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] feels that in the Connally amendment a cut of not more than 25 percent applies to the presumptives, the TB's and the NP's who were taken in as presumptively connected with the service, if developed before 1925? Such cases were given presumption upon very good medical authority and after careful study by veterans' committees of the Senate and House. It, of course, includes pensions for the Spanish War veterans.

Mr. FISH. I do, and I prefer the Connally amendment as it is, if they are going to put in some new regulations eliminating presumptives, as suggested.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] said that men who are totally disabled will be taken care of. That is what they said under the first regulations issued by the President, and those men are receiving the magnificent sum of $20 a month. I cannot see where they are taken care of by such a small amount.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. I do not think it is quite fair for anyone who voted for the economy bill to blame the President for it, because, as far as I am concerned, the thing has come out just as I expected it would come out. Neither do I think it is fair for the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] now to say that no case will be cut more than 25 percent, and all those other cases will be taken care of, unless we are willing to put more money into that appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for one other question?

Mr. FISH. Very well. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Whatever anyone may say about the President and whatever the President may do, no Member certainly can charge him truthfully with passing the buck or shifting responsibility or not assuming responsibility for what he does. No one will deny that he is courageous.

I am in hopes that these regulations, whatever they may be when they come out, will show just what the President has promised us: That he is going to be fair and just and take care of the disabled veterans, and particularly of those afflicted with tuberculosis, and we hope also that he will be fair and just to the Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. FISH. I will say to the gentleman that I think this whole proposition will work out all right if the Members of Congress will stop pussyfooting and speak their own minds and tell the President and the administration that the Congress of the United States is against the proposed drastic and unfair cuts to direct service-connected cases.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. Regardless of where the responsibility may be placed and regardless of where the buck is passed, the statement that veterans will be taken care of does not apply to three veterans from my own State who have committed suicide and who are in their graves today as the result of the application of this Economy Act.

Mr. FISH. And I may add that there has been a number of suicides at the veterans' hospital at Castlepoint, in my district, since the Executive orders and new regulations went into effect under the economy bill.

The President of the United States is well within his powers when he informs the Congress as to his views on veterans' legislation. He is well within his rights if he vetoes any legislation passed by the Congress of the United States. But we are within our rights to pass any legislation we want in justice to the veterans suffering service-connected disabilities, and I say to the Members of this House if we are given a chance, given a free and full opportunity to vote for a limit of a 15-percent cut on the service-connected veteran cases it will pass this House by a 2-to-1 majority, and it will be passed over the head of the President if vetoed.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I have here a copy of the report from the Surgeon General of the United States to the Secretary of War under date of June 30, 1898, in which the Surgeon General of the United States stated that it had been impossible in the case of the Spanish War veterans, from the medical records, to show the service-connected nature of the disabilities of many veterans. Does not the gentleman think he should give like consideration to veterans of the Spanish-American War who are unable to prove the service-connected nature of their disabilities?

Mr. FISH. The Connally amendment provides a 25-percent cut. If I had my way, I would stick to the Connally amendment, as far as Spanish-American War veterans are concerned and as requested by their national commander, leaving the reduction in their case at 25 percent. But in the case of World War veterans with service-connected disabilities I cannot see how we can go back home to the veterans and to the public and say to them that Congress has taken a 15-percent cut, the Civil Service employees have taken a 15-percent cut, all the employees of the Federal Government have taken a 15-percent cut, but we are going to take a 25-percent slice out of the compensation received by World War veterans with service-connected disabilities.

It amounts to more than 25 percent, as we proposed in this Congress to depreciate and devaluate the dollar. We also proposed to inflate the currency by $3,000,000,000, which will depreciate the dollar. Suppose we devaluate the dollar 15 percent. That would make another 15-percent cut to the veterans who receive compensation from the Federal Government.

The Congress aims to increase the cost of commodities, particularly foodstuffs from the South and from the Middle West, to increase the cost of living by at least 15 percent. Therefore the veteran has to take a cut of 25 percent, his dollar is devaluated 15 percent, the cost of living goes up 15 percent, and it amounts to a 55-percent reduction in buying power in the case of the disabled veteran. When the administration is through with him, the American disabled veteran has become the forgotten man.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. The statement has been made here this afternoon in the form of a question, on whose shoulders should the responsibility rest, whether the President's, Mr. Douglas', or somebody else's. The gentleman from New York has been here a good while. I have been here 10 years. The gentleman from New York knows that veteran legislation is a very complicated matter.

I think it is only fair to the new Members who have come into this House to say that when the economy bill came up, with all the knowledge it would take to know what was in that bill and what it would do to the disabled veterans, when these new Members were called upon to vote in this Chamber when the cry went up, "Stand by the President", those men certainly are not in the same situation as the rest of us who have been here for the past 3 years and knew exactly what we were voting on.

Mr. FISH. I want to go a little further than the gentleman from Massachusetts. The entire American public was demanding the passage of the economy bill. In that crisis the American people demanded banking legislation and the economy bill, and naturally the Members of the House representing the viewpoint of the people back home voted for both, but they had no idea how far the administration would go to reduce service-connected cases. They are not apologizing for their vote. They are only saying they want an opportunity to remedy by their vote the injustice and wrong done service-connected cases and nothing else.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. In the Veterans' Administration there are about 35,000 employees. Does not the gentleman think that is a sufficient personnel that the Veterans' Administration could send men into the field to investigate these cases and see that justice is done?

Mr. FISH. I think they could, of course.

Mr. PARSONS. Is not that the only way justice is going to be done these men?

Mr. FISH. But they refuse to do it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman from New York, who speaks about the attitude of Congress, if he does not believe the President of the United States clearly understands right now that there are enough men in this Congress who are going to refuse to adjourn until these great inequalities and injustices are remedied? Does he not know that?

Mr. FISH. I may say to the gentleman it would save a lot of time of the Congress of the United States and we could adjourn within a week if the President understood these facts, because they are the facts, and everyone in Congress knows them to be so.

Mr. BLANTON. He already understands them; and I feel confident that you will see that he does when he revises the present unjust regulations.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York and others have referred to the changes that have been made by the President in the regulations which have been issued. I have just been sent a copy of this statement referring to these changes and which will be published in the press. I believe it would be of interest and value if it were published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so as to appear in the morning's RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this statement be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Members.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, these do not seem to be very long. I should like to ask if they may not be read now.

Mr. BYRNS. I have no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Has the gentleman any idea how much money this will cost?

Mr. BYRNS. I do not know. I am simply making the request that they be printed in the RECORD tonight.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk now read the matter referred to from the rostrum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

JUNE 6, 1933.

Important changes were made today by the President in regulations having to do with compensation allowances for veterans of the World War and the Spanish-American War. These changes were approved by the President by an Executive order which he signed.

The object of the changes made was to reduce the severity of cuts originally proposed under the so-called "economy bill" passed by the Congress to maintain the credit of the United States.

The new regulations set forth in the Executive order were made possible by the President's original direction that the tentative regulations be carefully reviewed and amended to specifically prevent cuts in compensation of service-connected veterans which would be deeper than was intended and to effect more equitable levels of payment.

Under the new regulations no directly service-connected veteran will be reduced in payment by more than 25 percent, and the average reduction will approximate 18 percent. This regulation applies not only to World War veterans but to Spanish-American War veterans with directly connected disabilities and to peace-time veterans who have incurred a disability while with an expeditionary force engaged in a campaign or expedition such as Nicaragua, China, Russia, or Haiti, and who have incurred injuries or disease in line of duty.

Under this regulation the service-connected Spanish-American War veterans and some of the peace-time veterans will receive payments substantially in excess of those which they were receiving prior to the passage of the Economy Act.

With respect to World War veterans, this regulation increases the payments to those suffering from specific injuries, such as $150 a month for those who have lost both hands or both feet or 1 hand and 1 foot or in any case where the person is so helpless as to be in need of regular aid or attendant and, in addition, in the case of the more severely injured, the President's new regulations increase the allowance from $150 per month to $175 per month.

In the case of the Spanish-American War veterans over 62 years of age and who have served 90 days or more, even though they may be suffering from non-service-connected disabilities, rates are increased from $6 to $15 a month, and in the case of either Spanish-American War or World War veterans who are permanently and totally disabled the rate is increased from $20 to $30 a month

The new regulations also liberalize allowances pertaining to burial and funeral expenses to veterans; provide that pensions shall continue to be payable to children of deceased veterans up to the age of 18 years and in the event of a child being in an approved school or college, the pension may continue for an additional period until the completion of the course, but not beyond the age of 21 years.

The original regulations only authorized payment of pensions up to 16 years in such cases. This regulation also includes a provision exempting from the prohibition against payment of pensions to Federal employees the widows of deceased veterans and those veterans whose pay is $50 per month or less.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to address an inquiry to the gentleman who inserted this statement in the RECORD. Reference is made to direct service connection. I want to know whether that definition of what is direct service connection is to be made by our friend, the Director of the Budget, and his supposed subordinate from the House of Baruch, or whether it is to be made on the basis of the laws enacted by the Congress in the past.

Mr. BYRNS. I hardly think the gentleman in his question has been entirely fair to some of the gentlemen to whom he refers——

Mr. KVALE. That is very important. It will change the entire meaning.

Mr. BYRNS. I may say to the gentleman, and there is not any doubt about it, the President feels that in all borderline cases every element of doubt should be resolved in favor of the veterans, and he has so declared himself repeatedly. I am satisfied that the President, his attention having been called to the objections which have been made to the regulations heretofore issued, will see to it that those who are charged with the settlement of these cases in the future will give to the veterans the benefit of every doubt, wherever there is any doubt in regard to his condition.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to make a statement in regard to the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota, with the permission of the majority leader.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak with authority for anyone; but I have information which is rather definite, and I think authentic, to the effect that the President is going to have a committee of three visit each State to hear the complaints in every case and submit their reports to him as to any injustices that may arise with respect to any individual case. I think the gentleman from Tennessee is entirely correct when he expresses the attitude of the President. The President of the United States does not wish to see an injustice worked upon a single, worthy, ex-service man.

Mr. KVALE. Let me say to my friend the gentleman from Alabama that the President of the United States does not need to send an investigating committee into my State to find flagrant cases of abuse and injustice. I can lay a hundred of them upon his desk upon 10 minutes' notice if he wishes to have them.

Mr. McDUFFIE. They will have his attention sooner or later. He cannot attend to all of them at once. These gentlemen in the Bureau have been 6 weeks revising these regulations, and I think they have done the work of revision quickly.

Mr. KVALE. But the point I am making is that we do not need to take weeks and months to investigate just how this matter is being handled now, because we can see it for ourselves, and these men are dying; in fact, many of them in the meantime have committed suicide.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield to me for one half minute to ask the distinguished floor leader a question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I defer to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman from Tennessee inform the House as to just what the situation will be regarding the Spanish-American veterans who have not reached the age of 62. They seem to have been omitted. Can the gentleman inform us about that?

Mr. BYRNS. If they have a service-connected case, I take it they will receive a pension, just as they are receiving it now; but, of course, as the gentleman knows, under the law, if I understand it correctly, until they reach the age of 62 years they are not entitled to any pension unless they have some service-connected disability, and therefore they are not affected.

Mr. DONDERO. They would still come in and have their rights just the same?

Mr. BYRNS. As I understand the regulations, they apply to all service-connected cases.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, it is very evident there is not a quorum here, and I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced the noes seem to have it.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, evidently there is no quorum present. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON and others) there were 39 ayes and 20 noes.

So the motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 29 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, June 7, 1933, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. DONDERO: Joint resolution (H.J.Res. 198) to authorize the Comptroller of the Currency to aid in the restoration of normal banking conditions in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. GRAY: Concurrent resolution (H.Con.Res. 22) requesting the President to exercise the power granted him by virtue of section 43 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to increase agricultural purchasing power, and for other purposes", approved May 12, 1933; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

MEMORIALS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII, memorials were presented and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER: Memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, regarding building of a highway between Seattle, Wash., and Fairbanks, Alaska; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BLACK: A bill (H.R. 5947) authorizing adjustment of the claim of the Western Union Telegraph Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H.R. 5948) authorizing adjustment of the claim of the Rio Grande Southern Railroad Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KENNEY: A bill (H.R. 5949) for the relief of Leonard Delillo; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

1303. By Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri: Petition of Rodoph Scholom Lodge, No. 165, Independent Order Brith Abraham, Ben Herman, president; M. Silberman, secretary, 1400 North Euclid Avenue, St. Louis, Mo., urging the Congress to take action that will express its condemnation of the unjust persecution of Jews in Germany with a view to bringing about a speedy termination of such discrimination against the Jews; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1304. By Mr. FORD: Petition of sundry constituents of the Fourteenth Congressional District of California to restore to all service-connected disabled veterans their former benefits, privileges, schedules, ratings, etc.; to the Committee on Appropriations.

1305. By Mr. GIBSON: Petition of Vermont State Association of the National Association of Letter Carriers, urging that the postage rates be increased to a point to cover cost of mail service, and favoring the 30-year optional plan of employment retirement; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

1306. By Mr. HOEPPEL: Petition of citizens of the United States and residents of the State of California, protesting certain phases of the Economy Act regulations, particularly insofar as they pertain to the legitimately service-connected disabled veteran, and urging Congress to take such action as is necessary to revise the regulations and/or the Economy Act itself so as to restore to all veterans who were actually disabled in the military or naval service their former benefits, rights, privileges, ratings, schedules, compensation, presumptions, and pensions heretofore enjoyed by them and existent prior to the enactment of the Economy Act; to the Committee on Economy.

1307. By Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota: Resolution by the Minnesota State Council of Agencies for the Blind, adopted at annual meeting at Faribault, Minn., to reallocate funds under annual appropriation to make available talking books; to the Committee on Appropirations.

1308. Also, resolution adopted by the sixth district executive committee of the American Legion at Brainerd, Minn., June 2, to restore veteran benefits cut by the Economy Act of 1933; to the Committee on Appropriations.

1309. By Mr. KVALE: Petition of 88 citizens of Zumbrota, Minn., urging immediate enactment of House bill 4940 in order to maintain the post office in the second class; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

1310. Also, petition of 28 merchants and business men of Cannon Falls, Minn., urging that the post office be maintained as second class so that employees may retain a living wage; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

1311. Also, petition of 13 post-office clerks from various second-class offices in Minnesota, urging enactment of House bill 4940, for efficiency in post offices; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

1312. Also, petition of Elk River (Minn.) Commercial Club, urging enactment of House bill 4940, and urging that Elk River be continued in the second class of post offices; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

1313. Also, petition of Jewish societies of Eveleth and Gilbert, Minn., expressing opposition to the attitude of Hitler toward German Jews; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1314. By Mr. TRAEGER: Petition of 201 citizens of the State of California, urging legislation to restore to all veterans who were actually disabled in the military or naval service their former benefits, rights, privileges, ratings, schedules, compensation, presumptions, and pensions heretofore enjoyed by them and existent prior to the enactment of said Economy Act; to the Committee on Pensions.

1315. Also, petition of the Legislature of the State of California, urging legislation for the relief of the oil industry; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1316. Also, petition of the Legislature of the State of California, dated May 12, 1933, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for economic planning and regulation; to the Committee on Labor.

1317. Also, petition of the Legislature of the State of California, dated May 10, 1933, relative to the use of granite in Federal construction projects; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

1318. Also, petition of the Legislature of the State of California, urging legislation providing for a 2-year suspension of labor on mining claims; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

1319. Also, petition of the Legislature of the State of California, dated May 12, 1933, in regard to increasing the customs duties on certain fish products, and to negotiate treaties concerning the conservation of fish; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1320. Also, petition of the Legislature of the State of California, dated May 12, 1933, urging enactment of legislation providing for the suspension in payment of charges due from Federal reclamation-project settlers to the United States, and providing for a loan to the reclamation fund to replace the income thereto thus suspended; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

1321. Also, petition of the Legislature of the State of California, dated May 12, 1933, relative to extension of time by institutions receiving Federal aid or assistance for the payment of certain debts secured by mortgages or deeds of trust; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

1322. By the SPEAKER: Petition of United American Veterans' Association of Pittsburgh, urging that Congress amend the Economy Act; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

1323. Also, petition of Crusaders' antiracketeering mass meeting, regarding racketeering in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7, 1933

(Legislative day of Tuesday, June 6, 1933)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Dickinson	Logan	Reed
Bachman	Duffy	Lonergan	Robinson, Ark.
Barbour	Erickson	Long	Robinson, Ind.
Borah	Fess	McGill	Russell
Brown	Frazier	McNary	Stephens

Mr. VANDENBERG. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. COUZENS] is necessarily absent from the Senate en route to the London Economic Conference. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California, memorializing Congress to enact legislation to facilitate the protection of sardines in the territorial waters of California, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. JOHNSON.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California, favoring the passage of legislation limiting the hours of employment of persons on interstate carriers to 12 consecutive hours in any 24-hour consecutive period, and declaring that such employee shall remain off duty at least 12 consecutive hours, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. JOHNSON.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California, favoring the passage of legislation to limit the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in suits brought to restrain State officers in the enforcement of public-utility rate orders, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. JOHNSON.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California, relative to accepting amendments to permit from the Government of the United States for the construction of approach roads over certain rights of way leading to the Golden Gate Bridge in the Fort Baker Military Reservation, and relating to the retrocession by the Congress of jurisdiction over said rights of way as relocated, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. JOHNSON.)

Mr. JOHNSON presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Senate Joint Resolution 15, relative to memorializing and petitioning Congress to enact legislation which will facilitate the protection of sardines in the territorial waters of this State

Whereas it has long been the practice of the State of California to protect the sardines which inhabit the territorial waters of this State; and

Whereas, to that end, the reduction of sardines into fish meal, fish oil, and other fishery products has been carefully regulated; and

Whereas there are now operating on the high seas off the coast of California certain vessels which have been equipped to operate as reduction plants; and

Whereas such vessels operate in waters over which this State has no jurisdiction and engage in the unrestricted reduction of sardines; and

Whereas sardines are generally found near the coast line, and not on the high seas; and

Whereas sardines are migratory within a distance of a few miles, and the unrestricted reduction of sardines caught beyond the 3-mile limit is depleting the species as effectively as if such fish were caught within the territorial waters of this State; and

Whereas the number of floating reduction plants is constantly increasing; and

Whereas there are now pending before the Legislature of the State of California measures designed to control the present unrestricted destruction of sardines, which measures, if adopted, could be made more effective should Congress also enact legislation looking toward the preservation of this species of fish: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California earnestly memorializes and petitions Congress to enact legislation which will facilitate the preservation of sardines in the territorial waters of this State; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this joint resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, and the Vice President, and to each Member of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Senate Joint Resolution 28, relative to hours of employment of persons on interstate carriers

Whereas under the provisions of the laws of the United States persons employed on interstate railroads are required to remain on duty 16 consecutive hours; and

Whereas such extended period of continuous employment tends to the physical exhaustion and the consequent inefficiency of such employees, increasing the danger of mishap: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the legislature of this State hereby urges upon the Congress of the United States the adoption of a law limiting the hours of employment of such persons to 12 consecutive hours in any 24 consecutive hours, and declaring that such employees shall remain off duty at least 12 consecutive hours.

Mr. JOHNSON also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Senate Joint Resolution 27, relative to legislation by Congress to limit the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in suits brought to restrain State officers in the enforcement of public-utility rate orders

Whereas there has been introduced in the Congress of the United States by the Honorable HIRAM W. JOHNSON Senate bill 752, designed to limit the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States over suits wherein injunctions are sought by public-utility corporations to restrain the enforcement of orders issued by State administrative bodies fixing the rates of public utilities by amending section 24 of the Judicial Code of the United States so as to deprive the district courts of jurisdiction in such suits when an adequate remedy is provided to utilities in the courts of a State; and

Whereas such legislation is deemed to be of vital importance for the preservation of the powers of the various States in the regulation of public utilities and to be in the public interest: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California earnestly urges that the Congress of the United States immediately enact said Senate bill 752; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this joint resolution be transmitted to the President and to the Vice President of the United States and to each Member of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Senate Joint Resolution 25, relative to accepting amendments to permit from the Government of the United States for the construction of approach roads over certain rights of way leading to the Golden Gate Bridge in the Fort Baker Military Reservation, and relating to the retrocession by the Congress of the United States of jurisdiction over said rights of way as relocated

Whereas on February 13, 1931, the Secretary of War pursuant to authority in him vested by section 6 of the act of Congress approved July 5, 1884 (23 Stat. 104) granted to the Golden Gate Bridge and Highway District a right of way for the extension, maintenance, and operation of a State road across the Presidio of San Francisco Military Reservation, Calif., and across the Fort Baker Military Reservation, including space for toll booths and facilities for regulating traffic, and also the right to erect, operate, and maintain the ends of the Golden Gate Bridge with cable anchorages, upon the said military reservations; and

Whereas said grant has been accepted by the Golden Gate Bridge and Highway District and also by the Legislature of the State of California under the terms of senate joint resolution no. 11, of the forty-ninth session of the Legislature of the State of California; and

Whereas on April 1, 1931, the said permit was amended to grant a right of way of the character and extent and for the purposes therein mentioned across the Fort Baker Military Reservation, the location of the center line of such right of way being shown in red on the photostat of map attached to said amendment and made a part thereof; and

Whereas the said permit as thus amended has been accepted by the Golden Gate Bridge and Highway District and also by the Legislature of the State of California under the terms of senate joint resolution no. 16, of the forty-ninth session of the Legislature of the State of California; and

Whereas said district has made resurveys of that part of the right of way on the Fort Baker Military Reservation extending northerly of the north bridge terminus, and as a result thereof through its chief engineer has made application for a further change in said portion of the right of way on said reservation; and

Whereas on the 1st day of May 1933 the Secretary of War did grant to the Golden Gate Bridge and Highway District a modification of said permit as amended, and being a grant of a right of way of the character and extent and for the purposes in said permit mentioned, across the Fort Baker Military Reservation northerly of the north bridge terminus, the location of the center line and right of way lines being shown in red on the plan attached to said modification of said permit as amended on the 1st day of May 1933, which said plan was dated May 16, 1933, marked "Fort Baker Ground Plan and Center Line of the R/W Sheet No. A4B", the profile and sections thereof being shown on the plan bearing the same date marked "Profile and sections of State highway and north lateral on Fort Baker Res., sheet no. G-104B", also attached thereto and made a part thereof, and which said modification of said permit as amended was filed in the office of the Golden Gate Bridge and Highway District on the 5th day of March 1933; and

Whereas it was, however, in said permit expressly provided that in lieu of the War Department connecting roadways shown on said sheet no. A4B as "relocation of road to Battery Spencer" and "connecting road and gate", the grantee should prior to the commencement of construction of said connecting roadways prepare and submit for approval a revised layout thereof, in accordance with paragraph 4 of said original permit as amended on said 1st day of May 1933; and

Whereas said modified permit further provided for on the Fort Baker Military Reservation was expressly stated to be in lieu of and to supersede the right of way granted across said reservation in the original permit of February 13, 1931, and so much of the right of way in the amendment of April 1, 1931, as lies north of the north bridge terminus, but that all of the provisions and conditions of said original permit except paragraph 4 should remain in full force and effect, and said paragraph 4 was in said modified permit as amended set forth in full, to which said paragraph 4, as set forth in said instrument of May 1, 1933, reference is hereby made; and

Whereas it was, however, in said modification expressly provided that the amendments therein contained should not become effective and the original permit of February 13, 1931, and the amendment of April 1, 1931, should remain unchanged thereby, unless and until the said Golden Gate Bridge and Highway District should have accepted said amendment, and unless and until the State of California should have, with respect to said amendment, taken the same formal action which it was required to take with respect to the original permit, and which is set forth in paragraph 11 and subparagraphs 11a, 11b, and 11c of that instrument, as a condition precedent to the taking effect thereof: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That said modification and amendment dated May 1, 1933, to the said permit dated February 13, 1931, as amended by the amendment dated April 1, 1931, granted by the Secretary of War to the Golden Gate Bridge and Highway District, be and the same hereby is, together with each, all, every, and singular the terms, conditions, limitations, reservations, and requirements therein contained, accepted by and on behalf of the State of California; and be it further

Resolved, That the State of California does hereby make application to the Congress of the United States for a retrocession of jurisdiction over the rights of way as relocated and amended by said modification dated May 1, 1933, in lieu of and superseding the application for retrocession of jurisdiction over the right of way heretofore granted across the Fort Baker Military Reservation in the original permit of February 13, 1931, and as amended by the amendment dated April 1, 1931, in case said relocation of the right of way is finally granted to the Golden Gate Bridge and Highway District; and be it further

Resolved, That the State of California will, in case such retrocession of jurisdiction is granted by Congress, accept such retrocession of jurisdiction and will assume the responsibility for managing, controlling, policing, and regulating traffic thereon, all subject to the following limitations and to such other limitations as Congress may prescribe:

(a) That nothing in said permit contained shall be construed to give to the State of California or any of its agents authority at any time to regulate traffic of military personnel or vehicles upon the said bridge or roads. All traffic upon said roads and upon said bridge shall be free from any tolls, charges, or any form of obstruction by the State or other agencies, against military and naval personnel and their dependents, civilians of the Army and Navy traveling on Government business under military authority, and Government traffic.

(b) That whenever in the judgment of the Secretary of War or his authorized representative any emergency exists which justifies it, he may assume exclusive control and management of said bridge and roads and may then, in his discretion, prohibit, limit, or regulate traffic thereon.

(c) That nothing in said permit contained shall be construed to confer upon the State courts the right to try persons subject to military law for crimes or offenses committed on said roads or upon said bridge within the boundaries of the respective military reservations involved, but the courts of the United States or military tribunals as now or hereafter provided by law shall retain exclusive jurisdiction to try such persons for such offenses; and be it further

Resolved, That the State of California does hereby agree to make such relocated right of way in the Fort Baker Military Reservation in said amended permit described a part of the system of public highways of the State; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of War, to each House of Congress, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress of the State of California.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Florida, favoring the allocation of Federal funds for the immediate construction of a canal suitable for the operation of self-propelled barges for the completion of the inland waterway from New Orleans, La., to Columbus, Ga., or beyond, to Atlanta, as the case may be, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on the 3d instant, p. 4886, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. KEAN presented a resolution adopted by the New Jersey branches of the Catholic Central Verein of America and the Catholic Women's Union of America, at Newark, N.J., which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States and Congress are endeavoring to bring about the necessary improvements in the field of business activity; and

Whereas the economic forces of capital and labor are still in disagreement as to the just distribution of the fruits and endeavors according to the degree of contributions made by these respective forces; and

Whereas it is therefore necessary for the Government to regulate and control the activities of these forces for the purpose of effecting a just settlement of their respective claims, thereby contributing toward the common good; and

Whereas it is imperative that all industrial factors, including machinery, hours, and rates of wages, as well as profits of industry, should be regulated and rationally controlled: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Catholic Central Verein of America and by the Catholic Women's Union of America, New Jersey Branches, That we petition the Congress of the United States for legislation regulating the use of machinery, hours of labor, minimum wages paid labor, both male and female, the amount of profit to be made upon the manufacture, sale, and/or distribution of the products of industry; and

We further petition the Congress of the United States for legislation limiting the use of labor-saving devices, shortening the working week and hours thereof, providing a minimum wage scale for male and female employees, specifying the amount of profit to be made upon the manufacture, sale, and/or distribution of the products of industry.

Respectfully submitted.

CATHOLIC CENTRAL VEREIN OF AMERICA, NEW JERSEY BRANCH, LOUIS M. SEIG, President.
JOSEPH NADLER, Jr., Secretary.
CATHOLIC WOMEN'S UNION OF AMERICA, NEW JERSEY BRANCH, LOUISA A. BOLCUR, President.
ALVINA MADDEN, Secretary.

Adopted at Newark, N.J., May 28, 1933.

TILE IN THE WHITE HOUSE SWIMMING POOL

Mr. KEAN presented a letter from the Federal Seaboard Terra Cotta Corporation, by Peter C. Olsen, first vice president and general manager, New York City, N.Y., relative to the tile supplied by that corporation for the President's swimming pool installed in the White House, which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, June 1, 1933.

Hon. HAMILTON F. KEAN,
Kean, Taylor & Co.,
20 Exchange Place, New York City.

MY DEAR SENATOR: It has occurred to me that you might be interested in seeing the high-fire glazed terra cotta we have recently produced for the President's swimming pool now being built in the west terrace corridor of the White House.

The pool is designed in an unusually vigorous and dignified color scheme of terra-cotta glazes—the variegated aquamarine tints remind of the blue sea water of our southern resorts—and not of a bathtub.

Won't you please, when you have the opportunity, stop in the White House and see the pool? It is very much worth while, and we hope you will like it.

Very truly yours.

FEDERAL SEABOARD TERRA COTTA CORPORATION,
By PETER C. OLSEN,
First Vice President and General Manager.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present a petition signed by citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying that the United States become a member of the League of Nations in the near future, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures, as follows:

MARCH, 1933.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate.

We, the undersigned, registered voters in Massachusetts, because of the greatly needed growth in international understanding and cooperation, do earnestly desire you to do all in your power to have the United States become a member of the League of Nations in the near future.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1783. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Overseas Road and Toll Bridge District, a political subdivision of the State of Florida, to construct, maintain, and operate bridges across the navigable waters in Monroe County, Fla., from Lower Matecumbe Key to No Name Key (Rept. No. 127);

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY—AMENDMENTS

Mr. KEAN, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. MCCARRAN, Mr. MCGILL, Mr. REYNOLDS, and Mr. WHEELER each submitted an amendment, and Mr. REED and Mr. RUSSELL each submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to House bill 5755, the so-called "industrial control and public works bill", which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. AUSTIN submitted five amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 5755, the so-called "industrial control and public works bill", which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I intend to propose to the general industries or recovery bill. It proposes to strike out the increased tax on gasoline. I ask that the amendment lie on the table, but will not ask that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma will lie on the table.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to House bill 5755, now pending, which I ask may be printed, printed in the RECORD, and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 14, line 20, beginning with the word "The", to strike out all through and including the word "State" on page 15, line 1, and insert the following:

"(c) The President is authorized to prescribe regulations to supplement State conservation laws regulating the production of crude petroleum, to allocate equitably the national market demand for crude petroleum and the products thereof among the oil-producing States and also between domestic production and importations, and to prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of crude petroleum and the products thereof produced or withdrawn from storage in violation of any State or Federal law or the regulations prescribed thereunder."

EXEMPTION FROM TAX OF DIVIDENDS OF MUTUAL BUILDING-AND-LOAN ASSOCIATIONS—NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY—AMENDMENT RELATIVE TO TAXES

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present an amendment to the pending bill and ask that it may be printed, printed in the RECORD, and lie on the table. I also present a statement explanatory of the amendment which I ask may be printed with the amendment in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment and the explanatory statement are as follows:

On page 36, at the end of section 212, insert the following:

"(e) The taxes imposed by this section shall not apply to the dividends of any corporation enumerated in section 103 of the Revenue Act of 1932 nor to any insurance company subject to the tax imposed by sections 201 and 204 of such act."

MEMORANDUM RE INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY BILL (H.R. 5755)

Relief taxes—section 212, page 35: Presumably this section was written to tax dividends of industrial and business corporations and not intended to tax the distribution of earnings by mutual or domestic building-and-loan associations, mutual insurance companies, cooperatives, labor, agricultural, horticultural, or such other organizations as are exempted from the tax on corporations in section 103 of the Revenue Act of 1932.

A building-and-loan association is a local, community, mutual organization financing the building and buying of homes. There are 11,442 of these institutions in the United States. Substantially all of their business is confined to making loans to members. Their funds arise from the savings or membership of wage earners and people in the humbler walks of life. In fact, building-and-loan associations are often spoken of as the "poor man's banks."

At this time the associations are experiencing great difficulty, due to unemployment and other conditions, in obtaining money with which to make construction or other mortgage loans and to pay investing members who are out of employment and in need of money. The average amount invested in these mutual institutions by each member is approximately $700 and their average mortgage loan is slightly over $3,000.

Building-and-loan associations have a legal peculiarity in that all of their funds are in the form of shares and the earnings thereon are distributed as dividends. Dividends are paid to borrowing members as well as to investing members, because loans are repaid through payments on shares augmented by dividends earned. Therefore a tax on dividends amounting to 5 percent will further discourage the flow of funds into these worthy institutions, will be an additional burden to the borrower, as well as take very modest amounts from a type of small saver who can ill afford it. The tax will also result in colossal expense and inconvenience to the associations in calculating small amounts, filing the required lists, embracing over 10,000,000 members, and accounting to the Government.

A great discrimination would result from the present language because millions of depositors in banks, mutual savings banks, and trust companies would not be taxed because the payments they receive are called "interest", while the very similar payments of earnings in building-and-loan associations are called "dividends."

Provision was made in subsection (c) of section 214 that the excise or capital-stock tax therein imposed should not apply to corporations enumerated in section 103 of the Revenue Act of 1932. In order to make this same proper exception apply to section 212 the following amendment should be inserted:

AMENDMENT TO AMENDED H.R. 5755, AS REPORTED BY SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE

On page 36, at the end of section 212, add the following:

"(e) The taxes imposed by this section shall not apply to the dividends of any corporation enumerated in section 103 of the Revenue Act of 1932 nor to any insurance company subject to the tax imposed by sections 201 and 204 of such act."

Submitted by United States Building and Loan League; H. F. Cellarius, Cincinnati, Ohio, secretary-treasurer; C. Clinton James, Washington, D.C., chairman Federal Legislative Committee; Morton Bodfish, Chicago, Ill., executive manager.

TAXES IMPOSED BY THE INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY BILL

Mr. WALSH. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD in connection with the debate on this bill an enumeration of the taxes imposed therein.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT—TAXES IMPOSED BY THE INDUSTRIAL-RECOVERY BILL

Section 210 increases the 1-cent tax on gasoline imposed under existing law by one half cent, and exempts industrial benzol from the tax.

Section 211 extends the taxes (designated as manufacturers' excise taxes and miscellaneous taxes) imposed by titles 4 and 5 of the Revenue Act of 1932, for an additional year, so that they expire July 1, 1935, instead of July 1, 1934.

Section 212 imposes an excise tax on all dividends paid to any person other than a domestic corporation. The tax is 5 percent of the dividend, and is imposed on the recipient, but is to be deducted and withheld by the paying corporation.

Section 213 is an administrative amendment to penalize the avoidance of the dividend tax by the accumulation of corporate surplus. The penalty is a tax of 50 percent of the corporate income.

Section 214 imposes an annual tax of $1 for each $1,000 of the declared value of the capital stock of every corporation carrying on or doing business.

Section 215 imposes on corporations, subject to the capital-stock tax, an excess-profits tax equivalent to 5 percent of such portion of its net income as exceeds 12½ percent of the declared value of its capital stock. The primary purpose of this tax is to induce corporations to declare a high value for the purposes of capital-stock tax.

Section 216 provides for the expiration by Presidential proclamation of the new taxes imposed by the foregoing sections in the event that the Budget is balanced or the eighteenth amendment is repealed. This expiration date applies to the additional one half cent on gasoline, but not to the 1 cent. The entire gasoline tax expires July 1, 1935, in any event.

Section 217 (a) abolishes the privilege, under existing law, of carrying over a net loss for 1 year to reduce taxable income for the next year. Existing law permits a carry-over of 1 year. The 1928 act permitted a 2-year carry-over.

Section 217 (b) abolishes the privilege of applying losses from dealings in securities against gains from dealings in securities for a subsequent year.

Section 217 (c) abolishes the exemption from the provisions relating to losses from securities dealings, which is given by the existing law to private bankers.

Section 217 (d) provides that partners shall not be allowed to reduce their individual incomes by their distributive share of a partnership net loss, which is attributable to losses from dealings in securities.

Section 217 (e) increases the additional rate of income tax on corporations filing consolidated returns from three fourths of 1 percent to 1 percent, and extends the additional rate to the taxable years 1934 and 1935. The present law fixes the additional rate at three fourths of 1 percent for the years 1932 and 1933.

Section 217 (f) and (g) are administrative provisions to take care of interest and returns in cases where the income-tax amendments have a retroactive effect.

Section 218 exempts free admissions to the legitimate spoken drama from the admissions tax.

INCREASE IN MEMBERSHIP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON CONSERVATION OF WILD LIFE RESOURCES

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 96), which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the membership of the Special Committee on Conservation of Wild Life Resources shall be increased from 5 to 7 members and that the President of the Senate on the passage of this resolution shall appoint the 2 additional members.

WILLIE MAYES SHUEY

Mr. GLASS submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 98), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for expenses of inquiries and investigations, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1932, to Willie Mayes Shuey, widow of Theodore F. Shuey, late an Official Reporter of the Senate, a sum equal to 1 year's compensation at the rate he was receiving at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

PROTECTION OF GOVERNMENT RECORDS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4220) for the protection of Government records, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

JOE T. ROBINSON,
WM. E. BORAH,
TOM CONNALLY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

TOM D. MCKEOWN,
J. BANKS KURTZ,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 1580) to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation, and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. RAYBURN, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. LEA of California, Mr. PARKER of New York, and Mr. COOPER of Ohio were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

On May 29, 1933:

S. 73. An act to authorize the Comptroller General to allow claim of district no. 13, Choctaw County, Okla., for payment of tuition for Indian pupils.

On June 5, 1933:

S.J.Res. 43. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point, Posheng Yen, a citizen of China.

On June 6, 1933:

S. 510. An act to provide for the establishment of a national employment system and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such system, and for other purposes.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that the calendar be now called for unobjected bills under rule VIII.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am not going to object. I understand it will take only about 30 minutes to complete the consideration of bills on the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand it will take only a few minutes to call the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will state the first bill on the calendar.

JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILLS PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 15) extending to the whaling industry certain benefits granted under section 11 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, was announced as first in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 682) to prohibit financial transactions with any foreign government in default on its obligations to the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 882) to provide for the more effective supervision of foreign commercial transactions, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1286) to increase the efficiency of the Veterinary Corps of the Regular Army was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 506) conferring upon the President the power to reduce subsidies, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HALE. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

SURVIVAL OF CERTAIN ACTIONS IN FAVOR OF THE UNITED STATES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 815) to provide for the survival of certain actions in favor of the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the word "interested", to strike out "now or hereafter" and insert "and"; in line 6, after the word "pending", to insert "against any defendant prior to the time of his death"; in line 8, after the word "any", to insert "such"; and in the same line, after the word "defendant", to strike out "in such action", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That no civil action to recover damages, brought by the United States or in its behalf, or in which the United States shall be directly or indirectly interested, and pending against any defendant prior to the time of his death, in any court of the United States, shall abate by reason of the death of any such defendant; but any such action shall survive and be enforceable against the estate of any such deceased defendant. This act shall not be construed to deprive the plaintiff in any such action of any remedy which he may have against a surviving defendant.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of the bill.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the bill makes no reference to any particular or individual case, but its authors had in mind primarily the case of Edward Doheny, who is at the present time involved in many judgments and claims growing out of the so-called "oil scandals", and the Department of Justice has felt that this proposed legislation was necessary in order to effect the recovery to which the Government is entitled in the event of his death.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The bill is asked for by the Department of Justice?

Mr. NYE. It has been asked for by the Department of Justice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILL PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (H.J.Res. 93) to prohibit the exportation of arms or munitions of war from the United States under certain conditions was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1403) to authorize the merger of the Georgetown Gaslight Co. with and into Washington Gas Light Co., and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

TRANSFER OF LANDS IN SAN DIEGO, CALIF.

The bill (H.R. 1767) to authorize the acceptance of certain lands in the city of San Diego, Calif., by the United States and the transfer by the Secretary of the Navy of certain other lands to said city of San Diego was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized on behalf of the United States to accept from the city of San Diego, Calif., when said city has been duly authorized to make such transfer by the State of California, free from all encumbrances and without cost to the United States, all right, title, and interest in and to the lands contained within the following-described area: Beginning at the intersection of the prolongation of the northwesterly line of Bean Street with the United States bulkhead line as established in February 1912; thence southwesterly along the prolongation of the northwesterly line of Bean Street to the pierhead line as the same has been or may hereafter be established by the United States; thence northwesterly and southwesterly along the said pierhead line to its intersection with the prolongation of the northeasterly line of Lowell Street; thence northwesterly along the prolongation of the northeasterly line of Lowell Street to the United States bulkhead line as established in February 1912; thence northeasterly, easterly, and southeasterly along the United States bulkhead line as established in February 1912 to the point of beginning containing approximately 242 acres; and also, all of block 16, municipal tide lands subdivision, tract numbered 1; said lands being desired by the Navy Department for national defense and for use in connection with existing naval activities at San Diego, Calif.

The said Secretary of the Navy is also authorized hereby to transfer to the city of San Diego, Calif., free from all encumbrances and without cost to said city of San Diego, all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the lands contained within that part of the Marine Corps base, San Diego, Calif., described as follows: Beginning at a point on the United States bulkhead line as established in February 1912, distant 300 feet northwesterly from station numbered 104 on said bulkhead line; thence north 7 degrees east a distance of 2,160 feet; thence north 60°34'59" west to an intersection with the prolongation of the northwesterly line of Bean Street; thence southwesterly along the prolongation of the northwesterly line of Bean Street to an intersection with the United States bulkhead line, as established in February 1912; thence south 83° east along said bulkhead line to the point of beginning, containing approximately 67 acres.

IMPROVEMENT OF ALLEY CONDITIONS IN THE DISTRICT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1780) to provide for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in alleys in the District of Columbia, and for the replatting and development of squares containing inhabited alleys, in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, safety, and welfare, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 23, after the word "determine", to insert "Provided, That if any such land is required for the purposes of the government of the District of Columbia such land may be transferred to the said government upon payment to the Authority of the reasonable value thereof", so as to make the section read:

That to enable the President, in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, safety, and welfare, to provide for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in alleys and to eliminate the hidden communities in inhabited alleys of the District of Columbia, and to carry out the policy declared in the act approved May 16, 1918, as amended, of caring for the alley population of the District of Columbia, the President is hereby authorized and empowered, within the limits of the amounts herein authorized—

(a) To purchase, or acquire by condemnation or gift, any land, buildings, or structures, or any interest therein, situated in or adjacent to any inhabited alley in the District of Columbia, and such other land, buildings, or structures, or any interest therein, within any square containing an inhabited alley as he may determine to be necessary for the replatting and improvement of said square pursuant to the provisions of this act;

(b) To replat any land acquired under this act; to pave or repave any street or alley thereon; to construct sewers and water mains therein; to install street lights thereon; to demolish, move, or alter any buildings or structures situated thereon and erect such buildings or structures thereon as deemed advisable: Provided, however, That the same shall be done and performed in accordance with the laws and municipal regulations of the District of Columbia applicable thereto;

(c) To lease, rent, maintain, equip, manage, exchange, sell, or convey any such lands, buildings, or structures upon such terms and conditions as he may determine: Provided, That if any such land is required for the purposes of the government of the District of Columbia such land may be transferred to the said government upon payment to the Authority of the reasonable value thereof; and

(d) To aid in providing, equipping, managing, and maintaining houses and other buildings, improvements, and general community utilities on the property acquired under the provisions of this act by loans, upon such terms and conditions as he may determine, to limited dividend corporations whose dividends do not exceed 6 percent per annum, or to home owners to enable such corporations or home owners to acquire and develop sites on the property: Provided, however, That no loan shall be made at a lower rate of interest than 5 percent per annum, and that all such loans shall be secured by reserving a first lien on the property involved for the benefit of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 23, after the word "or", to insert the words "method of", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. (a) The President may designate, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, such official or agency of the Government of the United States or of the District of Columbia (hereinafter referred to as "the Authority") as in his judgment is deemed necessary or advantageous, and the Authority shall have or obtain all powers necessary or appropriate therefor, including the employment of necessary personal services; but (1) all plans for replatting and/or method of condemnation under the provisions of this act shall be submitted to and receive the written approval of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That (a) failure of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission or of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia to formally approve or disapprove in writing within 60 days after a plan has been submitted shall be equivalent to a formal approval, and (b) disapproval shall be accompanied by a written statement giving all the reasons for disapproval; and (2) any plan which shall involve action by any department, bureau, or agency of the United States or of the District of Columbia shall be made after consultation with such department, bureau, or agency.

(b) In the event condemnation proceedings are required to carry out the provisions of this act the same shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the acquisition of land in the District of Columbia for the use of the United States", approved March 1, 1929.

(c) If the Authority determines in the case of any alley that it will be more advantageous to proceed in accordance with sections 1608 to 1610, inclusive, of the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall be notified of such determination and proceedings shall then be had as provided in such sections for alleys and minor streets, except that if the total amount of damages awarded by the jury and the cost and expenses of the proceedings be in excess of the total amount of the assessment for benefits, such excess shall be borne and paid by the Authority.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 8, line 19, after the word "property", to insert the words "to which it is accessory", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. As used in this act—

(a) The term "alley" means (1) any court, thoroughfare, or passage, private or public, less than 30 feet wide at any point; and

(2) any court, thoroughfare, or passage, private or public, 30 feet or more in width, that does not open directly with a width of at least 30 feet upon a public street that is at least 40 feet wide from building line to building line.

(b) The term "inhabited alley" means an alley in or appurtenant to which there are one or more alley dwellings.

(c) The term "alley dwelling" means any dwelling fronting upon or having its principal means of ingress from an alley. This definition does not include an accessory building, such as a garage, with living rooms for servants or other employees; if the principal entrance to the living rooms of the accessory building is from the street property to which it is accessory.

(d) The term "dwelling" means any building or structure used or designed to be used in whole or in part as a living or a sleeping place by one or more human beings.

(e) The term "person" includes any individual, partnership, corporation, or association.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROMOTION OF FOREIGN TRADE IN APPLES AND PEARS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 4812) to promote the foreign trade of the United States in apples and/or pears, to protect the reputation of American-grown apples and pears in foreign markets, to prevent deception or misrepresentation as to the quality of such products moving in foreign commerce, to provide for the commercial inspection of such products entering such commerce, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments, on page 1, line 4, after the word "any", to strike out "common"; in the same line, after the word "carrier", to insert "or any steamship company, or any person"; and on page 2, line 12, after the word "act", to strike out "No clearance shall be given to any vessel having on board any apples or pears which are not covered by a certificate complying with the provisions of this act", so as to make the section read:

That it shall be unlawful for any person to ship or offer for shipment or for any carrier, or any steamship company, or any person to transport or receive for transportation to any foreign destination, except as provided in this act, any apples and/or pears in packages which are not accompanied by a certificate issued under authority of the Secretary of Agriculture showing that such apples or pears are of a Federal or State grade which meets the minimum of quality established by the Secretary for shipment in export. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe, by regulations, the requirements, other than those of grade, which the fruit must meet before certificates are issued. The Secretary shall provide opportunity, by public hearing or otherwise, for interested persons to examine and make recommendation with respect to any standard of export proposed to be established or designated, or regulation prescribed, by the Secretary for the purposes of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. COPELAND subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask that following the disposition of Calendar No. 120, being House bill 4812, certain telegrams which I have received regarding that measure may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N.Y., June 1, 1933.

ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senator of New York, United States Senate Office Building.

HONORABLE SIR: We respectfully request and urge your support of Senator BYRD'S apple export bill, No. H.R. 4812.

FRUIT AND PRODUCE TRADE ASSOCIATION,
97 Warren Street.

NEW YORK, N.Y., June 1, 1933.

Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

HONORABLE SIR: We most respectfully and urgently request that you support Senator BYRD'S apple export bill, H.R. 4812. Whether a great many apple growers in this country continue to operate or not depends upon passage of this bill.

T. A. WATSON & Co.

NEW YORK, N.Y., June 1, 1933.

Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

HONORABLE SIR: We respectfully request and urge your support of Senator BYRD'S apple export bill, H.R. 4812. Apple growers' financial success depends upon passage of this bill.

C. C. HESS & Co.

NEW YORK, N.Y., June 1, 1933.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
The Senate:

We urge your support in securing passage of Senate bill 877 in the interest of preservation of fresh-fruit export industry. Indiscriminate shipments of inferior and infected apples and pears have already resulted in restrictive regulations, principally by England, France, Germany, and it is certain that other countries will follow suit or else place complete embargoes. Such an eventuality would be disastrous to producers and shippers of these commodities. Domestic consumption cannot absorb surplus.

E. W. J. HEARTY, INC.

ROCHESTER, N.Y., May 31, 1933.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

Please cooperate with Senator BYRD in passing export control bill, H.R. 4812. Bill has already passed House and has been approved by apple and pear industries from coast to coast. We deem it highly important bill pass this session in interests preserving our extensive foreign trade apples and pears.

INTERNATIONAL APPLE ASSOCIATION,
R. G. PHILLIPS, Secretary.

NEW YORK, N.Y.

Senator COPELAND, of New York,
United States Senate Building:

Respectfully urge your support apple export bill sponsored by Senator BYRD, of Virginia.

ROBERT W. NIX,
Rockville Center, Long Island.

NEW YORK, N.Y., June 1, 1933.

Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senate Office Building:

We respectfully solicit your support Senator BYRD'S apple export bill, H.R. 4812.

AMERICAN FRUIT GROWERS, INC.

PAYMENT TO CHIPPEWA INDIANS, MINNESOTA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1561) providing for payment of $100 to each enrolled Chippewa Indian of the Red Lake Band of Minnesota from the timber funds standing to their credit in the Treasury of the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 7, after the word "of", to strike out "$100" and insert "$50, in two equal installments of $25 each, one as soon as practicable after the passage of this act and one on or about December 1, 1933"; and on page 2, line 9, after the word "Indians," to insert "except that not to exceed 15 percent of each installment may be deducted to apply toward individual obligations due the United States or the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to withdraw from the Treasury so much as may be necessary of the principal timber fund on deposit to the credit of the Red Lake Band of the Chippewa Indians of the State of Minnesota and to make therefrom payment of $50, in two equal installments of $25 each, one as soon as practicable after the passage of this act and one on or about December 1, 1933, to each enrolled Chippewa Indian of the Red Lake Band of Minnesota, under such regulations as such Secretary shall prescribe. No payment shall be made under this act until the Chippewa Indians of the Red Lake Band of Minnesota shall, in such manner as such Secretary shall prescribe, have accepted such payments and ratified the provisions of this act. The money paid to the Indians under this act shall not be subject to any lien or claim of whatever nature against any of said Indians, except that not to exceed 15 percent of each installment may be deducted to apply toward individual obligations due the United States or the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for payment of $50 to each enrolled Chippewa Indian of the Red Lake Band of Minnesota from the timber funds standing to their credit in the Treasury of the United States."

M. M. TWICHEL

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1126) for the relief of M. M. Twichel, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, with an amendment, on line 6, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$6,200.90" and insert "$3,433.34"; and on line 10, after the words "prior to", to strike out "December 2, 1931" and insert "May 1, 1933", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to M. M. Twichel, of St. Ignatius, Mont., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,433.34 in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States for compensation for services rendered and expenses incurred in connection with the burial of Indians on the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont., prior to May 1, 1933.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETER PIERRE

The bill (S. 512) for the relief of Peter Pierre was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $45 to Peter Pierre, in payment for a horse which was lost while being used to transport supplies to a forest fire on the Flathead Indian Reservation, State of Montana.

SUIT BY THE FLATHEAD, KOOTENAI, AND UPPER PEND D'OREILLE INDIANS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 723) to amend the act of March 13, 1924 (43 Stat.L. 21), so as to permit the Flathead, Kootenai, and Upper Pend d'Oreille Tribes or Nations of Indians to file suit thereunder, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Flathead, Kootenai, and Upper Pend d'Oreille Tribes or Nations of Indians of Montana shall be granted a further period of 2 years from the date of this act within which to file suit in the Court of Claims under the act of March 13, 1924 (43 Stat.L. 21): Provided, That the limitation of attorneys' fees to $25,000 contained therein shall not apply to the Indians of the Flathead Reservation, Mont.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I notice that the bill strikes out the limitation on attorney's fees, which is usual in such cases. I am wondering why a different course should be followed in this instance. It is notorious that the Indians have been held up by their lawyers in the absence of such a limiting clause. I move that the proviso be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the author of the bill, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is not present. Therefore I am going to ask that the bill may be passed over without prejudice, so that it may be considered a little later if he arrives in the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to passing over the bill without prejudice? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WHEELER subsequently said: Mr. President, my attention was distracted when Senate bill 723 was reached. I do not know who objected to it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I may say to the Senator from Montana that no objection was made to the bill. The Senator from Pennsylvania was about to suggest an amendment. I thought the Senator from Montana was absent, so I asked that the bill go over, without prejudice, in order that the Senator from Montana might have an opportunity to be present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana explain to us the reason for the proviso which leaves attorney's fees unlimited in this matter?

Mr. WHEELER. I have not any objection to limiting the attorney's fees. I may say, however, that the bill was sent down to me from the Department in its present form.

Mr. REED. Would the Senator be willing to accept an amendment to strike out the proviso beginning in line 7?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; I am willing to do so.

Mr. REED. I move that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES L. GRAVES

The bill (S. 690) for the relief of Charles L. Graves was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. BRATTON subsequently said: Mr. President, during my temporary absence from the Chamber, Calendar No. 125, being the bill (S. 690) for the relief of Charles L. Graves, went over on objection. I ask unanimous consent to return to that bill, in order that I may make a brief explanation of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRATTON. Charles H. Graves is superintendent of the Jicarilla Indian Agency. About 2 years ago we appropriated some money with which to buy tribal sheep for those Indians. The sheep were purchased; the money was expended for the purpose authorized by the act of Congress, but the details of making the purchase and of disbursing the funds were not correct. The Secretary of the Interior, however, gives a detailed statement of the manner in which the money was expended, and he concludes with this language:

The end attained was the same, and, as a matter of fact, the method followed by Superintendent Graves resulted in considerable saving of time and effort; but it was necessary to correct his accounts.

Mr. President, inasmuch as the superintendent received not a dime of the money, that the Indians received the benefits of all of it, that his action was entirely for their benefit, and that it is merely a matter of correcting accounts, I ask that the bill may be passed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does the bill call for an additional appropriation?

Mr. BRATTON. It does not. The money has been expended, but the Comptroller General holds that the superintendent is liable for it. No appropriation is made or contemplated. The bill merely corrects the superintendent's accounts for money expended for the benefit of the Indians.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to allow credit in the accounts of Charles L. Graves, superintendent and special disbursing agent at Jicarilla Agency, N.Mex., for payments aggregating $51,277, made from tribal funds of the Jicarilla Indians to various persons in connection with the purchase of sheep for issue to various members of the tribe, to which payments exception was taken by the General Accounting Office for the reason as claimed that there was no authority of law therefor.

FINAL PROOF BY HOMESTEAD ENTRYMEN

The bill (H.R. 5239) to extend the provisions of the act entitled "An act to extend the period of time during which final proof may be offered by homestead entrymen", approved May 13, 1932, to desert-land entrymen, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to extend the period of time during which final proof may be offered by homestead entrymen", approved May 13, 1932, is amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to extend for not exceeding 2 years the period during which annual or final proof may be offered by any person who has a pending homestead or desert-land entry upon public lands of the United States on which at the date of this act or on any date on or prior to December 31, 1934, under existing law, annual or final proof is required, showing residence, cultivation, improvements, expenditures, or payment of purchase money, as the case may be: Provided, That any such entryman shall be required to show that it is a hardship upon himself to meet the requirements incidental to annual or final proof upon the date required by existing law due to adverse weather or economic conditions: And provided further, That this act shall apply only to cases where adequate relief is not available under existing law.

"SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this act."

EXCHANGE OF LANDS, FORT MOJAVE INDIAN RESERVATION

The bill (S. 1807) to provide for the exchange of Indian and privately owned lands, Fort Mojave Indian Reservation,

Ariz., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to accept, in his discretion, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, conveyances to the Government of privately owned lands contiguous to the even-numbered sections added to the Fort Mojave Indian Reservation, Ariz., by Executive order of February 2, 1911, and to permit lieu selections of lands approximately equal in value from the even-numbered sections by those surrendering their holdings, so that the lands retained and acquired through exchange for Indian use may be consolidated and held in a solid area so far as may be possible: Provided, That upon conveyance of any privately owned lands to the Government pursuant thereto, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to issue to the person or persons making the conveyance, patent of appropriate form and legal effect for the lieu lands. The areas consolidated in the Government pursuant to this act are hereby declared to be held for the benefit of the Indians of the Fort Mojave Reservation: Provided further, That the title or claim of any person or persons who refuse to convey to the Government shall not be affected by this act.

AMENDMENT OF PROBATION LAW

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 5208) to amend the probation law, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, on page 1, line 3, after the word "paragraph", to insert "of section 2", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first sentence of the second paragraph of section 2 of the act of March 4, 1925, entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of a probation system in the United States courts, except in the District of Columbia" (U.S.C., title 18, sec. 725), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows: "At any time within the probation period the probation officer may arrest the probationer wherever found, without a warrant, or the court which has granted the probation may issue a warrant for his arrest, which warrant may be executed by either the probation officer or the United States marshal of either the district in which the probationer was put upon probation or of any district in which the probationer shall be found and, if the probationer shall be so arrested in a district other than that in which he has been put upon probation, any of said officers may return probationer to the district out of which such warrant shall have been issued."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should like a statement with reference to the bill, its provisions, and purposes.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, the bill modifies the probation law and provides that where a probationer violates his parole he may be arrested within the district while he is on parole by the probation officer and brought back before the court. If, however, he happens to be in another district, then the court out of which the probation issued may make its warrant directed to the probation officer and authorize the probation officer to arrest him wherever he may be. The law is not altogether clear upon that point. The bill was suggested by the Department of Justice to clarify the provisions of the law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

PRINTING OF CONSTITUTION AND DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

The concurrent resolution (S.Con.Res. 2) providing for the printing, with an index, of the Constitution of the United States, as amended to April 1, 1933, together with the Declaration of Independence, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Constitution of the United States, as amended to April 1, 1933, together with the Declaration of Independence, be printed as a Senate document, with an index, in such form and style as may be directed by the Joint Committee on Printing, and that 3,500 additional copies be printed, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H.R. 5755) to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

DEFERRED PAYMENTS ON HOMESTEAD ENTRIES

The bill (S. 1774) to provide for extension of time for making deferred payments on homestead entries in the abandoned Fort Lowell Military Reservation, Ariz., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time within which a homestead entryman for lands in the abandoned Fort Lowell Military Reservation, in the State of Arizona, shall make deferred payments be, and it is hereby, extended for a period of 2 years from the 1933 anniversary of the date of the acceptance of his proof tendered on his entry.

UMPQUA RIVER BRIDGE, OREGON

The bill (S. 1745) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Umpqua River at or near Reedsport, Douglas County, Oreg., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Umpqua River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Reedsport, Douglas County, Oreg., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. If tolls are charged for the use of such bridge, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of the bridge and its approaches, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 15 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the costs of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

YAQUINA BAY BRIDGE, OREGON

The bill (S. 1746) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across Yaquina Bay at or near Newport, Lincoln County, Oreg., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Yaquina Bay, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Newport, Lincoln County, Oreg., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. If tolls are charged for the use of such bridge, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of the bridge and its approaches, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 15 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the costs of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

ALSEA BAY TOLL BRIDGE, OREGON

The bill (S. 1747) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across Alsea Bay at or near Waldport, Lincoln County, Oreg., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Alsea Bay, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Waldport, Lincoln County, Oreg., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. If tolls are charged for the use of such bridge, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of the bridge and its approaches, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 15 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the costs of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

COOS BAY BRIDGE, OREGON

The bill (S. 1748) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across Coos Bay at or near North Bend, Coos County, Oreg., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Coos Bay, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near North Bend, Coos County, Oreg., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. If tolls are charged for the use of such bridge, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of the bridge and its approaches, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 15 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the costs of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

SIUSLAW RIVER TOLL BRIDGE, OREGON

The bill (S. 1749) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Siuslaw River at or near Florence, Lane County, Oreg., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Siuslaw River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Florence, Lane County, Oreg., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. An accurate record of the costs of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

DECEPTION PASS BRIDGE, WASHINGTON

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1742) granting consent of Congress to Ernest N. Hutchinson, Otto A. Case, and A. C. Martin to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Deception Pass between Whidby Island and Fidalgo Island in the State of Washington, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 2, line 6, to strike out "the construction of such bridge shall not be commenced nor shall any alterations of such bridge be made either before or after its completion until the plans and specifications for such construction or alterations have been first submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War and he", and to insert "the Secretary of Agriculture"; on page 2, line 15, to strike out "and whether the height and clearance of such bridge are adequate to protect the commerce on and through said Deception Pass, and whether the location selected is feasible for the erection of such bridge without obstructions in navigation, and without being detrimental to the development of interstate and foreign commerce as well as domestic commerce moving to and from the Pacific Ocean through Deception Pass to the waters of the Puget Sound territory of the State of Washington"; on page 5, line 3, after the word "approaches", to strike out "to pay an adequate return on the cost thereof"; and on page 5, line 6, to strike out "forty", and insert "twenty-five", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to Ernest N. Hutchinson, Otto A. Case, and A. C. Martin, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Deception Pass at a point suitable to the interests of navigation between a point on the north end of Whidby Island in the county of Island, in the State of Washington, and a point on Fidalgo Island on the north side of said Deception Pass, in the county of Skagit, in the State of Washington, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act. The Secretary of Agriculture shall determine whether the types, designs, and specifications thereof are adequate, based upon the proposed use, volume, and weight of traffic passing over such bridge, and whether public convenience will be served by such bridge as a connecting link between the Federal aid highway systems of the State of Washington. The said Secretary is empowered and, if requested to do so, is directed to hold public hearings for the full and complete determination of said precedent requirements.

SEC. 2. The said Ernest N. Hutchinson, Otto A. Case, and A. C. Martin, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, are hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in such act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 3. After the date of completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, the State of Washington, any political subdivision thereof, within or adjoining which such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all rights, title, and interest in such bridge and approaches, and interests in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation in accordance with the law of the State of Washington governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation. If at any time after the expiration of 20 years after the completion of such bridge it is acquired by condemnation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include goodwill, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in respect of such bridge and approaches; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion costs (not to exceed 10 percent of the sum of the cost of construction of such bridge and approaches and the acquisition of such interests in real property); and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 4. There is hereby conferred upon the said Ernest N. Hutchinson, Otto A. Case, and A. C. Martin, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, appropriate, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, or maintenance of such bridge, approaches, and terminals as are possessed by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State of Washington, upon making proper compensation therefor, to be ascertained according to the laws of the State of Washington and the proceedings thereof may be the same as in the condemnation and expropriation of property in said State.

SEC. 5. If such bridge shall be taken over and acquired by the State of Washington or political subdivisions thereof under the provisions of section 3 of this act, the same may thereafter be operated as a toll bridge; in fixing the rates of toll to be charged for the use of such bridge the same shall be so adjusted as to provide, as far as possible, a sufficient fund to pay for the cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost thereof within a period of not to exceed 25 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient to pay the cost of acquiring such bridge and its approaches shall have been provided, the bridge thereafter shall be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper care, repair, maintenance, and operation of the bridge and its approaches.

SEC. 6. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the said Ernest E. Hutchinson, Otto A. Case, and A. C. Martin, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, and any corporation to which such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or which shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation.

SEC. 7. The said Ernest N. Hutchinson, Otto A. Case, and A. C. Martin, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, shall, within 90 days after the completion of such bridge, file with the Secretary of War a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing such bridge and approaches, including the actual cost of acquiring interests in real property and actual financing and promotion costs. Within 3 years after the completion of such bridge the Secretary of War shall investigate the actual cost of such bridge, and for such purpose the said Ernest N. Hutchinson, Otto A. Case, and A. C. Martin, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, shall make available to the Secretary of War all of their records in connection with the financing and construction thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to such actual original costs shall be conclusive.

SEC. 8. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (H.R. 5790) to provide for organizations within the Farm Credit Administration to make loans for the production and marketing of agricultural products, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, to provide a market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 752) to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended, with respect to the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States over suits relating to orders of State administrative boards, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

HOUSING CONDITIONS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S.Res. 86) directing the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia to investigate facts pertaining to housing in the District of Columbia, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "Columbia", to insert "and to receive and adjust complaints in relation thereto", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia is hereby directed and empowered to investigate all facts relating to the cost and character of housing in rented premises in the District of Columbia and to receive and adjust complaints in relation thereto; be it further

Resolved, That for the purpose of executing this direction the said Commission may call witnesses and subpena records and accounts in the same manner as provided for the performance of the duties of the said Commission with respect to public utilities; and be it further

Resolved, That the said public utilities commission shall prepare a full and comprehensive report of the matters investigated under the terms of this resolution and shall transmit the same to the President of the Senate of the United States on or before January 30, 1934.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF INDEPENDENCE OF TEXAS

The bill (S. 1808) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary in 1936 of the independence of Texas, and of the noble and heroic sacrifices of her pioneers, whose revered memory has been an inspiration to her sons and daughters during the past century, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary in 1936 of the independence of Texas and of the noble and heroic sacrifices of her pioneers, whose memory has been an inspiration to her sons and daughters during the past century, there shall be coined at the mints of the United States silver 50-cent pieces to the number of not more than one and one-half million, such 50-cent pieces to be of the standard troy weight, composition, diameter, device, and design as shall be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, which said 50-cent pieces shall be legal tender in any payment to the amount of their face value.

SEC. 2. That the coins herein authorized shall be issued only upon the request of the American Legion Texas Centennial Committee, of Austin, Tex., upon payment by such American Legion Texas Centennial Committee of the par value of such coins, and it shall be permissible for the said American Legion Texas Centennial Committee to obtain said coins upon said payment, all at one time or at separate times, and in separate amounts, as it may determine.

SEC. 3. That all laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same, regulating the guarding and process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, disposition, and redemption of coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for security of the coins, or for any other purposes, whether said laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized: Provided, That the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the necessary dies and other preparations for this coinage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the calendar.

REDUCTION OF DEBTS, INTEREST, AND TAXATION

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD addresses delivered at a conference on debt and interest reduction and taxation under the auspices of the People's Lobby, held in the Cosmos Club, Washington, D.C., May 20, 1933. These addresses were made by prominent individuals interested in the subject.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEBT AND INTEREST REDUCTION AND TAXATION

(Statement by Dr. Harry W. Laidler, chairman of the board of the National Bureau of Economic Research, presiding at debt and taxation conference, Cosmos Club, Washington, Saturday morning, May 20)

During the last few years the American people have awakened as perhaps never before to the realization of the tremendous burden of debt under which they are struggling. Most estimates place this debt, public and private, at more than 150 billion dollars. The mortgage debt on the farm alone has been estimated at about $8,500,000,000. This debt bore down heavily upon the farmers and workers during the booming days of so-called "prosperity." Its weight is becoming intolerable in these days of tragic depression, of starvation prices for farm products, of low wages, and of no wages at all for millions of Americans. The gross income from farm production in 1932 was estimated at only $5,143,000,000, a decrease of 57 percent from the high level of $11,918,000,000 in 1929.

While the income of farmers and home owners has, in many instances, approached a vanishing point, the interest on their mortgages has remained the same in tens of thousands of cases. The interest payable in 1932 on the farms was $612,000,000, a reduction of only about one eighth from 1929, while the tax reduction amounted to only about 20 percent. Average weekly wages in manufacturing industries from 1929 to 1932 decreased by over 40 percent. The sacrifice involved in paying mortgage charges in general is from two to three times as great as in the days before the Wall Street crash. In thousands of instances, despite all efforts to meet debt payments, homes and farms have been foreclosed and the former owners are now penniless.

Through this painful process, many private debts have been wiped out. In the last 3 years billions in debts have been likewise canceled by bank failures; two billions by domestic bond defaults; another billion by foreign bond default; and at least two billion by commercial failures. All of these cancelations have been without plan or purpose and have been attended by great suffering.

Why not carry forward the process of writing down debts in a deliberate and selective manner? Many students are now urging that this be done. In the case of Government bonds, which aggregate in city, State, and national about $33,000,000,000, they are proposing that certain callable issues be refunded.

In the case of farm and home mortgages, they are going far beyond the present Government program in urging reductions on interest and principal. Many are proposing a moratorium lasting for several years.

Vitally connected with the burden of debt is the problem of taxation.

During these days we must raise great sums of money not only for the ordinary expenses of government but for direct relief and for public works. What shall be done about this problem? Economy leagues throughout the country are demanding that the situation be met by cutting down ordinary public expenditures to the very marrow. Educational, recreational, health, and sanitation, and other vitally important social services have already been ruthlessly slashed.

Some urge inflation as the way out, others the imposition of sales taxes. A final school, the People's Lobby among them, has vigorously opposed sales taxes on the ground that it is a tax on each successive sale, and that it not only falls heaviest on the poor but that its cumulative effect can be made almost intolerable for those having small incomes. We are of the belief that the Nation should impose higher income and inheritance taxes on those best able to bear them and should make it impossible to dodge these taxes by the subterfuges resorted to by some of our millionaires of yesterday or today. Such taxes are just. They would aid in a healthy redistribution of wealth and income and would put purchasing power in the hands of those who would use it immediately.

Increasingly men and women everywhere are realizing that one of the great causes back of the present depression has been the great and unjust inequality of wealth and income in this country. The latest study of the National Bureau of Economic Research on economic tendencies in the United States indicates that in the period 1922–29 wages of factory workers increased at the rate of only 1.4 percent per year. We increased the amount turned into new capital equipment by 6.5 percent per year. Profits of industrial concerns advanced during the same period at 7.3 percent per year, while financial profits jumped at the rate of over 16 percent per year. Thus profits and productive machinery leaped forward at a speed far greater than did wages, while the purchasing power of the farmers during that period was, indeed, at low ebb. Farmers and wage earners as the years advanced thus became increasingly unable to buy the goods that could be produced with such lightning rapidity by our mass industries. If we had put far more of the products of industry into wages, salaries, and other real income for the city and farming population—including social services provided by the Government out of taxation—and less of the national income into profits and new machines and factories, the large masses of our people would have been far more able to buy the goods which our industries could produce, and much of the present suffering would have been averted.

A few months ago the Business Week published a significant series of articles. These articles told us where our market was for our agricultural and manufacturing turn-over. It showed that those who obtained incomes of less than $3,000 per year purchased over 67 percent, over two thirds, of the total goods and services consumed. Those receiving less than $5,000 purchased 78 percent of the total, while all groups above the $25,000 class together account for a bare 8 percent. The need for such a redistribution of income as would give adequate purchasing power to the masses is thus clearly demonstrated.

A more drastic program of taxation reaching the higher income levels would not only bring to the Government large sums of money even during the present crisis but would aid materially in striking the needed balance between production and consumption. An increasing number of students are urging such taxation and likewise insisting on the taxation of income from tax-exempt securities and corporation surpluses.

A few weeks ago the People's Lobby, through its president, John Dewey, and its secretary, Benjamin C. Marsh, wrote a number of economists asking their opinion on certain points regarding the writing down of debts and interest rates. It asked (among other things, whether Congress should declare that a national emergency existed and enact legislation authorizing debtors to reduce the face of their indebtedness and the interest rate thereon.

Many well-known economists sent in significant replies to this questionnaire. A number of the economists who contributed most notably to this or other symposia on the problem of debts and taxation are here today at the spring conference of the People's Lobby, opened this morning at the famous Cosmos Club of Washington, D.C. The subject of the conference is "Taxation and debt and interest reduction."

I take pleasure in introducing as the first speaker of the morning, Dr. Rufus Tucker, economist, former member of the economics faculty of Harvard and the University of Michigan and a former member of the staff of the Commerce and Treasury Departments. Dr. Tucker will speak on the important question, "How to reduce debts and interest rates."

HOW TO RELIEVE DEBTORS WITHOUT INFLATION

(Statement by Dr. Rufus S. Tucker, economist, formerly in the Treasury and Commerce Departments, May 29, 1933)

The most distressing and dangerous aspect of the present situation is the burden of debt, especially that part of it that rests on private individuals. Of these debts the most conspicuous are farm and home mortgages.

The mortgage-relief provisions embodied in recent legislation are inadequate for the reason that they contemplate refunding existing mortgages at fairly high rates of interest. Consequently they give no relief to debtors unless the principal of the mortgage is drastically reduced; and if that were done, the loss to the creditor would be so great that he will be compelled to refuse to make the exchange and to insist on his full legal rights. It is especially true of trustees, and of banks and insurance companies that are in a position where taking losses on their books is impossible if they wish to continue in business. Consequently it is essential to devise a means whereby interest can be reduced considerably while the principal is left intact or nearly so.

If the principal of farm and home mortgages was reasonable in relation to the value of the property when the loan was made, it would be possible to relieve both debtor and creditor without loss to the Government by offering in exchange bonds yielding 2 percent, maturing in 15 years, with Government guaranty of both interest and principal. Trustees, banks, and especially insurance companies can carry such bonds on their books at par, in spite of the fact that their present market value would be only about 78 percent. Such bonds would never come on to the market in great quantities, since their sale would involve asknowledging a loss; they would be adequately secured, both as to current charges and ultimate repayment; and for these reasons would not injure the Government's credit or involve a net drain on the Budget. If the administration is unwilling to guarantee the principal for fear that the bonds would then be regarded as an addition to the Government debt, nearly the same advantage could be obtained by providing that the bonds shall be acceptable at their face value in payment of estate taxes, war debts, and all other payments to the Government for which Liberty bonds are now acceptable at par; also that any of the mortgages taken over may be paid off at any time by tender of these bonds at par. These privileges would cause the market price of the bonds to remain fairly high and ultimately to reach par even without a specific guaranty of principal.

The valuation of property for the purpose of converting mortgages into the new bonds could be as high as 50 percent of the 1929 value in most cases without involving any loss to the Government, provided that accrued taxes are paid to the taxing authority and deducted from the amount paid to the mortgagee. By this means it would be possible to cut the debtors' interest payments in half and give them ample time in which to pay the principal, without doing any injustice to the creditors. Such relief would do more to restore the confidence and the purchasing power of our people than any other proposal that has been made, for nobody would lose anything by it—not even "Uncle Sam"—and several million would gain.

WHY DEBTS AND INTEREST RATES MUST BE REDUCED

(Speech at conference on debts and interest and taxation at Cosmos Club, Washington, Saturday morning, May 20, by Dr. Max Winkler, of New York City, investment expert, economic adviser for the Senate committee investigating banking)

Developments within recent years bear adequate testimony to the accuracy of the statement made by Wendell Phillips that "debt is the fatal disease of republics, the first thing and the mightiest to undermine government and corrupt the people."

Two hundred and fifty thousand million dollars ($250,000,000,000) is the estimated total debt of the world. It is equivalent to more than $125 for each man, woman, and child living, regardless of color or creed. It comprises external and internal obligations of governments and political subdivisions, but does not include outstanding obligations of corporations or debts of individuals.

Since the wealth of nations is estimated at about $750,000,000,000, the ratio of wealth to debt is about 3 to 1; that is, there are $3 of assets for every $1 of liabilities.

If it were possible to realize on all the assets belonging to the nations of the world, on the basis of which these assets are carried on balance sheets, one third might suffice to take care of the existing commitments of nations. The remaining two thirds would then barely suffice to take care of all private engagements.

With the bulk of the wealth, however, in the form of fixed and often frozen assets, it is apparent that under existing conditions the extent of the outstanding debt—public as well as private—is far beyond the capacity of debtors to meet. Many have already followed the line of least resistance. Standstill, moratorium, default, repudiation, and similar measures have been resorted to by many nations, political subdivisions, and private debtors as well.

Figures relative to existing governmental defaults are startling. The principal amount of bonds on which payments have been suspended is estimated at $21,000,000,000. Interest in arrears aggregates well over 2½ billions. Moreover, back interest is accruing at the rate of substantially more than a billion dollars a year, or more than $2,000 a minute.

These undreamed-of sums will never be repaid. They can never be repaid. They have been incurred by men, supposedly charged with guiding the destinies of peoples; men who were often inclined to sacrifice the future for the present; over whose financial operations no protecting deity was holding guard; and to whose constant borrowing there was no official check.

Although it cannot be denied that by far the greater part of existing indebtedness of nations had its origin in war, and although it is equally true that had it not been for past wars, and were it not for fear of future wars, the natural income of nations might be sufficient to pay off all indebtedness contracted for industrial and commercial expansion, the fact remains that a debt—regardless of origin—is still a debt, and has the same general effect of restricting the financial freedom of nations.

It is also worth bearing in mind that most of the debt, both public and private, was contracted at a time when prices were abnormally high. To give a few concrete examples: Bolivia borrowed, or was permitted or even encouraged to borrow, when tin—the country's principal stand-by—was quoted markedly in excess of current levels. A dollar borrowed at a time when tin was quoted at 63 becomes more than $3 with tin at 20.

If Cuba secured a dollar when sugar was quoted at 18½, she owes $18 with sugar selling at 1 cent a pound. Argentina owes $4 with wheat at 70 cents for every dollar contracted when wheat was selling for almost $3.

The farmer in Iowa owes more than $4.50, with corn selling at 45, for every dollar obtained when corn was quoted at about $2. The Kansas wheat farmer owes $4.50 or $5, as much as he actually received on the basis of present quotations for wheat, compared with prices prevailing at the time he obtained his accommodations; and the Mississippi cotton planter owes about $5, with cotton at 8 cents, for every dollar he borrowed when cotton sold for more than 40 cents.

Shall we tell creditors to wait for payment according to original agreements until prices return to the levels prevailing at the time debts were contracted? Or, shall we, adopting the methods of medieval princes, debase our currency to the extent to which prices have fallen and redeem in this manner a commitment at a lower value than we originally agreed to pay?

In other words, shall we satisfy the debtor—that is, one part of our public—at the expense of and discrimination against the creditor, another perhaps equally deserving part of our people?

Or, shall we permit our money to fluctuate in accordance with the ups and downs of world prices and adopt what is ordinarily called in the classroom and in the lecture hall a "managed" currency?

As a creditor nation, we have assumed grave responsibilities. It is incumbent upon us to honor the inviolability of contracts. If we repudiate obligations, in whole or in part, how can we approach our debtors, expecting them to meet in full payments due us?

The existence of an emergency cannot be denied. The credit position of the United States Government must remain unimpaired. The recent decision to pay in depreciated dollars, contrary to provisions in loan agreements, should be changed forthwith.

As to political subdivisions and all other categories of debtors within the United States, relief is imperative. To provide this, I submit the following concrete suggestions:

Let there be created without delay a debt revaluation board, charged with effecting adjustments of existing obligations on the basis of a careful examination of the capacity of every debtor or group of debtors.

The principal amount of debts at present outstanding should remain undisturbed. Amortization should be suspended for a period of from 3 to 5 years. Interest during this period should be adjusted according to capacity, payments to vary from 25 percent of the present rate of interest to the full rate, which is in no case to exceed 6 percent per annum. For the difference, let there be issued beneficiary certificates, which shall bear no interest, but which will be redeemed at par, beginning after the expiration of the emergency period.

Obligations falling due within this period of from 3 to 5 years should be repaid in a similar manner—that is, cash payments should vary from 25 to 100 percent of the amount due; but in this case beneficiary certificates issued for the difference shall bear interest at the original rate, the interest on such certificates to be payable in full.

Adjustment shall be made only upon the request to the debt revaluation board by the debtors or the creditors, and the decisions of the board shall be binding.

Unless some such measures are adopted in the very near future, it is doubted whether American debtors will be able to continue to meet existing commitments. Default is bound to affect most seriously not only the position of the respective debtors in the United States, but the credit standing of the entire Nation as well. This must be avoided.

TAXATION VERSUS BONDS

(Radio talk at taxation conference, Cosmos Club, Washington, Saturday morning, May 20, by Lawrence Dennis, author of Is Capitalism Doomed?)

Shall the Government meet all its expenditures by taxation, or shall it cover part of its outlay by borrowing? If the Government should borrow, then to what extent should it do so? This question has been a recurrent problem of government ever since spending, taxing, and borrowing have been acts of government. The question is especially acute in America today for the following reasons:

1. It appears that increased spending is needed to get us out of the depression; that private individuals who have money they could spend or invest will not spend or invest it fast enough; and that, consequently, Government must effect the necessary increase in total spending.

2. It is evident that revenues from taxation are steadily diminishing in measure as the bases of tax levies are shrinking in the course of the depression. Tax laws are inadequate at present.

3. It is probable that large-scale borrowing by the Federal, State, or local governments through the sale of bonds would be extremely difficult if not impossible.

Now, if Government can neither tax nor borrow enough, as many people argue, and if an adequate amount of spending cannot be brought about through private action, we must as a people resign ourselves to the abandonment of our existing standard of living and to the horrors of a deepening depression. I reject that conclusion and argue that whatever amount of spending or consumption may be necessary for the survival and welfare of the race can and must be effected by the State.

Taking this view, I plead for taxation to the exclusion of loans for the following reasons:

First. The entire resources of the Nation are in the last analysis at the command of the taxing power of the State. To say that the people won't stand for enough taxation to accomplish the ends sought is to say that the people do not desire these ends.

Second. The taking of purchasing power by means of taxation instead of loans avoids the subsequent evils of interest charges borne by the masses. The chief effect of interest on the public debt is that of obliging the masses to transfer to a small number of leaders a part of the national income. Most of our present debt difficulties are due to this interest factor.

Third. Loans are not a permanent substitute for taxation. They can only replace taxation for a short time, as loans must be repaid. Loans are only justified as temporary expedients for financing. Some people treat the need for increased Government expenditure as a temporary need. This view is erroneous. It has always been taken in respect of public borrowing and always been wrong. The reason is that Government expenditures must necessarily be recurrent and of increasing amount, except possibly for the excessive expenditures of abnormal periods, like war. In the present situation the objects of a desirable increase in public spending, such as better housing, municipal beautification, additional social services, are all objects of expenditure which should absorb public funds for an indefinite future period. To start a program for social spending by the State on the assumption it is to be temporary would be foolish and harmful. The total amount of Government expenditure must be maintained fairly stable and progressively expanded. Therefore a long-range plan of increased public spending should be started and continued right along—on a pay-as-you-go basis. For only on such a basis can the plan be conducted successfully over a long period.

HOW THE GOVERNMENT CAN OBTAIN REVENUE

(Speech at conference on debt and interest reduction and taxation, Cosmos Club, Washington, Saturday morning, May 20, by Dr. Joseph McGoldrick, professor of public law, Columbia University)

The immediate demand for the inclusion of a tax program in the industrial recovery bill springs from a desire to protect public credit and put a brake upon inflation. This is both wise and prudent, but in devising a tax program we must be careful not to put a check upon recovery itself. We have been suffering for some considerable time in the United States from an uneven distribution of national income. Before 1929 the effect of this was to cause too much money to be set aside for investment. The converse of this was that we had too little for national purchasing power. On the one hand we were putting money into factories, mills, and office buildings; and on the other hand we had an insufficient purchasing power to consume the goods which these factories and mills could turn out. It is not clear that we have had any overproduction in an absolute sense. But we have had overproduction in the sense that we have been able to produce more things than our people have had money to buy. An absolute overproduction in shoes would mean that we were producing more shoes than our people could wear. Instead we have been able to produce more shoes than people could buy. If our standard were two cars in every garage, we had not reached, even in 1929, an overproduction in automobiles. But with purchasing power dwindling we have had more cars produced than the national income could absorb.

I prefer to approach this problem not from the standpoint of morals or justice but from the standpoint of ordinary business sense. Our great fortunes differ from the great wealth of earlier civilizations. They are not in palaces and chateaus, but in industry and commerce. The value of an automobile factory, or the shares of stock that represent it, lies not in the machinery and equipment of that factory, but in the purchasing power of its prospective customers. Unless these customers are able to buy the stock cars which it can produce, the value of the factory and of the stock evaporates.

Our difficulty since 1929 has been a progressive shrinking of national spending power. It began with the cessation of investment in heavy industry. This meant the lay-off of the workers in those industries and the cancelation of their purchasing power. But they, after all, were the customers of still other industries, which now were forced to contract. As they laid off employees, a new layer of national purchasing power vanished. With this purchasing power gone, still other manufacturers were forced to retrench. That has been the story from midsummer of 1929 to this day. We have had an unbroken spiral of falling wages, business curtailment, bringing with them still further wage reductions and still further business curtailment.

The problem even before 1929 was the twofold one of too much national income going into capital investment and too little into purchasing power, that would alone sustain national investment. This is a problem not only of the workingman but of the farmer as well, whose best customer is that numerous class of American wage earner. It is the problem of the industrialist and man of wealth as well, for unless his customers can buy his goods his business and his wealth are destroyed. This is coming to be accepted as a fairly satisfactory explanation of our economic difficulties. President Roosevelt himself has indicated his awareness of it. In his valuable little book published on the very eve of his taking office he declared, and here I quote:

"In the years before 1929 we knew that this country had completed a vast cycle of building and inflation; for 10 years we expended on the theory of repairing the wastes of the war, but actually expended far beyond that, and also far beyond our natural and normal growth. During that time the cold figures of finance prove there was little or no drop in the prices the consumer had to pay, although those same figures prove that the cost of production fell very greatly; corporate profit resulting from this period was enormous; at the same time little of the profit was devoted to the reduction of prices. The consumer was forgotten. Little went into increased wages; the worker was forgotten, and by no means an adequate proportion was paid out in dividends—the stockholder was forgotten.

"Incidentally, very little was taken by taxation to the beneficent Government of those days.

"What was the result? Enormous corporate surpluses piled up, the most stupendous in history. These surpluses went chiefly in two directions: First, into new and unnecessary plants which now stand stark and idle; second, into the call-money market of Wall Street, either directly by the corporations or indirectly through the banks.

"Then", Mr. Roosevelt adds, "came the crash. Surpluses invested in unnecessary plants became idle. Men lost their jobs, purchasing power dried up, banks became frightened and started calling loans. Those who had money were afraid to part with it. Credit contracted, industry stopped, commerce declined, and unemployment mounted."

That is Mr. Roosevelt's graphic picture of what has been happening in the United States. Our problem is not an easy one, but we could hardly hope to solve it without first knowing what it is. It may be that there are several ways of redressing the balance in our economic system. But certainly as things are now set up it is very difficult to check overinvestment or to stimulate the rise of wages.

One thing we can and should do is to resolve now that our taxing policy hereafter will be predicated upon a transfer of taxes from consumption to surplus. Consumption taxation has the advantage of being comparatively simple and comparatively painless. Painlessness, however, is hardly a virtue in taxation. It is right and proper that people should know that they are paying taxes and why they are paying them. The disadvantages of consumption taxes far outweigh the advantages claimed for it. Consumption taxation is widely recognized as being inequitable. It runs absolutely counter to the theory of ability to pay. The poor man's expenditures for food, clothing, and necessities take up practically the whole of his income. Among the well to do, this is not the case. Their expenditures for consumable goods are not in proportion to their incomes. A family with $1,500 income must spend practically all of this for rent, food, and clothing. A 2 percent general sales tax would probably cost such a family $20 to $25 a year. A man with $1,000,000 income would spend a comparatively small fraction of this for consumable goods, so that his contribution to a general sales tax would be an almost infinitesimal fraction of his income.

It is urged that since the well-to-do contribute through income and estate taxes, it is only fair that the poor should contribute their share of the cost of government. This overlooks two very important factors. The first is that we are already drawing a very disproportionate amount of the taxes which support State and local government from the general property tax which falls very heavily upon the farmer and the city dweller of small means. The second is that we already have a group of important Federal consumption taxes, particularly those on tobacco, gasoline, and the latest impost upon beer. The contributions of all these taxes by the average man are altogether out of proportion to his income.

Or, it is urged, that the sales tax be adopted as an emergency expedient. Some even propose that it be sweetened with some sugary name like reemployment or recovery tax to indicate its special and temporary nature. The sales tax is no tax to set up as a temporary expedient. It will involve the examination and audit of the books of every sizeable manufacturing and commercial establishment in the United States. It is hardly conceivable that such a task could be undertaken by less than 10,000 examiners and accountants. And there is not a doubt that most of those who are advocating it, consciously or subconsciously, hope that it will become a permanent part of our national tax structure or that it may even ultimately supplant the income tax in our Federal fiscal policy.

The greatest opposition to the sales tax is that it points in the wrong direction. It would involve a curtailment of national purchasing power at the very time when all stress ought to be laid upon the increase of purchasing power. To this extent it would be a brake upon recovery.

The natural alternative to the sales tax and other forms of consumption taxes is taxes upon that portion of national income which is not spent for consumable goods. When Mr. Mellon was Secretary of the Treasury he urged the reduction of the high income-tax levies in order to release wealth for investment in industrial and commercial expansion. His ideas prevailed, and he was hailed among business men of the time as the greatest secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton.

The overexpansion of industrial capacity that characterized the boom era followed the acceptance of his counsels. He pointed out the wrong road. We must now choose the other. We must tax the surplus which our industry produced, for the good not only of the Nation, but of industry itself. For some time to come, one of our most important problems will be that of absorbing the productive capacity that that boom era bequeathed to us. We cannot permit unwise investment to destroy the value of existing sound investment. The factories and mills, the office buildings and apartment houses, the theaters and motion-picture establishments that we now have must be protected from the inrush of new capital that a sudden return of the boom spirit would almost certainly bring. Lest the devil find mischief for idle income, we must tax it to keep it and us out of trouble.

There are various forms which this tax on surplus income might take. The basis of all should be a return to at least the income-tax levels that prevailed during the war period. We ought never to have abandoned them, until the debt which the World War left behind, had been extinguished. It may well be that at the present moment this tax would not yield as much as our National Budget would require, but we must not forget that we are now instituting momentous measures for recovery. If the income tax needs to be supplemented, the two most promising additions to it would be a tax upon corporate surpluses, and a tax upon the income from public bond issues which now enjoy tax exemption. Our corporate surpluses are still exceedingly large. It is estimated that even with the unearned dividends that have been paid out of them since 1929, there is still $50,000,000,000 or more in corporate surpluses. With this should go a program for taxing the income from tax-exempt bonds. The whole notion of tax exemption is grounded upon some highly attenuated legal reasoning. We should certainly take steps to see that tax exemption is not extended, and there is plenty of reason to believe that it is within the power of Congress to reach it now. We can never hope to have an intelligent or equitable system of taxation in the United States as long as we tolerate this form of tax privilege.

The important thing to remember at this point is that the present administration has set itself to bring the depression to an end and to erect, if possible, machinery that will prevent its recurrence. The tax program must be made an integral part of this recovery. We are no longer dealing with the patchwork and makeshift of last year. Our tax program must abandon depression taxes for a tax suited to prosperity.

CONGRESS MUST REVISE REVENUE ACT NOW

(Radio speech of Benjamin C. Marsh, executive secretary, the People's Lobby, at conference, Cosmos Club, Washington, Saturday morning, May 20)

The campaign to substitute the sales tax for income and estate taxes is on.

The "opening wedge" is a sales tax to amortize the proposed $3,300,000,000 public-works program at the rate of $220,000,000 a year. In 10 years that would amount to $2,200,000,000.

The Government is losing at least $2,100,000,000 in taxes this year, as follows:

Corporations are withholding dividends to save wealthy stockholders from surtaxes. Corporations have liquid assets of over $8,000,000,000, which should be taxed $1,000,000,000 this year.

Capital-loss deductions are costing the Government at least $200,000,000 this year.

Failure to tax income from Government bonds is costing the Government at least $150,000,000 this year.

Failure to tax incomes adequately is costing the Government at least $700,000,000 this year.

Evasion of taxes through partnerships is costing the Government at least $100,000,000 this year.

At least $500,000,000 of consumption taxes, largely paid by the poor, should be repealed.

Write the President, both your United States Senators, and your Member of the House of Representatives to defeat the sales tax, repeal present Federal consumption taxes, and tax accumulated wealth and concentrated income, as we suggest.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of H.R. 5755, the national industrial recovery bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 5755) to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I merely desire to make the brief statement that no man has had more to do with the formulation of this legislation and the drafting of it from its initiation down to this moment than the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. Therefore I am going to yield to that Senator in order that he may explain the provisions touching industrial recovery as well as public works.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, at the risk of being tedious, I purpose to explain the provisions of the pending bill and the policy behind it, as well as to clear up any doubts in the minds of those who may have them as to whether under the Constitution we are empowered to enact such legislation.

Mr. President, the national industrial recovery bill is an employment measure. Its single objective is to speed the restoration of normal conditions of employment at wage scales sufficient to provide a comfort and decency level of living.

THE ECONOMIC EMERGENCY AND THE NEED FOR ACTION

I want to say at the very beginning that the economic emergency is not over; it is upon us in fullest force. According to the latest publication of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the index of employment in manufacturing industries, which was 100 in 1926, declined to 97.5 in 1929, to 84.7 in 1930, to 72.2 in 1931, to 60.1 in 1932, and to 56.4 during the first quarter of 1933. It is equally significant that, on a monthly basis, every month from the beginning of 1932 through the first quarter of the present year witnessed a decline in the index of employment, except for a 1-point rise in February 1932 and again in February 1933.

If we look at pay-roll indexes, the history is even worse. Starting with an index of 100.5 in 1929, pay rolls fell to 81.3 in 1930, to 61.5 in 1931, to 41.6 in 1932, and to 35.2 in the first quarter of 1933.

There has been some slight improvement, it is true, during the past 3 months. But if we do nothing to speed revival, if we do nothing to bring about revival more quickly than in the leisurely manner which may be expected from a study of business cycles in the past, the effects upon the stability of our social and economic institutions are too alarming to contemplate.

We cannot afford to wait. We know too well the effects of the tragic decline during the past 4 years; we are too familiar with the poverty, disease, and crime which it has brought in its wake. The task before us today is to adopt well-considered measures for the stimulation of employment. The present bill is designed to take care of these measures by promoting order in trade and industry and by inaugurating a widespread public-works program.

DEFECTS IN WORKINGS OF THE ANTITRUST LAWS

The first title of the bill deals with the problem of order in trade and industry, and involves primarily a reconsideration of the traditional attitude toward competition, as embodied in the antitrust laws. We cannot get the full meaning of this bill without examining the history of these antitrust laws in action.

Every well-considered law embodies an objective and a theory concerning the best way to reach that objective. The purpose of the antitrust laws was to prevent the excessive concentration of wealth, and to keep intact the social and economic opportunities of small business men, laborers, and consumers. We desired to assure every deserving person in the country an equitable share in our rapidly expanding national wealth. The method chosen was based primarily upon the belief that the preservation of competition and the prevention of business combination were most likely to secure these typically American ideals, and that nothing else had to be done.

Even from the start, the method had slight chance of success, because it was not based upon a twentieth century economic philosophy. It was not even an 1890 or an 1875 philosophy. It was a wholesale acceptance of the abstract theories of Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, published in 1776. It was responsive to the conditions existing in England at the early dawn of the factory system, when the new middle-class business men were trying to strike off the shackles of outworn medieval restrictions. When this philosophy was lifted bodily out of the past and flung up against the rush of industrialism during the last 40 years, it had to fail. Insofar as we observed the method, we lost the objective. Let us review how this has happened.

The antitrust laws have not checked in the slightest degree the constant growth in the size of business units, and the intensifying concentration of economic power in the hands of a relatively few enormous enterprises. During the period 1920–29, which may be said to represent the summit of our industrial progress, the 200 largest nonfinancial corporations received 40.7 percent of the net income earned by all of the nonfinancial corporations in the country. And in these 200 enterprises, 80 percent of the wealth was controlled by management, as distinguished from ownership.

This large-scale enterprise was the inevitable result of changes in science and technology. Specialization and serialization made us the wealthiest nation in the world. Any attempt by law to arrest this sweep would have been like Canute trying to roll back the sea. The courts realized this to the fullest extent, and after enunciating the rule of reason in the Standard Oil case, they sanctioned the United States Steel Corporation, the United Shoe Machinery Co., and a host of mammoths of industry. More recently, large-scale enterprise extended into the field of banking and retail selling. In a few moments I shall trace the implications of this development.

Despite the fact that the antitrust laws did not prevent the displacement of small enterprises by big business, they did have other effects. And as is the case with most laws which are out of touch with the times, many of the effects were bad. Business was forced to grow big partly by methods that injured the very groups the laws sought to protect—the small undertaking, the consumer, and the laborer. Since the law frowned upon the mutual association of independent groups, business expanded in size by ruthless and predatory practices and by crushing the weaker man through resort to devices which, while they did not violate the law, bore heavily upon the small enterprise. The frightful economic waste, in turn, was charged to the consumer of goods. In addition, much expansion was forced underground. It took the devious forms of holding companies, interlocking directorates, stock control, and the intricate maze of financial subterfuges which are a constant threat to the public interest because they are not brought into the open.

Most important of all, business grew large in a way which prejudiced the rights of labor. The antitrust laws, in concentrating attention upon the problem of size alone, and on this score yielding inevitably to the forces of technology, forgot the more crucial problem—the problem of utilizing the wealth-creating possibilities of large size in such a way as to help everyone. The task is not to check efficiency, but to reap its full benefits. During the present century we more than doubled our national wealth. But we made no progress in distributing it more equitably. From the most comprehensive study of income in the United States, that of the National Bureau of Economic Research, we learn that less than 9 percent of the people in the United States receive one third of the total national income, that one thirtieth of the population receive one tenth of the national income, while three quarters of the population receive incomes below the standards of comfortable living set by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics. This study was made in 1921, but later studies show that there has been no change in the distribution of wealth up to the end of 1929. Even at the height of our vaunted prosperity several million families lived in poverty. In the running fight over the application of the methods of the antitrust laws its objectives were forgotten.

I have been discussing the indirect effects of the antitrust-law philosophy. Even more significant is the startling paradox that these laws were invoked most successfully in actual litigation to curb the laborer and the small business man.

In the case of the laborer the acceptance of competition as a fetish encouraged employers to vie with one another in lengthening hours of labor and cutting rates of pay. In addition, when laborers attempted to protect themselves by uniting with others of their craft the antitrust laws were rigorously applied by the courts. In Bedford Cut Stone Co. v. Journeymen Stonecutters' Association (1927) (275 U.S. 37) this policy raised the dissenting protest of Mr. Justice Brandeis, in these words:

> The Sherman law was held, in United States v. The United States Steel Corporation, to permit capitalists to combine in a single corporation 50 percent of the steel industry of the United States, dominating the trade through its vast resources. The Sherman law was held, in United States v. The United Shoe Machinery Co., to permit competitors to combine in another corporation practically the whole shoe-machinery industry of the country, necessarily giving a position of dominance over shoe manufacturing in America. It would, indeed, be strange if Congress had by the same action willed to deny to members of a small craft of workmen the right to cooperate in simply refraining from work, when that course was the only means of self-protection against a combination of militant and powerful employers.

In like manner, while great enterprises generally eluded the antitrust laws by a show of the economic necessity for large-scale operations, the small business man was frequently subjected to their sting. He was not allowed to cooperate with others of his kind, and thus was denied his only weapon against larger opponents. He was forced into the wrong kind of competition against other small men, a competition that was wasteful, blind, and destructive. Instead of being confined to honorable bids for the market and real gains in efficiency, that competition extended to degrading the position of the wage earner and cheating the consumer. In American Column & Lumber Co. v. United States (1921) (257 U.S. 337), the Court held that the antitrust laws prevented 365 small concerns, totaling 30 percent of the hardwood producers of the country, from engaging in an "open-competition plan." This plan involved merely the exchange of information. Here again Mr. Justice Brandeis, whose social philosophy is imbued with individualism and the merits of genuine competition, dissented. He pointed out the danger in these words:

> May not these hardwood-lumber concerns, frustrated in their efforts to rationalize competition, be led to enter the inviting field of consolidation? And if they do, may not another huge trust with highly centralized control over vast resources—natural, manufacturing, and financial—become so powerful as to dominate competitors, wholesalers, retailers, consumers, employees, and in large measure the community?

THE RESTORATION OF CONSTRUCTIVE COMPETITION

Title I of the present bill is intended to return to the objectives of the antitrust laws. The first step taken by the bill is to make competition constructive rather than ruinous, and to permit cooperation whenever a wise policy so dictates. The bill permits any trade or industrial group to draw up a voluntary code of fair competition, and to submit it to the President for approval. Such a code may contain the standards of fair competition, the practices which should be banned as unfair, and the methods which, in the judgment of the group, are most likely to revive industry and increase employment. These methods may include exchange of information, cooperative marketing, standardization, simplification, and a wide variety of other features.

When such a voluntary code is approved by the President, it becomes binding upon the entire trade or industry, and any action complying with it is exempted from the provisions of the antitrust laws. But before the President accepts any code it must be proved that the code will not tend to promote monopoly, and that the group which proposes it is truly representative of the trade or industry and imposes no inequitable restrictions upon membership. Nor will any code be approved which discriminates against small enterprise.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COPELAND in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WAGNER. If the Senator does not mind, I should prefer to finish. Then I shall be very happy to answer any questions, if I can.

It must be stated in the strongest terms that the bill does not abolish competition; it purifies and strengthens it. In the words of the Brandeis dissent in the American Column case (1921) (257 U.S. 377):

> The cooperation which is incident to this plan does not suppress competition. On the contrary, it tends to promote all competition which is desirable. By substituting knowledge for ignorance, rumor, guess, and suspicion, it tends also to substitute research and reason for gambling and piracy, without closing the door to adventure or risking the value of prophetic vision. In making such knowledge available to the smallest concern it promotes among producers equality of opportunity. In making it available also to purchasers and the general public, it does all that can actually be done to protect the community from extortion. If, as is alleged, the plan tends to substitute stabilization in prices for violent fluctuations, its influence, in this respect, is not against the public interest. The evidence in this case, far from establishing an illegal restraint of trade, presents, in my opinion, a commendable effort by concerns engaged in a chaotic industry to make possible its intelligent conduct under competitive conditions.

I am happy to state that this dissent has become the accepted view of the Court in later cases, especially the very recent decision of Appalachian Coals v. United States (1933) (53 Sup. Ct. 471). In this case the Court upheld under the antitrust laws an exclusive selling agency for 64 percent of the bituminous mines in the Appalachian territory. This agency was to sell all of the coal at the best available price, upon an agreed classification, and to apportion the orders if all the coal could not be sold. The agency was also to effectuate better methods of distribution, intensive advertising and research, economy in marketing, and the elimination of abnormal, deceptive, and destructive trade practices. Mr. Chief Justice Hughes wrote that the antitrust acts do not—

> Seek to establish a mere delusive liberty by either making impossible the normal and fair expansion of (interstate) commerce or the adoption of reasonable measures to protect it from injurious and destructive practices and to promote competition on a sound basis. We know of no public policy, and none is suggested by the terms of the Sherman Act, that in order to comply with the law those engaged in industry should be driven to unify their properties in order to correct abuses which may be corrected by less drastic measures. Public policy might indeed be deemed to point in a different direction.

This bill gives general recognition to economic realities which the Court, operating even under the antitrust laws, has been constrained to admit in specific instances. When viewed in this light it is clear that the bill is not a measure designed to curtail production or to lessen the volume of trade. It is a measure to expand trade and commerce by removing the barriers which have caused factories to close and men to walk the streets in idleness.

PROTECTION OF LABOR

The interests of the laboring man are adequately protected under the voluntary codes. No code will be approved unless it embodies the following: (1) Recognition of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing; (2) prohibition of the antiunion or "yellow dog" contract as a condition of employment; (3) acceptance of the maximum hours of labor and minimum rates of pay and other standards of working conditions approved by the President.

I want to emphasize the minimum-wage provisions. In my opinion the depression arose in large part from the failure to coordinate production and consumption. During the years 1922–29 corporate earnings rose very much faster than wage rates. This led to an overexpansion in productive equipment, particularly machinery and plant facilities. The great mass of consumers did not receive enough pay to take the goods off the market. For several years we floated along on two bubbles, first the illusory prosperity of installment buying and secondly the quixotic policy of selling goods to Europe and lending money to pay for our own goods. When these two bubbles burst, the crash came. In retracing our steps to the land of plenty, we must set up sounder security than bubbles. The only safeguard is a well-planned wage program, dispersing adequate purchasing power throughout the economic system.

The solution of the wage problem is necessary for other reasons. Even during 1929 fully one third of our population received incomes which did not permit them to meet the minimum requirements for health and decency set by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics. By 1933 this situation characterized over one half of the people, and from ten to fifteen million families have been reduced to dire want. These figures are a matter of common knowledge. They make the wage situation more than an economic problem in the narrow sense. It is a situation tending to destroy health and morals, and should be dealt with in the same firm manner that we are accustomed to employ in such instances.

PRIMARY RELIANCE ON VOLUNTARY ACTION

I have been discussing codes which are voluntary both as to their competitive practices and as to their labor provisions, and it is primarily upon such spontaneous action that the bill relies. It is not my intention to substitute Government for business, or to remove from the shoulders of business men the responsibility for economic recovery. The duties of industrialists are enhanced by the opportunities which the bill offers for constructive cooperation. The whole Nation is confident that they will respond speedily and wisely. But if any trade or industry cannot or will not cooperate in the formulation of a voluntary code, the President is authorized, after proper investigations and hearings, to prescribe a code including all the salutary and protective features of the voluntary codes. Or if any trade or industry voluntarily arrives at some of the requirements of a code and neglects others, the President may in proper manner prescribe these others and include all in a general code. Another provision of the bill is that the President may, in the absence of need for a general code, or if such a code is impracticable, prescribe a limited code dealing only with maximum hours, minimum wages, and other conditions of employment.

This residuary compulsory power may seem novel and even shocking. But on analysis it fits perfectly into a system of ideas which we have long accepted. We have never doubted the right of the Government to regulate a limited group of public utilities, such as railroads and power companies. We said they were "affected with a public interest." Today the stern realities of the crisis and the interpenetration of all the industries in our complicated economic system affect all business with a public interest, especially when we are undertaking a comprehensive scheme designed to bring order out of chaos. We cannot achieve order unless we establish it everywhere. One exploiting employer can drag an entire trade down to his level; one disorganized trade can unsettle an industry; and one bankrupt industry can cause maladjustment throughout the Nation. Most industries will come out of the jungle gladly. The very few that cannot find their own way will be guided out by the force of the public sentiment operating through this law.

In addition to the code provisions, the President is authorized to enter into or approve voluntary agreements for the purpose of effecting the policies of the bill. These agreements need not apply to an entire trade or industry, and do not bind those who are not parties, but every voluntary agreement must contain all of the protective and labor features of the codes except those which have reference to membership in trade associations or groups.

ENFORCEMENT

Finally, title I of the bill has enforcement sections. Violation of any of the provisions of the code by anyone engaged in interstate commerce, or business affecting interstate commerce, constitutes unfair competition and subjects the violator to an order by the Federal Trade Commission to cease and desist from his unfair practices. Such violation is also a misdemeanor and the offender is subject to a fine of $500 for each day of violation. A code may be enforced by injunction proceedings in the Federal courts. In addition, for 1 year the President, after public hearing, may license any line of business enterprise in any geographical area whenever he finds such a course necessary to make effective a code of fair competition or an agreement or otherwise to further the policy of the bill. After any branch of trade or industry has been subjected to license, no one may carry on such trade or industry in interstate commerce or any transaction affecting interstate commerce without first obtaining a license, on penalty of $500 fine or 6 months' imprisonment, or both, for each day's violation.

The bill centralizes authority in the President, with power on his part to set up the agencies and appoint the officers and employees necessary to carry out the new policy. He is authorized also to establish an industrial and research planning agency, to enlist the aid of the Federal Trade Commission for necessary investigations, to modify or cancel any action taken under the bill, and to terminate the bill prior to its stated 2-year life by a declaration whenever the national economic emergency will have ended.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE BILL

The constitutionality of title I rests upon three questions: (1) Are the regulatory measures proposed within the scope of Federal authority; (2) if so, are they of a type which our Constitution permits generally; and (3) is there an improper delegation of legislative power to the President?

The question of the proper exercise of Federal authority depends upon whether the bill confines itself to national matters, or whether it attempts to extend to matters which are of purely local concern. The answer is clear. The language of the bill expressly provides that any compulsory measures, such as the licensing feature of the bill, and any penalties for violation of the codes, shall be confined to business in or affecting interstate commerce. Thus no attempt is made to extend Federal action to an area of activity not covered by the commerce clause of the Constitution.

A survey of a few cases, however, shows that there will be ample power in the bill to deal effectively with industry as a whole. In the famous Shreveport case (1914) (234 U.S. 342) the Court held that the Interstate Commerce Commission had power to regulate the purely intrastate rates of a railroad, upon a showing that these intrastate rates were lower than the rates fixed by the Commission for similar distances between Louisiana and Texas. The Court did not base its decision upon the ground that an interstate carrier was being regulated. In fact, Congress has no power to regulate the purely intrastate rates of such a carrier if they do not affect interstate commerce. The decision rested upon the fact that the flow of goods between the two States was burdened when goods could be transported an equal distance within the State of Texas for less money. In my opinion, this is strictly analogous to a situation where the flow of interstate commerce into a particular State might be burdened by the practices governing the sale of goods of the same kind within the State by concerns doing an intrastate business. Thus if a local manufacturing concern in State A paid its labor starvation wages, and by this unfair practice sold goods in the local market for an excessively low price, this might be a burden upon competitive goods flowing in from another State, manufactured by an interstate business subject to a code of fair competition, including labor provisions.

The language of the present Chief Justice, then an Associate Justice, in the Shreveport case sustains a broad interpretation. He wrote that the authority of Congress extends—

> To the maintenance of conditions under which interstate commerce may be conducted upon fair terms. * * * This is not to say that Congress possesses the authority to regulate the internal commerce of a State, as such, but that it does possess the power to foster and protect interstate commerce, and to take all measures necessary or appropriate to that end.

In Stafford v. Wallace (1922) (258 U.S. 495) the Court upheld the authority of Congress to prohibit unfair, discriminatory, and deceptive practices on the part of commission merchants in the great stockyards, and also the packers and dealers who bought goods from these merchants and resold them to stock farmers and feeders, although these transactions were not technically in interstate commerce. Chief Justice Taft wrote that where a national scheme of regulation is contemplated for the purpose of facilitating the flow of interstate commerce, the Court will not defeat it—

> By a nice and technical inquiry into the noninterstate character of some of its necessary incidents and facilities when considered alone.

When cases have arisen involving the rights of labor, the Court has taken a very broad view of interstate commerce. In the Bedford case (1927) (274 U.S. 37), the stonecutters refused to work upon stone which had been shipped into the State from quarries in other States where nonunion labor was employed. The stone upon which the cutters refused to work was no longer in the stream of commerce and it was hardly destined for use outside of the State in which it rested. It had been supposed that such work was not commerce at all, much less interstate commerce. But the Court held the action a violation of the antitrust laws, on the ground that refusal to work upon this stone necessarily diminished the orders for more stone from the quarries in other States and thus affected interstate commerce.

Think how far this Bedford case goes. Most goods, even when manufactured by an intrastate business and destined for intrastate use, are compounded of ingredients which flow in from other States. Thus unfair or chaotic conditions which put such a business in difficulty clearly affect the flow of interstate commerce. If the Court can take a broad interpretation of such commerce, when to do so frustrates the struggle of the wage earner to better his economic condition, I maintain that the Court should take an equally realistic approach when an effort is being made to remedy Nation-wide unemployment and distress.

In the very recent Appalachian Coals case, to which I have referred, Mr. Chief Justice Hughes recognized that in the present emergency the whole economic process is inextricably intertwined, in these words:

> The interests of producers and consumers are interlinked. When industry is grievously hurt, when producing concerns fail, when unemployment mounts and communities dependent upon profitable production are prostrated, the wells of commerce go dry.

This statement of the Chief Justice, sustaining agreements as far reaching as any proposed by this bill, expresses a viewpoint which I want to reiterate: that by substituting rational competition for ruinous warfare, the flow of commerce is not restrained, but immeasurably increased.

The second constitutional question is whether, granted that the Federal Government has jurisdiction, the regulations proposed are of a type permitted by our law. These regulations do not fall under powers specifically enumerated in the Constitution but are based upon the general power of every government to provide for the well-being of its people. This power, whether we call it the sovereign power or the police power, falls to the Federal Government under the insterstate-commerce clause in national matters and to the State governments in local affairs. The only limitations upon this power are the fifth amendment, which prohibits the Federal Government from taking life, liberty, or property without due process of law, and the fourteenth amendment, which places the same restriction upon the States. In our long constitutional history there is not a single case which holds that due process has a different meaning in these two amendments, or that the sovereign or police power is of a different amplitude in the States from what it is in the National Government. The nature of the power, the type of social and economic situations which it may deal with, and the extent of the regulation which it may undertake in its own sphere is exactly the same whether exercised by the Federal Government or by the States.

Therefore, since our question is what types of regulation are constitutional, and since the answer to this question is the same whether Federal or State action is involved, we may get our answer by examining both Federal and State statutes which have come before the Supreme Court of the United States.

The law has always recognized that the police power encompasses anything necessary to protect the health, safety, and morals of the people as a whole. In Muggler v. Kansas (1887) (123 U.S. 623) a State statute prohibiting the manufacture of spirituous liquors was sustained, and the health, safety, and morals doctrine was broadly stated. In the famous Lottery case, Champion v. Ames (1903) (188 U.S. 321), the Court upheld the power of Congress to keep lottery tickets out of the mails; in Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States (1911) (220 U.S. 45) the Pure Food and Drug Administration was sustained, and in Hoke v. United States (1913) (227 U.S. 308) the Court upheld the prohibition of the transportation of women in interstate commerce for purposes of prostitution. All of these earlier cases enunciated the health, safety, and morals doctrine, and applied it equally to State and congressional action.

In addition these cases all involved prohibitions. The Court has never denied that the right to regulate includes the right to prohibit, provided that the ends sought are constitutional and that prohibition is the only way of effectuating them. In Hammer v. Dagenart (1918) (247 U.S. 251), which held unconstitutional a statute prohibiting the transportation in interstate commerce of goods manufactured by child labor, the Court did not decide that the power to regulate does not include the power to prohibit. It decided only that the Federal Government was trying by indirection to deal with a purely local matter.

Now to examine the extension of the police power to the regulation of economic affairs. This extension is upheld upon two theories: First, that such regulation is frequently necessary to protect health, safety, and morals; and, secondly, upon the ground that the business which is regulated is affected with a public interest.

On the health doctrine as applied to economic affairs, Bunting v. Oregon (1917) (243 U.S. 246) upheld a State statute limiting the working hours of men in any mill, factory, or manufacturing establishment. A wide variety of cases, arising under both State and Federal statutes, establishes beyond any question the constitutionality of regulating hours of work.

The constitutionality of minimum-wage legislation came up in Adkins v. Children's Hospital (1923) (261 U.S. 525). The Court refused to uphold a statute which fixed minimum wages for women in certain occupations in the District of Columbia. This was a 5-to-4 decision; it was widely criticized over all the country; and other decisions cast grave doubts as to the present status of the Adkins case. But we may accept the Adkins case as law and examine its holding. Mr. Justice Sutherland argued that there was no measurable relationship between wages and health, because what might be a health wage for one person would not be for another. But the Court did not deny that if such a relationship could be shown it would provide a basis for wage regulations. It was not shown to the satisfaction of the Court at that time in the District of Columbia. Certainly today, however, where the total wages paid to the normally working population have fallen to about 40 percent of what they were in 1929, forcing millions to live on a bare subsistence level, and turning thousands to immorality and crime, any comprehensive scheme for restoring wage payments is related to the health, safety, and morals of the people. Mr. Justice Sutherland's second point was that wages were not affected with a public interest. That also may have been true in the District of Columbia in 1923; it is not true in the United States in 1933. There is nothing in the Adkins case which prohibits economic regulation where a health, safety, and morals problem can be shown, or where the general public interest is involved. The Adkins case was not concerned with a comprehensive attempt to deal coherently with a great national emergency.

Let us survey the leading cases permitting economic regulation. Some of these involve wage fixing, others deal with price fixing, still others involve the comprehensive regulation of business. But the constitutional problem is the same. The objection asserted in all cases is that liberty of contract is interfered with, and the justification must always be that the business is affected with a public interest. The concept of a public interest is not static; it changes with the flow of circumstance. In German Alliance v. Lewis (1914) (223 U.S. 389) State regulation of insurance rates was upheld. Justice McKenna said:

A business, by circumstances and its nature, may rise from private to public concern and be subject, in consequence, to governmental regulation. * * * It would be a bold thing to say that the principle is fixed, inelastic, in the precedents of the past and cannot be applied though modern economic conditions make necessary or beneficial its application.

Wilson v. New (1917) (243 U.S. 332) is a case of the utmost importance. It sustained an 8-hour day and a minimum wage law for the railways. The minimum wage was to endure for only 30 days, it is true, but that was because the emergency contemplated was a short one. Chief Justice White did not rest the opinion upon the fact that common carriers were involved, though that seems to be the impression of the learned constitutional lawyer, Mr. BECK. The Court said:

The powers possessed by government to deal with a subject are neither inordinately enlarged nor greatly dwarfed because the power to regulate interstate commerce applies.

The decision was based upon the public-interest doctrine. It said, and mark the words:

Although an emergency may not call into life a power which has never lived, nevertheless, emergency may afford a reason for exercising a living power already enjoyed.

This quotation is absolutely applicable to the present situation, where the economic emergency does not change the public-interest doctrine, but enlarges the category of businesses which are affected with a public interest.

Block v. Hirsh (1921) (256 U.S. 135) is another vital case. It upheld the power of a commission in the District of Columbia, operating under a statute, to fix fair rents, and to allow the tenant to remain in occupancy for a period of 2 years if he paid these rents. The statute was based upon an emergency and was limited to 2 years, just as the present bill is. The great liberal sage, Justice Holmes, wrote for the Court:

No doubt it is true that a legislative declaration that a certain use is a public one may not be held conclusive by the courts. But a declaration by a legislature concerning public conditions that by necessity and duty it must know is entitled at least to great respect. In this instance Congress states a publicly notorious and almost world-wide fact. * * * Plainly circumstances may so change in time or so differ in space as to clothe with (a public interest) what at other times and in other places would be a matter of purely private concern.

In making this constitutional argument, I am not appearing in the role of an advocate who reads the opinions in the form necessary to sustain his conclusion. Thirteen years ago, in the Supreme Court of the State of New York, I had the honor of writing the opinion in one of the first rent cases. Then, too, we were confronted by an emergency, the same emergency that resulted in Block against Hirsh. I will read just a brief extract from the opinion delivered by me at that time.

Mr. KING. In what case was that?

Mr. WAGNER. It was the case of Ullmann Realty Co. v. Tamur, the New York Supplement, volume 185, page 620. I am going to read merely a portion of the opinion, and, by the way, that case was upheld all the way to the United States Supreme Court:

Our constitutional Government is not an impotent one. Not so readily can its arms of protection for those whose benefit it is imposed be bound and helpless; its scope and vision is wide; its power flexibly adaptable; its aim the protection of human rights. Our lawmaking body is restrained alone by the rule of reason as to the means adopted for the accomplishment of its purposes. To deny it such powers would be subversive of the principles upon which it was founded and of the postulates of dedication its creators avowed. It would deservedly be an indictment against and a reproach to our entire system of Government.

I said further in that opinion:

Our Constitution is not so inflexible, unyielding, and immovable that our law-making bodies lie prostrate at its feet, powerless to give legislative succor in the face of a peril threatening the health, morals, and even the lives of the people.

For a century and a half our constitutional restraints have received interpretations befitting every emergency and public matter. The statutes in question were enacted to avert a crisis.

I do not mean to imply that the pending legislation contemplates price fixing. I refer to these cases simply because price fixing is the most far-reaching form of economic regulation; and if the Court will sustain price fixing when the economic situation warrants, there is no reason to believe that the Court will find anything unconstitutional in this bill.

Cases which might seem to stand against us are clearly distinguishable. In Wolff v. Court of Industrial Relations (1923) (262 U.S. 522), the Court held unconstitutional a Kansas statute providing for compulsory arbitration as to wages and compulsory continuance in business on the basis of the wage scales set at the arbitration. Chief Justice Taft based the decision upon the compulsory-continuance feature, which this bill does not contemplate, and upon the absence of an economic emergency such as existed in Wilson against New. In Tyson v. Banton (1927) (273 U.S. 418) it was decided that the resale price of theater tickets in New York did not come under the public-interest doctrine, and therefore could not be subject to statutory regulation. In Ribnik v. McBride (1928) (277 U.S. 350) the Court held that "at least in the absence of a grave emergency", employment agencies are not affected with a public interest to an extent which would allow a State statute to fix the fees of its agents. Besides excluding the emergency situation, the Ribnik case decides only the invalidity of price fixing, and distinguishes regulation directed against fraud, extortion, and discrimination. In the famous recent case of New State Ice Co. v. Liebman (1932) (285 U.S. 262) the Court merely held that a certificate of public convenience and necessity could not be made a prerequisite to the right to enter the ice business in Oklahoma. This bill contemplates no such requirement. Besides, I believe that the powerful dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis, with its ominous warning against the arrest of social and economic experiments, is the harbinger of the future decisions of the Court.

I cannot doubt that the pending legislation also comes under the public-interest doctrine. The first famous case, Munn v. Illinois (1876) (94 U.S. 113), held that grain elevators were affected with a public interest because they "stand at the gateway of commerce and take toll of all who pass." This depression stands at the gateway of our national economic life, and for almost 4 years has taken toll of all who pass. Congress has the power to remedy this situation. Mr. BECK, in an address a few days ago, when this bill was debated in the House, said that the legislation marked the abdication of all the powers of Congress. I think Congress is abdicating its powers when it sits supinely by and refuses to relieve a national calamity because of a totally erroneous concept of the spirit of our constitutional law.

Finally, the delegation of powers to the President does not violate the Constitution. It is true that legislative powers cannot be delegated. But in order that the wheels of government may continue to turn, the Court has always sanctioned the use of administrative agencies to fill gaps in those statutes which set up reasonable guides to action. United States v. Grimaud (1911) (220 U.S. 506) is a leading case. It sustained a statute delegating to the Secretary of Agriculture the power to fix regulations governing the use of forest reservations for grazing or other lawful purposes and making violation of these regulations a penal offense. I do not feel that any particular case taken alone would be decisive as to this bill, but the cumulative effect of cases sustaining the rate-making power of the Interstate Commerce Commission (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Goodrich (1912), (224 U.S. 195)), the administration of the Pure Food and Drug Act (United States v. Antikamnia (1913) (231 U.S. 654)), the flexible tariff (Hampton v. United States (1928) (276 U.S. 395)), and many other similar situations, is entirely decisive.

THE ADVISABILITY OF PUBLIC WORKS

I turn now to title II of the bill relating to the public-works program. My frequently expressed belief in the soundness of public construction as a means of prompting economic recovery is winning the support of an increasing majority of legislators and economists.

Up to the present, however, this remedy has hardly been applied. In 1932 public construction was $1,500,000,000 less than in 1930. Today, two thirds of the two and one-half million workers normally engaged in construction activities are idle. During the past 4 years the volume of public construction decreased concomitantly with the decline in private industry instead of being expanded in order to act as an economic balance wheel.

Such planlessness has already elicited the disapproval of the Senate. In 1931 we passed the Federal Employment Stabilization Act and last July we enacted the emergency relief and construction measure, both of which were designed to initiate a program of purposeful planning in public works. But the requirement of the latter act that no project shall be eligible for a loan unless it be self-supporting and self-liquidating from revenues other than taxation and the unimaginative, inflexible policy of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation have circumvented the true purposes of those acts, and have accentuated the business catastrophe.

Today is the logical time to inaugurate a large public-works program. I have always maintained that it is better to pay men for useful effort than to maintain them in enforced idleness. Owing to the decline in activity during the past 2 years, which has caused a deficit of $2,000,000,000 worth of projects, an infinite variety of useful work is awaiting action over all the country. Furthermore, enforced idleness undermines the morale and health of the people and makes them unfit for the normal resumption of their accustomed tasks.

While the sustained resumption of private enterprise is impossible until there is a likelihood of profit, public works are suited to initiate the upward swing of the cycle without which profitable business can never become an actuality.

The public-works idea presents, in my estimation, the only sound method of spreading purchasing power, and that is admitted by everyone to be the vital need of today. Proposals for grants or loans to private industry do not meet this need. They assume that the difficulty we face is primarily a failure of credit facilities. But, except in brief periods of panic, there are ample credit facilities to satisfy reasonable business prospects as a whole. The real trouble is that business has no prospects when consumer demand is dried up. Public construction will create a pay roll for about 3,000,000 men and women, which will be translated into a rapid demand for consumer goods and thus lead to general industrial revival. At the same time, public construction does not flood the market with competitive goods in search of buyers.

Extensive outlays for public works will certainly stimulate the investment of large amounts of private funds. The construction of a roadway may open a new district to residential development or invite new business enterprise. I am confident that the activities selected under this bill will ramify into every phase of economic endeavor.

PUBLIC-WORKS PROGRAM

Title II launches a $3,300,000,000 public-works program and authorizes the creation of a Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, all the powers of which will be exercised by a board of public works. The board will formulate projects, which may include publicly owned highways, instrumentalities, and facilities, the conservation and development of national resources, including waterworks, electrification, flood control, river and harbor improvements, and to a limited extent railway maintenance and a variety of private enterprises which are devoted to the public use and which are at present eligible for loans under section 201 (a) of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act. In addition, the bill authorizes the construction, under public regulation and control, of low-cost housing and slum-clearance projects.

Specific provisions are made for road construction. The President is authorized to allocate an amount not less than $400,000,000 for the Federal-aid highway system and secondary or feeder roads. This money is to be apportioned among the several States on the basis provided in the Federal Highway Act. These funds need not be matched by the States. It is noteworthy that the bill liberalizes the purposes for which road money may be spent. It extends to the elimination of highway-traffic hazards, the removal of grade crossings and widening of narrow bridges, and the construction of new roads to avoid congested areas. In connection with the elimination of railroad-grade crossings, however, no funds are to be used for the acquisition of any land, right of way, or easement.

Nothing is more important at this time than the speedy consummation of these projects, and the flexible, individualized administration of the aid contemplated. For this reason authority to disburse funds is lodged in the President. He may act through the board or by means of such agencies as he shall create or designate. He may engage in the construction directly. He may finance the construction by loans to States, municipalities, or other public bodies and to certain private corporations engaged in the construction of projects devoted to a public use. He may aid in financing such construction by purchasing securities, by guaranteeing securities, or in any way deemed desirable to carry out the purposes of the bill. In addition, whenever necessary to make the construction progress rapidly, the President is authorized to make outright grants to States, municipalities, or other public bodies in an amount not exceeding 30 percent of the cost of labor and materials employed upon the project.

In accord with the general objectives of the bill, to which I have referred, title II makes adequate provisions for the welfare of labor. It provides that every contract and every loan or grant made pursuant to this title of the bill shall contain provisions insuring (1) that no convict labor shall be employed upon the project, (2) that the 30-hour week shall prevail, (3) that all employees shall be paid wages sufficient to provide a standard of living in decency and comfort, and that all bids for contracts involving the expenditure of funds created by title II of the bill shall contain the wage standards set up by the President, (4) that preference in employment shall be given to ex-service men, and then to citizens residing in the locality where the work is being done.

The $3,300,000,000 are to be raised by Government borrowing. I have long maintained that this is sound economics, and similar to the customary practices of private business. The improvements contemplated by title II are relatively permanent, and their cost should be spread over a period not exceeding in length the normal life of the project.

MODERATION THE CHARACTERISTIC OF THE BILL

This completes my statement of the objectives and methods of the National Industrial Recovery Act. Its objectives are the restoration to security and comfort of millions of sorely tried people, and the permanent effectuation of ideals of social and economic justice which have been typically American since the founding of the Nation. Its method is sound and peculiarly our own. It is based upon the need for a well-balanced stimulation of private industry and public activity. It does not substitute Government for business, constraint for voluntarism, or socialism for competition. It gives business an opportunity to serve its true function; it opens the channels to voluntary action along fruitful lines; and it raises competition to a worthy level of effort.

Viewed in this light, the bill is not a radical measure; it is merely a fulfillment of the objectives which have characterized the whole mass of antitrust legislation. Let me quote from Senator Sherman's speech in the Senate on March 21, 1890. He did not fail to make the distinction between good and bad competition which we seek to establish in this bill. He said—

> The courts * * * will distinguish between lawful combinations in aid of production and unlawful combinations to prevent competition and in restraint of trade.

Senator Sherman added—

> It is the right of every man to work, labor, and produce in any lawful vocation, and to transport his production on equal terms and conditions and under like circumstances. This is industrial liberty and lies at the foundation of the equality of all rights and privileges.

I believe that it is this equality of terms and conditions that is the principal objective of the present bill. Such equality may be attained and preserved only through the proper kind of competition. On May 12, 1913, the chairman of the House subcommittee which reported out the Federal Trade Commission Act, explained that measure in these words—

The truth is that the administration idea and the idea of business men generally is for the preservation of proper competitive conditions in our great interstate commerce.

I believe that to maintain such competition, new measures are necessary. At the time when the Federal Trade Commission Act was reported, it was said:

No one can foretell the extent to which the complex interstate business of a great country like the United States may require, alike for the benefit of the business man and for the protection of the public, new legislation in the form of Federal regulations, but such legislation should come by a sound process of evolution.

This process of evolution makes the national industrial recovery bill the natural, logical outcome of the antitrust legislation which commenced in 1890.

The words of President Wilson's message of June 20, 1914, recommending the passage of the Clayton Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act, might be spoken today about the Recovery Act of 1933. The great protector of the new freedom of the small enterprise and of labor said:

What we are proposing to do, therefore, is, happily, not to hamper or interfere with business as enlightened business men prefer to do it, or in any sense to put it under the ban. The antagonism between Government and business is over. We are now about to give expression to the best business judgment of America, to what we know to be the business conscience and honor of the land. The Government and business men are ready to meet each other halfway in a common effort to square business efforts with both public opinion and the law.

Of course, the bill implies some modification in traditional methods of handling economic problems. This is because these problems themselves have changed and must be dealt with experimentally. The bill is frankly an experiment, designed to last not more than 2 years. But the sad tide of affairs, bringing deprivation and disaster to the whole Nation, justifies an experiment. And it insistently urges an evolutionary experiment based upon the constructive measures embodied in this bill.

I want to urge upon the Senate the speedy passage of this bill as an employment measure. No amount of familiarity with the evils wrought by the depression can harden us to its effects or make us willing to endure it longer. The cumulative evidence comes in every day, of men degraded by undeserved poverty, of women demoralized by starvation, and of children neglected and crippled because of inadequate food, clothing, and shelter. There is no way of counting the human cost of such deplorable conditions. Twenty years from now, even if prosperity were to return overnight, and it will not return overnight, thousands of mature people will be handicapped by permanent disease because of earlier years spent in want. I firmly believe that Congress has it within its power to check the spread of economic disaster. I forbear to predict the consequences if you fail to take this opportunity to do so. Yours is the responsibility, and I earnestly plead for the immediate acceptance of this measure. When it is administered with the humane sympathies, level-headed judgment, and splendid valor which the President has shown in all his actions, it will be a powerful factor in bringing order and health into the economic life of the American people.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise to obey an impulse. I am moved by the address just concluded by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. What I shall say in the moments I shall occupy the time of the Senate is really to the purpose of asking that justice be done where justice is due.

I pray I may be forgiven if my observations seem interlaced by a self-woven atmosphere of self-praise. Such self-laudation is not my object. But, Mr. President, I cannot refrain from recalling some pertinent history preceding the final conclusion of the bill. I ask you all to recall how in the beginning, when we, a small number of Senators, sought from this floor support for the different crumbling instrumentalities of government which had become so depleted as to be decaying. How we plead for the great army of mankind praying for bread. How we implored in behalf of those borne down by adversity to where they were hopeless and discouraged. We, the Senators to whom I refer, and I refer particularly to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], who now presides over the Senate, he together with his colleague [Mr. WAGNER], who has just presented the exalted philosophy upon which the bill takes the name of the Wagner bill. I, upon entering the Senate, early joined these two distinguished Senators from New York in their design. Then it was my purpose to serve the people whence I came and those whom I felt I represented, while they in their grievous need were appealing for rescue.

It was, however, before I came to this body, upon what I may call my second advent here, that these distinguished Senators had, preceding me, begun the undertaking of having the Federal Government recognize a new duty which had been imposed upon it by the new condition which had been evolved from the new and unparalleled catastrophes inflicted upon government and its mankind.

It will not be forgotten, if recalled in any phase whatever, that the very first speech I assumed to impose upon this body upon my return to the Senate was in behalf of those of whom we speak of as the "school teachers of the city of Chicago." They, having long been denied their compensation because of the lack of funds in the city with which they could be paid. Sirs, at the weird but holy hour of midnight despairing of all hope, I described to the session how these in thousands, paraded the public streets in anxiety and suffering as they exhibited their miseries before mankind. The streets of our cities were clogged with their number as they doubled from place to place to demonstrate their sad misfortunes. The actions, misconstrued by many, were in the trust that such might arouse, first, the natural sympathy of mankind and, second, call aloud for justice on the part of those who ruled in government.

I sought, as the first measure, to give to the Federal courts the right of jurisdiction to restrain foreclosures of mortgages and other exigent liens while the bill which we speak of now as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act was being tried in its usefulness. I sought to prevent those who were to benefit under the bill from being denied its opportunities, through vicious and hasty foreclosures at the hands of ruthless creditors, acting through heartless courts. I made bold to intercept the quick action that would leave the debtor with nothing to be preserved even should they obtain the loan with which it was the object of the bill to endow them.

But eminent Senators from this body, of whose legal judgment none could express a doubt based upon their ability, felt that I was advancing too far and undertaking an innovation that would not be justified by the Constitution.

I see before me my eminent leader, the very great administrative representative of this side of the Chamber, the eminent Senator from Arkansas, the Honorable JOSEPH T. ROBINSON. In his anxiety that all things for which he led should be preserved within the limits of the Constitution freely and justly expressed his view that it were not well to impose too far upon that field of doubt which awakened two suggestions—one, that my proposition was unconstitutional; and the other, that we be not careless of those limitations essential to assure permanent reliefs.

Then the distinguished senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON], now appropriately and justly promoted to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, he having long been a judge in his State of New Mexico—and, too, with eminence in the discharge of his duty. He, too, likewise differed from me. He, taking the position that I was seeking to invest the Federal courts with power to restrain action of State courts procedure. There were those who felt that I was possibly not within the full limit of the Constitution or its privilege when I would have endowed the Federal courts with the power of enjoining any State procedure or any procedure anywhere that sought to deprive the individual, worthy of enjoying it, of full rights and powers vested in State courts even though my object was to secure the debtor the benefit of the loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in such due time as could rescue and refuge him from impending peril.

Because of respect for the two particular eminent Senators of whom I now speak, and many on the other side of this Chamber for whom I had great regard and as to whose ability there could be no suspicion of doubt, I refrained from pressing at that time that particular feature of the bill. But, sirs, following that, frankness compels me to admit that I was something of a common drag, little less at times than a nuisance; both to the newspaper men from their elevation in discussing and distributing the news—as well as to my brother Senators here upon my side of the Chamber. I was ever insisting upon the bill looking to a grant by the Government in behalf of the policemen, the watchmen, and the guardians of peace of Chicago; the school teachers, whose conditions I have intimated by a short description; the firemen who had pledged their very life in every undertaking—and to whom the call of the resounding bell of alarm, for aught they knew, was the dirge of their funeral. Thus, from that time until now, without an exception, wherever opportunity afforded and propriety would justify, I have followed up this measure in conjunction with these eminent Senators from New York.

For a long time the bill took on the form of a joint name, the Wagner-Lewis bill. I was not entitled to the whole credit. Both eminent Senators from New York had begun the work before I was sworn into my service here in my second term in the Senate. In later days a similar bill had attached to it the same name; but the credit of that Lewis is partly due to a very active Member of the lower House, who formerly served from the State of Maryland, and who, as a Tariff Commissioner, received praise for his independence. The bill, therefore, could be justly entitled, as far as he was concerned, with the credit; I with only part of it.

Then there came, sir, let me call to your attention, the ceaseless efforts of two other Senators. There was the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who from day to day toiled without cessation, with a patience that seemed inexhaustible. He sought to bring about support of the measure which was spoken of as the "La Follette-Costigan bill".

His colleague in the labor at the time being the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], working in the same atmosphere of desire to serve the needy. These faithful servants—may I include myself—all combined, looked to the object which is now, we hope, near to fruition, when the Federal Government would, through new guidance, learn the lesson that it, the United States, was a government; that its principal purpose was the preservation of its people; that it was not a mere canopy, as one would create a tent with which to cover those that were beneath it; but, as it covered them with its protection, military and through the power of diplomacy and international negotiation, left the inmates to wither in hunger, to die in want. More, sir, to be consigned to the gnawing misery and acid suffering which they were compelled to endure because of the confession of our governmental masters of the impotence of a great Government, such as was disclosed to be the frailty of the United States of America.

The situation of the needy seemed never to dawn or to break upon that class of citizens, these eminent "business men", who ever characterize themselves as the only patriots and to prove such title would block any move made looking to the protection of the miserable, and those particularly on whom these specially endowed in criminal purpose, the "business men" have afflicted so severely by the methods of business they inaugurated as they stained the honor of the Government and sought to plant on this State the dishonor which they have, by their system of financial sin and debauchery, put on America within the last few years. We have all seen the spectacle paraded and disclosed here, and then we saw the futility of the efforts on the part of these eminent Senators who had from all political vantages fought to protect the endangered. We saw failure at every turn.

I must say for the Senators from New York that during the time when conditions in their great city called for their cooperation they did not abandon the task; they continued with me to struggle. The present Presiding Officer of the Senate, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], having in mind the situation touching the street railways of his city, acting as well in behalf of those who toiled in behalf of the city government, ever presented them in their need to this body as a justification for his ceaseless, multiplied efforts.

"UNCONSTITUTIONAL"

Mr. President, what I want to impress upon my eminent colleagues, who kindly give me a thought and attention when I dare present a viewpoint here, is that first came the cry that the measure was unconstitutional. It was the insistence that any effort on the part of any of the legislators of the Federal Government to hold it responsible for the care and the preservation of a citizen of a State was a violation of the Constitution, that the effort for relief itself was in itself against the theory of the Federal Government. One could always get that reply when one moved toward the object. To those who asserted it there seemed never to appeal the fact that the Federal Government was a mere institution, that it was the concrete and congregated whole of the separate parts of that government which we speak of as the State. Sir, I declare that now the ever uppermost question is not if the undertaking for justice and relief from persecution and oppression be constitutional, but is it institutional? Ever and ever returns the reply that it is to preserve the institutions of men, as well as to conserve the constitution of government, for which charter and compact called "Constitution" is framed and expressed in declaration.

OUR NEW DEAL

There was never a reason why that which represented all the States should be denied the right of protecting each of the States. But time and situations have more or less mollified the judgment of many of the eminent Senators who honestly felt we by our efforts were intruding too far upon the Constitution, even to the point of violation. Now, sirs, a general atmosphere has begun to assemble; I may say permeate the public at large. It now reaches to the consciousness and duty proclaiming that whatever is necessary to be done to preserve the citizen should be done, and should be done by that which could best do it. It was and is the fulfillment now of the ancient, sacred injunction:

Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might.

Mr. President, what is the meaning of this constant assertion of the "unconstitutionality" of the measure, and particularly on the part of a certain set of citizenry who ever oppose any advent looking to relief of the humble citizen when he is in need, and when in his need and distress, he and his have become desperate to the point of discouragement—and, sir, when in his discouragement his army of sufferers threatens the very peace of the Government under which he lives and which he is pledged to earth to protect and sworn to God to preserve?

These eminent masters who cry "unconstitutional"—when are they ever solicitous as to the Constitution? Is it ever when they come here in legion of power for their own measures which gives them privilege over their fellow mankind.

Let us consider the word "privilege" for a second. We refer to it in this body as enjoyment of either what is called a right or some grant, but we who have been compelled to be the students of the hour from time to time will not forget that the word "privilege" is the mere adaptation of the phrase "privi leges"—private laws. They who have ever been authorized to obtain in their behalf private laws to serve their uses and reward their guilty undertakings with compensation and profit, however disreputable, were ever busy finding opportunity to characterize every measure that looked to give salvation to the humble and relieve the misery of the unfortunate as "unconstitutional."

Sir, if the Constitution ever meant a fundamental document of honor and justice, on which was to be created the Government, and by which there was to be sustained and maintained a true mankind, then let us pause and see how for years these masters have seized this instrument as the excuse for ever opposing, and, whenever possible, of destroying, any measure that came to the rescue of the masses in their misery; but how they ever rush to it as the anchor of their special privilege when by the private laws of privilege they could under it obtain the enjoyment of that which granted to them riches of money and the license of debasing their Republic. Sirs, let us look to the dishonor to which they have now brought their Nation. Before all the world the face of America burns with shame as the pages of history flame in the conflagration they lighted upon the sacred history of once-glorious America. We reflect upon the actions which are being investigated by the diligent committees which are now holding sessions in different parts of the Capitol Building.

Mr. President, I hope we have heard the last of that cry of unconstitutionality when it is being raised for no other purpose than to obstruct a measure of righteousness, due to those who have a right to call upon their country for relief in the hour of their oppression and in the day of their destruction.

Mr. President, I want a concluding word as I pay my tribute to these eminent Senators who began in this work and even though I dare be so bold, if not audacious, as to refer to my own small part in its early performance. I thank the President and the committee for the credit given me. Now, sir, to relate my latterly and constantly conjoining with these eminent Senators who have done so much to bring success and to whom credit is so greatly due, is to feel proud.

I ask you, sir, what have we heard in this body of the meaning of the words of the Constitution which we speak of as the general-welfare clause? Why has it ever been that there have been those ever seeking to avoid any reference to that phraseology when they sought to find occasion to declare invalid and illegal any movement looking to the relief of the citizen, on the ground that it is not within the declared and distinctively described duties under the Constitution?

Mr. President, it was a very flippant thing ever indulged on the part of those who spoke of the general-welfare clause. They would seem to invest the mind with the idea that the words and the phraseology "general welfare" referred to some compact which alluded to form and shape of government. Sirs, when the Constitution was framed, with the severe labors of the masters who sought to put it together, there arose the suggestion that they would not be able to provide for all the conditions that might arise, and that something must be expressed to give authority to meet those conditions which, suddenly arising, submitting themselves to the intelligence of mankind, must be justified somewhere and provided for in the mercies and humanity of man.

Therefore the words "general welfare" came into life and being at the instance of a rather strange mortal of mankind, member of the Constitutional Convention, whose name was Luther Martin. He came out of Maryland. This man, joining with a member named "Morris", of Pennsylvania, began to contemplate that something had to be done to provide a phrase to meet the conditions which all of their fellows could not contemplate in detail yet was possible to arise.

Sirs, we of the law and procedure of justice, for our Nation had to seek a definition of the word "equity", and finally, after thousands of suggestions, no definition could be framed that completely described it. We became content, after long search and research, to take the definition of equity as left us by Grotius, the great Dutch law writer. From him we find it from the liberal Latin interpreted that "Equity is the correction of that, wherein the law, by reason of its universality, is deficient." That definition remained with us, and the eminent Senators sitting about me recall that it found its way into our jurisprudence as the only definition of equity which the law professor hands to the student as literally defining, as nearly as it can be defined—that particular phase of justice—Equity.

So the paragraphs relating to the general welfare are intended to mean, not, as construed so very many times in debate and in usage, that the "general welfare" of the Constitution in phrase constituted only an organized machine in form, which we call "government", sirs, they were meant as phrase to prepare for that which should produce and keep the general welfare of the citizen of the Government in general welfare. For if they had meant only the general welfare of the institution which we speak of as "government", the Army and Navy were, in themselves, with power of defense and assault, sufficient to produce and maintain that. But these eminent framers of the Constitution saw that there would arise such a necessity as is now confronting us, where there must be those who must act. Yet not finding specific warrant in the exact language of a phrase of the Constitution, there must be found a license granted to their discretion and to their spirit of justice through which there could be done the thing which the demands of right and honor called for to be performed and consummated.

Thus the phrase "general welfare" meant what it said; that it would assure the citizen a welfare that was so general in his behalf as would preserve him as the object of government, and his citizenship maintained as his pride and his honor and the praiseworthy things of his existence.

Now, Mr. President, comes forth the bill; it has received its birth. I am exceedingly interested in clauses, some of which apply specifically to my city of Chicago, which, may it be said, I sought to write in the measure by some form of verbal dictation in order that the institutions of my community might be protected and receive the benefits of the gratuities afforded and, sir, the distribution of justice on the part of the Government.

Here I may add, sir, there will never be a change. Writers upon the theory of government may feel we have temporarily invaded a field to shortly abandon it—that we have assumed to act upon an emergency which when it terminates will be the end of our undertaking in the new systems of relief. Mr. President, creation is, after all, but a progress of innovation. Everything, sir, from the delicate bloom of the bud pressing its lips upon the flower stem to the flaming, flashing sunlight over the great wooded lands, and the eternal rock that peaks itself so high that at its crest the angels may tread down to earth to visit their beloved; all, sirs, is but the constant multiplication of change. As fast as one bewilders itself in its form of change, then surrenders to the dust of corroding time, the other, the new, cometh forth and rises to multiply and increase itself to the service of the needing hour. The laws of our country can nowise differ from what are the institutions which are endowed from God and protect mankind.

Mr. President, there arises on occasion in our minds the familiar essay of Cicero. Coward as he was in refusing to defend his friend Milo on the ground of a new era calling for new change, he repaired to the groves outside the great imperial capital, there sat himself down to write an essay, and produced an immortal one, so far as the words of mankind can ever be called such. It is in the renowned classic that all organized creation have their time to perish and to fade; that these can only be restored either under the light of the sun that shall warm them and revivify them again into life known as "rebirth", or in the refreshing airs that blow upon them as the winds from the south perfume the civilization and dust through which they pervade and preserve. These may restore, but there can never be a time when one is not as rapidly destroyed as the other restores and fills its place.

Then says he, which is the crux of the best thought that we have known, that experience of men now show that as fast as conditions destroy or events transpire, or no longer apply to present conditions, other events are at once created by that mysterious thing we speak of as creation to make up the deficiency. Thus the link and chain—in the process of life and being. Today we accept this philosophy, and it is recorded in this bill now before the Senate as the full expression and fulfillment of the thought of the great Roman philosopher, sir, on this one basis—all organized creation of government has its time for change.

It will not do to say that this change has come unbidden; it cannot be said it was unexpected; it shall not be denied upon the ground that it is an innovation; that it is a violation of some fundamental, ancient principle. The truth has to be met face to face. It is that our Government has reached a time of change. Its citizenship must now move through the vale which transforms them into a citizenship of a new nation.

We will never see the time when there will be abrogated and repealed this new departure of the citizen, who, preserving his government by his taxes and his efforts, and saving it whenever necessary by his life, shall not have the right to appeal to it and to every fountain that may be struck to its flowing with blessing, for his own care and that which shall be the guardianship of his home and his children.

If this Government, sir, has reached the point where it will fulfill the laws of justice, and your fellow men, Senators, shall know that you have entered upon the departure, you need not fear revolution in your country such as has existed seemingly in every other land across the sea. You need not fear that anarchy or the Communism, with its torch and the broad, shining ax with its gleaming edge of murder, shall ever work its destruction.

Your fellow citizen will have no such hopelessness in his life as to feel that his only refuge would be the destruction of his own house on whose wreck he may survive as he dreams to erect a new status of freedom that may save him from the injustice he now endures. He will not be called upon, sir, ever to consider such an emergency; he will see this new government under a new guise in its spirit and its patriotism, disregarding every mere designation of a party political name, but turning to the fulfillment of duty, as dictated by conscience and guided by the human heart, and he will in its care, in its legislative guaranty, preserve and protect both himself and his household. He will shrink away from an assault on his country, however invited it may be.

Sir, I invite you to the contemplation of 3 weeks past when the distinguished leaders on both sides of this Legislative Chamber were seriously concerned as to a condition that might arise at the doorway of the great Capitol here, such as had arisen under similar conditions in Rome. We were compelled for a while to guard the portals of the Senate lest there should be conduct at the doorways or in galleries against law and order that should shame us before the world. And, sir, you had the example brought to your minds, something delightful to dwell upon, gratifying to recall, consoling for all the future to memorialize. It was that the poor, the humble toiler, who had come to our doors in a spirit of defiance and desperation and seeking relief moved over our portals to see our action. He beheld that his protector was his Nation; that his guardian for the preservation of his home and children was his legislative body. He soon knew that the voices of the legislators of his countrymen assured him that he was the direct object of its care, its pity, its salvation—he, the citizen in need, the one thought of the legislators day and night.

Mr. President, these, once inflamed, then gradually softened; they moved off in smaller numbers; little by little repaired to their homes, in different directions. We know they melted and departed in new spirit; but America, sirs, your America, sirs, is the only country which within the last 2 years, when its citizens assembled in revolt at the Capital, sworn to execute vengeance, never suffered a stroke leveled against its institutions, never once by force or through voice of anarchy that summoned destruction by appeal was there one affront or offense. This, sir, we are pleased to ascribe to the confidence they had in their public servants, who, they saw, were anxious to come to their rescue and secure their relief. All this, in new transformation, our citizens beheld, and in it rejoiced. These became a part of that common lot of the lawful citizens and of constitutional government and moved off to praise—however they had been misguided in advice to betray and destroy.

Mr. President, if I have stepped apart a little to pay some little heed to my own contribution toward this measure, I beg to express my thanks to those who have allowed me the privilege.

"RADICAL"

Sirs, when it shall be said that the measure which now takes its course is to be "radical", let the reply be, "Yes; everything that undoes, eradicates; one cannot undo and put anew in the place of that which is undone without first eradicating the wrong upon which to construct the right. We eradicate; that is, uproot. Time and time again we may be called upon to overthrow an edifice when it has been afflicted with a plague, which may be disease or vermin or that which threatens what may be called the health of mankind and the security of society. Yet in all instances whatever was radical was only radical to the extent that it became necessary to eradicate the one that we might build up the other."

Mr. President, may I conclude by calling the attention of my fellow Senators that legislation or landmarks of principle now considered as conservative were when presented thought to be and aspersed as radical; that which is conservative now was deemed so radical at the time it was presented to the extent as to be anathematized as unconstitutional—all this because it was a departure or a new construction which had not been previously devised and enforced in execution.

But, sir, the mere fact that a measure may be radical—that is, new, undertaking a new authority, beginning a new course, and assuming, sir, a new departure in government—is no denial of its righteousness. It is no proof of injustice, and it is no justification for urging that because new that it should be impeded in its work of welfare or obstructed in its course and destroyed in its distribution of what it may give unto mankind of happiness and peace.

Mr. President, I then again congratulate the able Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and his colleague [Mr. COPELAND]. I send my congratulations to those others, whom I need not name but who are familiar to us all, who have toiled with me looking to the object of having but a hearing, of having but the opportunity and desire of safeguarding the rights that belong to the citizen, and of applying the justice for which government was created. We wanted to assure the citizen of a refuge, that he may have the fullness of hope within his heart and the security of being preserved within his faith; since by this creed he may return to his children with the consciousness that they are to live the lives of citizens of America, guarded by its legislators and saved by that spirit of justice and rule of right that has so long been the guide for all America.

Mr. President, for that, sir, we delight to tell our countrymen that this, their America, which in its beginning was an experiment and radical, born of the brains of its patriotic fathers that in the emergency which then confronted them it did not hesitate, despite what may be termed "radicalism" to undertake the measure that shall give to this new America a new day, since we now move under a new guise to a new people who will now walk forth upon the avenues of their life in the highways of civilization with a consciousness that they are preserved by their country, for which they live and, in turn, for its preservation of them, they gladly tender themselves and their children to die, if it must be, upon battlefields, or in every encounter where justice would call for them in gratitude to remember with praise and sacrifice this our great America. I thank the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendments, committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, at this late day and hour in the session I do not want to take time in expressing my views upon the pending measure; and yet I feel that there are some general observations which ought to be made, if I am to make them at all, before we enter upon the consideration of the amendments. I feel deeply about the proposed measure, or I should not trespass upon the time of the Senate.

As I understand the first subdivision of the bill, it presents a question of a change of policy of the Government toward the question of trusts and monopolies. Section 5 specifically provides for the suspension of the antitrust laws during the period of 2 years, and 60 days thereafter, as I recall. But it is not very material as to the limitation which is provided for in the bill, because in my opinion the effect of section 5, and the effect of the entire bill, so far as the first subdivision thereof is concerned, is to change our policy with reference to the antitrust laws and dealing with the question of monopoly. I was of that opinion before I heard the able speech of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and he confirmed me in my view, very candidly stating that it is a change of policy with reference to the antitrust laws or with reference to dealing with monopolies. As I understand the measure, we are to have trusts and combines and monopolies, but we are not to call them such; and we are to regulate them.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. It is not a change with reference to the goals of the antitrust laws, but really an attempt to accomplish what they were intended to accomplish.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes; I understood that quite well. Nevertheless the Senator said the antitrust laws had failed, and that we have adopted a new policy, a new program, and this is the adoption of the new policy.

Mr. WAGNER. The antitrust laws failed because they resulted in the concentration of wealth.

Mr. BORAH. In my judgment this bill is a very advanced step toward the ultra concentration of wealth in the country. In other words, if we repeal or suspend the antitrust laws for 2 or 2½ years and permit those things to be done which may not now be done under the antitrust laws, at the end of that time it will be practically impossible to resolve ourselves into the position which we occupied with reference to that subject matter prior to the time the suspension took place. This is the first step to end all antitrust laws. We are to have combines as large as the industry itself, and any man in the industry who does not go along, joins it, may be put in jail.

If we say to the vast combinations of the country now existing, to the great corporations, "You may proceed to further merge, to further consolidate, to further monopolize, to control output and fix the prices during the period of 2½ years", it will be practically impossible to change the program at the end of that time. Therefore I look upon this suspension as in effect a repeal, a pronouncement against the antitrust laws, and a change of policy upon the part of the National Government as to the method and manner of dealing with the subject of concentration of wealth and of monopoly.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. There will be little to change after the operation of the proposed plan for 2½ years, so far as the people are concerned. Is not that true?

Mr. BORAH. I think that is true.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. REED. Under an early section of the bill in title I it is evident that price fixing is intended by agreement among the producers of commodities, and it is made a crime to undersell that fixed price. Does the Senator think it will be possible at the expiration of 2 years to revert to a system whereby it is a crime to adhere to that fixed or pooled price?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think it is possible.

Mr. REED. The transition is too violent.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; and I do not believe it is practicable. I think the logic of the able speech of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] was to that effect. We have now reached the time when we are to deal with the subject of monopolies and with trusts from a different viewpoint from that with which we dealt with them when we were attempting to enforce the antitrust laws.

Mr. WAGNER. We are trying to prevent further monopoly.

Mr. BORAH. I accept the Senator's statement that he is trying to prevent it, but I am undertaking to say that he is accentuating and making possible greater concentration of wealth than could possibly take place under the Sherman antitrust laws if reasonably enforced. My contention is that whatever may be the Senator's intention, he is giving monopoly something it has been fighting for these 25 years—the death of the antitrust laws.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not want to argue with the Senator now, but our effort is to do quite the contrary, to give the smaller business men, who have been discriminated against under the operation of our present antitrust laws, an opportunity to be able to cooperate. The dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis in the American Column case shows how the law has worked against the smaller man and in favor of his larger opponent.

Mr. BORAH. I shall read from Justice Brandeis in a few moments on the question of combination of wealth and how to deal with it. I am not now discussing the objective which the Senator says he has in view. I am undertaking to discuss the bill from the viewpoint of whether or not that objective can be obtained in that way.

Let us refer for a moment to the Sherman antitrust law and ask, if we are going to take care of the independents, if we are going to prevent the further solidification and concentration of wealth, if we are going to take care of the man who is striving for himself to do something without either the consent of the Government or the consent of some monopoly, why should the antitrust law be interfered with at all? It provides:

> Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations is hereby declared to be illegal.

Why is it necessary to suspend a law which condemns the concentration of wealth or the combination of wealth or the merger of wealth for the purpose of controlling or restraining interstate trade? Under what conceivable condition could it be necessary, in the interest of the masses and of the people generally, to suspend the law which prohibits the control of wealth for the purpose of restraining trade, fixing prices, and controlling interstate commerce? If the object of the bill is to take care of the independents or to enable a man who under those conditions has not been able to take care of himself, then why is it necessary to suspend a law which makes illegal a contract or combination in the form of a trust or monopoly? If we desire to kill the trusts or the monopolies, why not add to the law which is upon the statute book rather than to suspend it when the law itself condemns that which it is said we condemn.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. We are suspending the law only with reference to the provisions of the codes, and in no other respects.

Mr. BORAH. It is perfectly evident, then, that the provisions of the code are going to be combinations or contracts in restraint of trade, or it would not be necessary to suspend the antitrust laws. They could not possibly be in conflict with the code unless the code runs contrary to this provision which says a contract or combination in restraint of trade is illegal. What is the necessity of suspending this law which condemns trusts unless your new code is to be a trust? What is the necessity of suspending a law which denounces combines in restraint of trade unless your new codes may become a combine in restraint of trade? What is the necessity of suspending a law unless you are preparing to violate it?

Mr. WAGNER. May I say to the Senator that while the objective of the antitrust laws, the perpetuation of genuine competition, was worthy, the law failed to reach that objective, and at the same time sanctioned the largest combinations of business that we have ever had in the history of the country. Yet the same law prevented smaller business men from cooperating in order to put competition upon a basis of efficiency, and has resulted instead in a destructive, cutthroat competition. We frankly propose to suspend the evil features of the antitrust laws without diminishing their capacity to serve useful ends.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. If that is a defect in the Sherman antitrust law, the objective being the same as the antitrust law, to wit, to prevent combinations and mergers, why is it necessary to repeal the law? Why not build up to it or modify it or make the combinations conform to it, rather than to repeal it?

Mr. WAGNER. We are not repealing the law. We are relaxing the law only with reference to the provisions contained in the codes.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; and I ask again if the codes which are going to be made by private parties bent upon gain, determined to collect every cent which can be charged and collected, are not to be in conflict with the antitrust laws, why is it necessary to suspend all the antitrust laws? The Senator says we are only suspending the Sherman antitrust law because the code will come in conflict with it. If it does, it must follow that we are going to have a contract in the form of a trust or a conspiracy in restraint of trade; otherwise it would not be in conflict with the law. You are afraid of the antitrust laws, therefore, you suspend, which will in the end mean repeal. You will have vast combines and monopolies controlled by political machinery. God pity those who must pay the prices which will obtain.

Mr. WAGNER. Under the antitrust laws as they stand today no group of smaller or larger industries can cooperate for the purpose of putting wages and hours of labor upon a proper basis. It is the impossibility of doing these very things which has dragged our whole economic structure down, and the main purpose of this legislation is to rationalize competition and put it upon a basis of efficiency rather than upon a basis of exploitation of labor. That is the philosophy behind the legislation. The Government must approve the codes, and that is where the public protection lies.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to discuss now the political approval of a code.

Mr. WAGNER. I shall not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. BORAH. We have had some experience in the last 3 months with approvals on the part of the President, and we know perfectly well that those approvals were never made by the President. They would not be in such disreputable standing if they had been approved by the President. They were approved by agents, as these codes will be. Do not forget that the President is authorized to delegate this question of approval to some individual responsible to no constituency, neither selected or elected by the people.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I do not know whether the Senator is familiar with it or not; but the Democratic promise was that we were going to settle this trouble by shortening hours and decentralizing wealth.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I am familiar with it; but I do not care to discuss the Democratic platform, because I do not regard either platform as of very much moment in the consideration of legislation. I know how and why platforms are written.

Again, section 2 of the Sherman antitrust law says:

> Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Why suspend that?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, my answer is that it is not suspended.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, it is not? Let us see. Perhaps I misread the bill:

> While this title is in effect, and for 60 days thereafter, any code, agreement, or license approved, prescribed, or issued and in effect under this title, and any action complying with the provisions thereof taken during such period, shall be exempt from the provisions of the antitrust laws of the United States.

Why is it necessary, Mr. President, to provide that it shall be exempt from the antitrust laws of the United States if it is not going to conflict with the antitrust laws of the United States?

Mr. WAGNER. It is necessary insofar as the provisions of the code are in conflict with the statutes.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator knows very well that no agreement can be made now in any industry to provide a living wage for the workers or to shorten the hours of labor.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not agree to that at all. If the agreement goes no farther and may not be used for other purposes, I could not agree with the Senator.

Mr. WAGNER. The courts have said that industry can not cooperate or provide any code fixing definite standards for these things, because that is against the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator has in mind that kind of agreements only, let us limit the suspension of the antitrust laws to that specific kind of contracts. This bill, however, makes a general suspension of the antitrust laws of the United States. While you are talking about labor you are opening the door to monopoly, the enemy of labor.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not want to reiterate constantly that we are suspending only those provisions that are in conflict with the codes. There are some other desirable powers that ought to be granted in addition to the right to agree as to hours and wages. These include suppression of fraudulent practices, false advertising, and the like. Then there are additional benefits, such as the interchange of information and the promulgation of research. All of these very salutary practices, which industry ought to be able to agree upon, cannot be indulged in under the restrictions of the present law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if that is the design of the bill, then I must say it has been rather unfortunately drawn, because under the suspension of the antitrust laws of which the Senator is speaking any combination may be made. These combinations which the units are going to be permitted to make may be in contravention of any provision of the Sherman antitrust law, and the Sherman antitrust law is suspended insofar as it conflicts with any code which the units may see fit to make. If they see fit to make a code which is monopolistic in form, it is valid, and the Sherman antitrust law is suspended. If they see fit to make a code which has the effect of restraining trade, the Sherman antitrust law is suspended and the code goes into effect.

Mr. WAGNER. Will the Senator note that the proposed law itself says that the President, before approving any code, must be satisfied that it will not promote a monopoly and that it will not discriminate against small business? That is a very clear declaration of principle.

Mr. BORAH. Then perhaps the provision of the bill ought to be redrafted in accordance with the Senator's view.

Mr. WAGNER. The bill so states.

Mr. BORAH. Section 3 of the Sherman antitrust law is as follows:

> Every contract, combination in form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce * * *, is hereby declared illegal.

The effect of this bill is to suspend the Sherman antitrust law, not only for two years and a half, as it says, or 2 years and 60 days, but in its practical effect indefinitely, because once we permit these combines, once we permit these monopolistic practices, once we permit these mergers, we have a condition which cannot be resolved back into its original parts or conditions at the end of 2 years.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York a few moments ago referred to and quoted at length from Mr. Justice Brandeis. I desire to call attention now to an opinion by Mr. Justice Brandeis which it seems to me ought to have consideration in the final shaping of this bill.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more interruption? I desire to read a provision of the bill which he may have overlooked. Section 3, subdivision (2), provides, among other things, that the President must be satisfied—that such code or codes are not designed to promote monopolies or to eliminate or oppress small enterprises, and will not operate to discriminate against them.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; "not designed." There never in the world was one made that was designed to have that effect, according to the people who made it. What, as a practical matter, will it be when the steel industry gets its code into operation and all independents are out of business or in jail?

Mr. President, if Senators want to know how this measure is going to be enforced in the view of those who have been advocating it, let me call their attention to a statement made by Mr. Harriman, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, who for years has been an earnest advocate of the repeal of the Sherman antitrust law, and so has the United States Chamber of Commerce, and now is an advocate of this bill, I take it, because of its suspension of the antitrust laws, from what he has said. He says in an interview:

Few industries are without "ruthless minorities" which are always ready to desert cooperative agreements and follow their own pathway to profits.

In other words, there are few industries but that have some independents, some who are seeking to conduct their business along lines which they think are proper and right and who are not willing to charge the price of the "combine"; and those independent business enterprises are the people of whom Mr. Harriman speaks here as minorities that are difficult to manage.

It is easy to see that if 90 percent of an industry lines up a program of shorter hours and better pay, the other 10, by lengthening hours and lessening pay, might make great gains.

President Harriman was asked what, under his trade-association plan, could be done to these men. His answer was:

"They'll be treated like any maverick. They'll be roped, branded, and made to run with the herd."

In other words, in the mind of Mr. Harriman, the practical interpreter of this measure, every independent, everyone who does not come into the combine, everyone who does not cooperate according to the agreement, will be roped, branded, ears split, and brought into the herd and made to run with the herd. His idea of it is that the independents can be put out of business as an entirety; that in a great unit of industry there can be no independents; that no one can be permitted to conduct his business except in accordance with the code. And when all independents are destroyed, when all competition is gone, when one powerful combination presents the code and makes its showing for approval, what will become of the consumer? Then it will be, as it has always been, that monopoly will regulate the regulators; and that is not a reflection upon individuals, it is stating an inevitable practical result.

Mr. WAGNER. I want to assure the Senator that Mr. Harriman had nothing to do with drafting this legislation, and will not be the administrator of it. That is simply his individual interpretation, just as the Senator is now attempting to advance his own interpretation. As for forcing people into line, there is a recalcitrant minority in some of these industries that we are trying to reach. This minority, with its long hours, short pay, and cutthroat competition, has dragged industry down to its present low level. We are trying to prevent those particular individuals from doing that sort of thing, and trying to bring them up to a level of efficiency and decency. If that can be accomplished, I think we will have made a great contribution toward a better day in the United States.

Mr. BORAH. It so happens he is satisfied with the bill. Mr. Schwab, in speaking of this measure, says:

I say that we gladly accept this offer of partnership, because with this kind of support and through our revitalized institute we should speedily and effectively be able to see brought into line those selfish interests who persist in unfair practices that are contrary to sound public policy.

The only persons who are remaining out of the steel combine are a few independents, and Mr. Schwab understands that through this bill and the suspension of the Sherman antitrust law he can force every steel concern in the United States to come into the combine which will be formed by the great steel companies of the United States.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. On what occasion did Mr. Harriman and Mr. Schwab speak, and did they assume to speak with authority?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. Schwab was speaking at the meeting of the Steel Institute. Mr. Harriman, I think, was speaking in an interview.

I read the following item from the public press:

The Drug Institute of America, Inc., has been formed to unite all divisions of the $2,000,000,000 drug industry in an effort to maintain fair wages and to end cutthroat competition, it was announced yesterday.

* * * * * * *

Patterned somewhat along the lines of the American Iron & Steel Institute and the American Petroleum Institute, the Drug Institute will pledge its members to cooperate with the Government—

And to bring into line the entire drug interests of the United States.

Mr. President, the practical effect of it will be that the drug interests, the steel interests, and this and that combine or interest will meet and formulate a code of rules. Any code which they formulate or which they put forth is no longer in conflict with the Sherman antitrust law, because the Sherman antitrust law is suspended wherever it comes in conflict with the code. Therefore, so far as the Sherman antitrust law is concerned, they are perfectly free in forming their code. They need not give consideration to the antitrust law in any way whatever, because they know that if they form the code and if it should conflict with the Sherman antitrust law, the Sherman antitrust law to that extent is repealed.

So we will have the steel industry, the drug industry, and the different industries of the United States meeting and combining for the purpose of formulating a code, the great objective of which will be to fix prices.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, is there anything in the bill which justifies the conclusion of the Senator that all the matters to which he refers may be incorporated in the code? Remember that the code is to be a code of fair competition. A monopoly cannot be created in providing for fair competition. Besides being a contradiction, it would be contrary to the philosophy of the bill. Now, does not the Senator think it would be a better thing for the country if a minimum wage were provided for, and if reasonable hours of labor were fixed, so that competition would be put on a higher standard than at the present time? This would be of benefit to everybody, and would protect the small business man who cannot cooperate under the present law. It would prevent the necessity for the excessive concentration of wealth.

We are trying to prevent the further concentration of wealth by making rational competition possible. We are trying to effect a better distribution of wealth by providing for adequate wage payments. These are the objectives of this measure.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator speaks of taking care of the small man who has been forced into these large combines. What do we have here? When the large combines formulate their code, they not only bring to bear on the small man the economic pressure which may destroy him but the Government loans them the power to make him a criminal, and send him to the penitentiary, if he violates the code.

Mr. WAGNER. The answer is that the large industrialist will not formulate the codes. Everyone in the industry must be admitted into the groups proposing them or else the codes will not be approved. That is one of the conditions of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes.

Mr. WAGNER. The bill is to take care of the smaller men, so that they may have an equal chance so far as wages and hours are concerned. It is to put an end to certain practices in which they now indulge in an underground manner, leading to the destruction of the small industry. Under present conditions the larger units have wiped out small industries. We are trying to prevent this.

Mr. BORAH. When the time comes that the large interests in an industry, gathered together for the purpose of making a code, do not dominate the situation, but permit the small independent to write the code for the large industry, the millennium will have been here for many years. But until that time we are to have this same old world, with its appetite for gain and economic power still ruthless for profits.

Mr. WAGNER. The Government is here to step in to see that the small industries are taken care of and protected.

Mr. BORAH. If the Government cannot step in through the courts and enforce antimonopoly laws, does the Senator expect the Government to step in successfully through political maneuvers? The Senator is fond of reading from Justice Brandeis. Let me call attention in this connection to language which he used recently. He said:

> Able, discerning scholars have pictured for us the economic and social results of thus removing all limitations upon the size and activities of business corporations and of vesting in their managers vast powers once exercised by stockholders—results not designed by the States and long unsuspected. They show that size alone gives to giant corporations a social significance not attached ordinarily to smaller units of private enterprise. Through size, corporations, once merely an efficient tool employed by individuals in the conduct of private business, have become an institution—an institution which has brought such concentration of economic power that so-called "private corporations" are sometimes able to dominate the State. The typical business corporation of the last century, owned by a small group of individuals, managed by their owners, and limited in size by their personal wealth, is being supplanted by huge concerns in which the lives of tens or hundreds of thousands of employees and the property of tens or hundreds of thousands of investors are subjected through the corporate mechanism to the control of a few men.
> The data submitted in support of these conclusions indicate that in the United States the process of absorption has already advanced so far that perhaps two thirds of our industrial wealth has passed from individual possession to the ownership of large corporations whose shares are dealt in on the stock exchange; that 200 nonbanking corporations, each with assets in excess of $90,000,000, control directly about one fourth of all our national wealth, and that their influence extends far beyond the assets under their direct control; that these 200 corporations, while nominally controlled by about 2,000 directors, are actually dominated by a few hundred persons—the negation of industrial democracy. Other writers have shown that, coincident with the growth of these giant corporations, there has occurred a marked concentration of individual wealth, and that the resulting disparity in incomes is a major cause of the existing depression.

Mr. President, under the pending bill, as a practical proposition, these vast corporations can meet and formulate a code, and I venture to say that the effect of the small participants will be infinitesimal in that meeting where these vast corporations, controlling two thirds of the national wealth, are brought together.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the conditions to which Justice Brandeis refers were brought about under the present law.

Mr. BORAH. Brought about—why? The Democrats said in the campaign that they were brought about under the present law because Republicans had refused to enforce the law, and that it was the Democrats who were going to enforce the law and remedy that condition of things. Now you are engaged not in enforcing the antitrust laws, for which you denounced Republicans, but in suspending them. Did you say anything in the campaign about suspending the antitrust laws? Nay, verily.

Mr. WAGNER. I have said that we are not suspending the law; we are enforcing it properly.

Mr. BORAH. By suspending the law. Again Justice Brandeis said:

> There is a widespread belief that the existing unemployment is the result, in large part, of the gross inequality in the distribution of wealth and income which giant corporations have fostered; that by the control which the few have exerted through giant corporations individual initiative and effort are being paralyzed, creative power impaired, and human happiness lessened; that the true prosperity of our past came not from big business, but through the courage, the energy, and the resourcefulness of small men; that only by releasing from corporate control the faculties of the unknown many, only by reopening to them the opportunities for leadership, can confidence in our future be restored and the existing misery be overcome.

Notice he says that "the true prosperity of our past came not from big business, but through the courage, the energy, and the resourcefulness of small men." What is proposed to be done with the small men? After these combines have made their code, if some gentleman, as an American citizen, desires to start his own business and conduct his own business in order to make a livelihood, they may not only force him with their economic power, but they may have him indicted as a criminal and send him to the penitentiary for pursuing his legitimate business in the United States. I declare that under this bill a condition could be brought about which would prevent a man from pursuing a legitimate business without the consent of the "combine", and if he did so he could be sent to jail.

The elder Rockefeller did not need any criminal law to aid him when he was building up his wealth. He destroyed the independents everywhere; he scattered them to the four winds; he concentrated his great power. But the Senator would not only give to the combines all the power to write their code, but would give them the power to indict and prosecute the man who violated the code, although he might be pursuing a perfectly legitimate business.

Mr. President, I do not care how much we strengthen, how much we build up, how much we buttress the antitrust law; I object to a suspension in any respect whatever, because I know that when those laws are suspended, we give these 200 nonbanking corporations, which control the great wealth of the United States, a stupendous power, which can never be controlled except through the criminal laws enforced by the courts.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator point out under what provision of this proposed act the small business man cannot meet in the industry and adopt a code?

Mr. BORAH. I am contending under this law the small man will and can be dominated by the larger interests.

Mr. WAGNER. They are all entitled to become members of the association and provide their code, a thing which they cannot do under the present law.

Mr. BORAH. Under the present law?

Mr. WAGNER. They cannot do it under the present law. They cannot meet for cooperative purposes to agree upon wages and hours of labor and these other practices. The law prevents them from meeting for these things. The result is that there are created these large industries, these large enterprises, about which the Senator complains, the very enterprises which have been created and which have survived under the law as it is today. We are trying to prevent the small business man from being frustrated in his attempts to secure equality.

Mr. BORAH. You are trying to give the small business man a chance against the large business man by taking off the large business man the Sherman antitrust law, which you can enforce if you desire to do so whenever he is operating in restraint of trade or practicing monopoly. It is not the small-business man who objects to the antitrust laws; it is not in his interests that you are suspending them. It is the large business interests which object to them and have sought their repeal for years. It is for big business that you are suspending these laws, and in doing so you are making it just that much more difficult for the small man to protect himself in these "combines."

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, or would he rather not?

Mr. BORAH. I am perfectly willing to yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the case of the American Column & Lumber Co. against the United States, where 365 small concerns, totaling 30 percent of the hardwood producers of the country were prevented from engaging in an "open competition plan." The Court ruled against them. Justice Brandeis wrote the dissenting opinion in that case, and he said this:

> May not these hardwood-lumber concerns, frustrated in their efforts to rationalize competition, be led to enter the inviting field of consolidation? And if they do, may not another huge trust with highly centralized control over vast resources—natural, manufacturing, and financial—become so powerful as to dominate competitors, wholesalers, retailers, consumers, employees, and in large measure the community?

That is just what happens under the law as it is today. These 365 smaller units of the industry could not meet for the purpose of providing an open competition plan, and the result is that the antitrust laws would tend to drive them into a combination. That is what we are trying to prevent.

Mr. BORAH. They could not meet for the purpose of trying to fix the price of lumber to be charged every home builder in the United States.

Mr. WAGNER. Oh, no.

Mr. BORAH. I am perfectly familiar with that decision, and I am perfectly familiar with the evidence which was taken in the case. The combination was fought for the reason that such a combination, nothwithstanding the professed objects of the combination, would have given those entering it control of every home builder, through the price they would charge for lumber to be used in the erection of buildings in the United States.

Mr. WAGNER. I have quoted from Justice Brandeis. He knew something about the facts in the case.

Mr. BORAH. I knew something about them, and I am not controverting Justice Brandeis' statement in any respect whatever. As the record was made for Justice Brandeis I am not controverting what he said; but I say, as Adam Smith once said long ago, "People of the same trade seldom meet together, even for merriment or diversion, but the conversation ends at last in a conspiracy against the public or in some contrivance to raise prices for the public." That is precisely what every trust seeks to do.

Mr. WAGNER. Is the Senator advocating the Adam Smith laissez-faire doctrine in this age? Is that what the Senator is doing?

Mr. BORAH. I am quoting him on a tendency of industrial power, and every page of industrial growth sustains the truth of his statement. The Senator knows that when the giant movers in a great industry meet together, even if they meet for the purpose of holding a dance, before they close their meeting they will talk over the question of whether they can raise the prices of their products. That is human nature. Now, you propose to suspend the law, and I ask, where in this bill is there any protection for the consumer? Where is there in this bill any protection for the man who has to pay the price?

Mr. WAGNER. The Government. That is the only place to which the consumer can ever come for protection.

Mr. BORAH. What government?

Mr. WAGNER. The United States Government—the President of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator means we may look to the President, not to the Government.

Mr. WAGNER. The President is the head of the Government.

Mr. BORAH. I am still sufficiently old-fashioned in my views to believe that there are two other departments of the Government besides the executive—the legislative, which abdicates, and the judiciary, which is disregarded in this bill.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator knows that we cannot ourselves exercise purely administrative power. We have to delegate those functions to someone.

Mr. BORAH. It is not the particular occupant of the White House to whom I am referring. I am making the contention that we should write the law ourselves. There is not an indication in this bill of what is fair competition. There is no rule laid down. Anything is fair competition which industry agrees upon and can get approved. There is not an indication of what rule should govern, either the people who formulate the combine or the President of the United States. We do not indicate what we desire in the way of fair competition. We lay down no rule for them to follow. We give them no code. When they meet they are to form their own idea of what is fair competition. The Congress of the United States is asked to abdicate. The bill furnishes no rule for the protection of the consumer, and it furnishes no rule even for the guidance of the President of the United States.

I ask the Senator, where is the rule in this bill which indicates what is fair competition, or who is to decide it, except the 200 nonbanking corporations of the United States which hold the wealth of the United States? The consumers of the United States must pay whatever they say is a proper price, under fair competition, and get by with it. We hold no check upon them. We provide that the man who violates the code may go to jail. But we lay down no rule for the violation of which the members can be sent to jail. We fail the little fellow who wants to go alone, but we put not one single restraint of criminal law upon those who will be interested in weakening a code which will enable them to get the last red cent from the consumer.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. REED. Necessarily the President must delegate his powers under this bill?

Mr. BORAH. That is provided for.

Mr. REED. Necessarily, then, he must select some person for the administration of each of these great industries. He will either get somebody from within the industry or somebody from the outside who is not experienced in the industry. Obviously he will take the first course, and that means in the steel business, for example, that a man who has spent his life in the steel business will be called upon to exercise the actual, final say about what is a fair price. Does the Senator think it is good policy to expose the consumer to any such system as that?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not. Let us suppose now that this bill is enacted, and all the different industries of the United States—the lumber industry, the drug industry, the steel industry, the shoe industry, the potato industry, and all the other industries in the United States—form their combines, form their codes, and submit them; do we suppose, for a moment, that the President of the United States, by any possibility, can go into the details of the thousand-and-odd business industries of the United States, upon a large scale, and himself pass upon them? We know that he is not going to do so; it is impossible for him to do so; he will delegate the authority to some individual; and we are now authorizing not the President of the United States but, as a practical proposition, we are authorizing some individual who may be selected for that place, or perhaps a dozen individuals, for there will be so many industries, to pass upon the question of fair competition, without any guide or direction from the lawmaking power of the United States as to what is fair competition. It is solely within the discretion of the industry and the particular individual who is called upon to pass on it; and, in my opinion, it is a most hazardous thing to do.

This is a huge, stupendous duty; no one man can perform it. The President cannot possibly attend to it. He must select an individual whom we do not know and for whom we furnish no rule nor law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. REED. Is the bill being read for committee amendments at this time, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course has been agreed to by unanimous consent, and the clerk will state the first committee amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, section 1, line 7, after the word "interstate", it is proposed to insert the words "and foreign", so as to make the clause read:

SECTION 1. A national emergency productive of widespread unemployment and disorganization of industry, which burdens interstate and foreign commerce, affects the public welfare, and undermines the standards of living of the American people, is hereby declared to exist.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McCARRAN. I desire to present an amendment to the bill and ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

REGULATIONS PERTAINING TO VETERANS' ALLOWANCES

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, on yesterday afternoon the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] introduced into the RECORD a statement relating to changes in the regulations having to do with compensation allowances for veterans of the World War and the Spanish-American War. Let me call to the attention of the Senate the fact that the Senator from Arkansas in no way guaranteed the accuracy of the statement. He did not reveal the source of the statement. The statement begins by saying that—

Important changes were made today by the President in regulations having to do with compensation allowances for veterans of the World War and the Spanish-American War. These changes were approved by the President by an Executive order which he signed.

Let the Senate notice that the Executive order which the President is alleged to have signed on yesterday was not introduced into the RECORD. It has not as yet been made public. This morning I called up the Veterans' Administration and attempted to obtain a copy of the order which the President is said to have signed, but the Veterans' Administration refused to give me a copy of it, on the ground that they had orders not to give it out to the public. Therefore——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Mr. REED. These regulations have the force of law, have they not?

Mr. CUTTING. Without having seen them, I so assume.

Mr. REED. Did the Veterans' Administration presume to deny a copy of that order to the Senator from New Mexico this morning?

Mr. CUTTING. That is correct.

May I quote now from the statement in the Baltimore Sun of this morning, which conveys more information than the Senate was furnished yesterday afternoon by the Senator from Arkansas. That quotation is as follows:

A statement issued from the White House after the President, Lewis W. Douglas, Director of the Budget, and Gen. Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, had been in conference described in general terms the effect of the order.

The order itself was not made public.

Mr. President, I called the attention of the Senate yesterday to the fact that the Governor of my State had attempted to secure information from the Veterans' Administration as to the number of men drawing compensation who were going to be cut from the rolls in order that he might carry out the necessary program for the relief of those men. The Governor of New Mexico was refused that information by the Veterans' Administration. The State of New Mexico is, in consequence, unable to tell what action need be taken to protect thousands of men who are liable to be thrown out of the hospitals on the 1st of July, men coming from every State in the Union, men who are not the special responsibility of the State of New Mexico, but whom we shall be glad to take care of if we can. We cannot get that information, and now, Mr. President, we cannot get information as to an Executive order which the President is said to have signed on yesterday.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. May I say to the Senator from New Mexico that the Executive orders to which he is now referring are in the Senate, having been transmitted today, but they have not been yet laid before the Senate.

Mr. CUTTING. Are they here at present?

Mr. GEORGE. They are at the desk. The President has sent them to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New Mexico yield in order to enable the Chair to lay before the Senate a communication relating to the subject?

Mr. CUTTING. I should certainly be very much interested to see a copy of those orders, as I have been trying to procure it all day.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Mexico will permit, I ask unanimous consent that the Executive orders may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

The message was read, and, with the accompanying copies of Executive orders, ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Congress:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 20, title I, of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, I am transmitting herewith a photostat copy of Executive Orders, No. 6156 (Veterans' Regulation 1 (a)), No. 6157 (Veterans' Regulation 3 (a)), No. 6158 (Veterans' Regulation 9 (a)), and No. 6159 (Veterans' Regulation 10 (a)), approved by me June 6, 1933, embodying amendments to veterans' regulations approved by me March 31, 1933, relating to veterans' relief. These veterans' regulations have been issued in accordance with the terms of title I of that law.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 7, 1933.

EXECUTIVE ORDER

VETERANS' REGULATION NO. 1 (A)—ENTITLEMENT TO PENSIONS

Whereas section 1, title I, of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", provides:

"SECTION 1. That, subject to such requirements and limitations as shall be contained in regulations to be issued by the President, and within the limits of appropriations made by Congress, the following classes of persons may be paid a pension: (a) Any person who served in the active military or naval service and who is disabled as a result of disease or injury or aggravation of a preexisting disease or injury incurred in line of duty in such service. (b) Any person who served in the active military or naval service during the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, or the World War, and who is permanently disabled as a result of injury or disease; Provided, That nothing contained in this title shall deny a pension to a Spanish-American War veteran past the age of 62 years entitled to a pension under existing law, but the President may reduce the rate of pension as he may deem proper. (c) The widow, child or children, dependent mother or father of any person who dies as a result of disease or injury incurred or aggravated in line of duty in the active military or naval service. (d) The widow and/or child of any deceased person who served in the active military or naval service during the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection. (e) For the purpose of subparagraph (b) of this section, the World War shall be deemed to have ended November 11, 1918."

Now, therefore, by virtue of the authority vested in me by said law, the following regulation is hereby promulgated canceling Veterans' Regulation No. 1 and substituting therefor Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), to read as follows:

PART I

PENSIONS TO VETERANS AND THE DEPENDENTS OF VETERANS FOR DISABILITY OR DEATH RESULTING FROM ACTIVE MILITARY OR NAVAL SERVICE DURING THE SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR, BOXER REBELLION, PHILIPPINE INSURRECTION, AND/OR THE WORLD WAR

I. (a) For disability resulting from personal injury or disease contracted in line of duty, or for aggravation of a preexisting injury or disease contracted or suffered in line of duty, when such disability was incurred in or aggravated by active military or naval service during an enlistment or employment entered into on or after April 21, 1898, and before August 13, 1898, where the injury or disease was incurred or aggravated prior to July 5, 1902; or during an enlistment or employment where there was actual participation in the Philippine insurrection on or after August 13, 1898, and before July 5, 1902: Provided, however, That if the person was serving with the United States military forces engaged in the hostilities in the Moro Province, the dates herein stated shall extend to July 15, 1903; or during an enlistment or employment where there was actual participation in the Boxer rebellion on or after June 20, 1900, and before May 13, 1901; or during an enlistment or employment entered into on or after April 6, 1917, and before November 12, 1918, where the disease or injury was incurred prior to July 2, 1921: Provided, however, If the person was serving with the United States military forces in Russia, the dates herein shall be extended to April 1, 1920; or where such disability was incurred in or aggravated by active military or naval service during an enlistment or employment where there was active service in the Spanish-American War, or actual participation in the Boxer rebellion, or Philippine insurrection, or active service in the World War during the dates specified, the United States will pay to any person thus disabled and who was honorably discharged a pension as hereinafter provided; but no pension shall be paid if the disability is the result of the person's own misconduct.

(b) That for the purposes of paragraph I (a) hereof, every person employed in the active military or naval service for 90 days or more shall be taken to have been in sound condition when examined, accepted, and enrolled for service, except as to defects, infirmities, or disorders noted at time of the examination, acceptance, and enrollment, or where evidence or medical judgment is such as to warrant a finding that the injury or disease existed prior to acceptance and enrollment.

(c) That for the purposes of paragraph I (a) hereof a chronic disease becoming manifest to a degree of 10 percent or more within 1 year from the date of separation from active service as set forth therein shall be considered to have been incurred in or aggravated by service as specified therein notwithstanding there is no record of evidence of such disease during the period of active service; provided, the person suffering from such disease served 90 days or more in the active service as specified therein; provided, however, that where there is affirmative evidence to the contrary, or evidence to establish that an intercurrent injury or disease which is a recognized cause of such chronic disease, has been suffered between the date of discharge and the onset of the chronic disease, or the disability is due to the person's own misconduct, service-connection will not be in order.

(d) That for the purposes of paragraph I (a) hereof a preexisting injury or disease will be considered to have been aggravated by active military service as provided for therein where there is an increase in disability during active service unless there is a specific finding that the increase in disability is due to the natural progress of the disease.

II. That for the purposes of part I, paragraph I (a) hereof, if the disability results from injury or disease—

(a) If and while the disability is rated 10 percent the monthly pension shall be $9.

(b) If and while the disability is rated 20 percent the monthly pension shall be $18.

(c) If and while the disability is rated 30 percent the monthly pension shall be $27.

(d) If and while the disability is rated 40 percent the monthly pension shall be $36.

(e) If and while the disability is rated 50 percent, the monthly pension shall be $45.

(f) If and while the disability is rated 60 percent, the monthly pension shall be $54.

(g) If and while the disability is rated 70 percent, the monthly pension shall be $63.

(h) If and while the disability is rated 80 percent the monthly pension shall be $72.

(i) If and while the disability is rated 90 percent the monthly pension shall be $81.

(j) If and while the disability is rated as total the monthly pension shall be $90.

(k) If the disabled person, as the result of service-incurred disability, has suffered the anatomical loss or the loss of the use of only 1 foot, or 1 hand, or 1 eye, the rate of pension provided in part I, paragraph II (a) to (j) shall be increased by $25 per month.

(l) If the disabled person, as the result of service-incurred disability, has suffered the anatomical loss or loss of use of both hands, or both feet, or of one hand and one foot, or is so helpless as to be in need of regular aid and attendance, the monthly pension shall be $150.

(m) If the disabled person, as the result of service-incurred disability, has suffered the anatomical loss or loss of use of both hands and one foot, or of both feet and one hand, or if the disabled person, as the result of service-incurred disability, is blind in both eyes, having only light perception, the monthly pension shall be $175.

(n) If the disabled person, as the result of service-incurred disability, is blind in both eyes, having only light perception, and has suffered the anatomical loss or loss of use of one hand or one foot, the monthly pension shall be $200.

(o) If the disabled person, as the result of service-incurred disability, has suffered the anatomical loss or loss of use as provided in subparagraphs (l) to (n), inclusive, of part I paragraph II of this regulation, and/or blindness in both eyes, having only light perception, which conditions under subparagraphs (l) to (n), inclusive, entitle him to two or more of the rates provided in those subparagraphs, no specified condition being considered twice in the determination, the monthly pension shall be $250.

III. That for the purposes of paragraph I hereof any person who on or after April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918, applied for enlistment or enrollment in the active military or naval forces and who was provisionally accepted and directed or ordered to report to a place for final acceptance into such military service, or who on or after April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918, was drafted, and after reporting pursuant to the call of his local draft board and prior to rejection, or who on or after April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918, after being called into the Federal service as a member of the National Guard, but before being enrolled for the Federal service suffered an injury or disease in line of duty and not the result of his own misconduct will be considered to have incurred such disability in active military or naval service during the period of the World War.

IV. The surviving widow, child, or children, and/or dependent mother or father of any deceased person who died as a result of injury or disease incurred in or aggravated by active military or naval service as provided for in part I, paragraph I hereof, shall be entitled to receive pension at the monthly rates specified next below:

Widow, but no child	$30
Widow and 1 child (with $6 for each additional child)	40
No widow, but 1 child	20
No widow, but 2 children (equally divided)	30
No widow, but 3 children (equally divided) (with $5 for each additional child; total amount to be equally divided)	40
Dependent mother or father, $20 (or both) each	15

The total pension payable under this paragraph shall not exceed $75. Where such benefits would otherwise exceed $75 the amount of $75 may be apportioned as the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs may prescribe.

PART II

PAYMENT OF PENSION FOR DISABILITY OR DEATH INCURRED DURING PEACE-TIME SERVICE

I. (a) For disability resulting from personal injury or disease contracted in line of duty or for aggravation of a preexisting injury or disease contracted or suffered in line of duty when such disability was incurred in or aggravated by active military or naval service other than in a period of war service, as provided in part I, the United States will pay to any person thus disabled and who was honorably discharged from such period of service in which such injury or disease was incurred, or preexisting injury or disease was aggravated, a pension as hereinafter provided, but no pension shall be paid if the disability is the result of the person's own misconduct.

(b) For the purposes of paragraph I (a) of part II hereof, every person employed in the active military or naval service for 6 months or more shall be taken to have been in sound condition when examined, accepted, and enrolled for service, except as to defects, infirmities, or disorders noted at time of the examination, acceptance, and enrollment, or where evidence or medical judgment is such as to warrant a finding that the disease or injury existed prior to acceptance and enrollment.

(c) Any veteran or the dependents of any deceased veteran otherwise entitled to pension under the provisions of part II of this regulation shall be entitled to receive the rate of pension provided in part I of this regulation, if the disability or death resulted from an injury received in line of duty in actual combat in a military expedition or military occupation.

II. For the purposes of part II, paragraph I (a), hereof, if the disability results from injury or disease:

(a) If and while the disability is rated 10 percent, the monthly pension shall be $6.

(b) If and while the disability is rated 20 percent the monthly pension shall be $9.

(c) If and while the disability is rated 30 percent the monthly pension shall be $13.

(d) If and while the disability is rated 40 percent the monthly pension shall be $18.

(e) If and while the disability is rated 50 percent the monthly pension shall be $22.

(f) If and while the disability is rated 60 percent the monthly pension shall be $27.

(g) If and while the disability is rated 70 percent the monthly pension shall be $31.

(h) If and while the disability is rated 80 percent the monthly pension shall be $36.

(i) If and while the disability is rated 90 percent the monthly pension shall be $40.

(j) If and while the disability is rated as total the monthly pension shall be $45.

(k) If the disabled person, as the result of service-incurred disability, has suffered the anatomical loss or the loss of the use of only 1 foot, or 1 hand, or 1 eye, the rate of pension provided in part II, paragraph II, (a) to (j), shall be increased by $12 per month.

(l) If the disabled person, as the result of service-incurred disability, has suffered the anatomical loss or loss of use of both hands, or of both feet, or of 1 hand and 1 foot, or is so helpless as to be in need of regular aid and attendance, the monthly pension shall be $75.

(m) If the disabled person, as the result of service-incurred disability, has suffered the anatomical loss or loss of use of both hands and 1 foot, or of both feet and 1 hand, or if the disabled person, as the result of service-incurred disability, is blind in both eyes, having only light perception, the monthly pension shall be $87.

(n) If the disabled person, as the result of service-incurred disability, is blind in both eyes, having only light perception, and has suffered the anatomical loss or loss of use of one hand or of one foot, the monthly pension shall be $100.

(o) If the disabled person, as the result of service-incurred disability, has suffered the anatomical loss or loss of use, as provided in subparagraphs (l) to (n), inclusive, of part I, paragraph II, of this regulation, and/or blindness in both eyes, having only light perception, which conditions under subparagraphs (l) to (n), inclusive, entitle him to two or more of the rates provided in those subparagraphs, no specified condition being considered twice in the determination, the monthly pension shall be $125.

III. The surviving widow, child, or children, and/or dependent mother or father of any deceased person who died as a result of injury or disease incurred in or aggravated by active military or naval service as provided for in part II, paragraph I hereof, shall be entitled to receive pension at the monthly rates specified next below:

Widow but no child	$22
Widow and 1 child (with $4 for each additional child)	30
No widow but 1 child	15
No widow but 2 children (equally divided)	22
No widow but 3 children (equally divided, with $3 for each additional child; total amount to be equally divided)	30
Dependent mother or father	15
Both mother and father (each)	11

The total pension payable under this paragraph shall not exceed $56. Where such benefits would otherwise exceed $56, the amount of $56 may be apportioned as the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs may prescribe.

PART III

PAYMENT OF PENSION FOR DISABILITIES OR DEATH NOT THE RESULT OF SERVICE

I. (a) Any person who served in the active military or naval service for a period of 90 days or more during either the Spanish-American War, the Boxer rebellion, the Philippine insurrection, or the World War, who is shown to have been in active service therein before the cessation of hostilities and to have been honorably discharged from such service shall be entitled to receive a pension for permanent total disability not the result of his misconduct and which is not shown to have been incurred in any period of military or naval service: Provided, that—

(b) To be entitled to pension under the terms of part III a veteran of either the Boxer rebellion or of the Philippine insurrection must be shown to have actually participated therein during his period of service.

(c) That for the purpose of paragraph I (a) hereof, the World War shall be deemed to have ended November 11, 1918, and the delimiting periods of the Spanish-American War, the Boxer rebellion, and the Philippine insurrection shall be as specified in part I.

(d) In determining the period of active service for the purpose of part III, it is not requisite that the 90 days' period of service shall have been completed before the cessation of hostilities. It is necessary, however, that a claimant hereunder shall have entered service prior to the cessation of hostilities and shall have served continuously thereafter for 90 days. A period of continuous active service for 90 days which commenced prior to, and extended into a period of hostilities as defined by part I, shall be considered as meeting the service requirements of part III.

(e) Except as provided in paragraph I (g) hereof, no pension shall be payable under part III for permanent disability less than total. A permanent total disability shall be taken to exist when there is present any impairment of mind or body which is sufficient to render it impossible for the average person to follow a substantially gainful occupation and where it is reasonably certain that such impairment will continue throughout the life of the disabled person. Notwithstanding this definition the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized to classify as permanent and total those diseases and disorders, the nature and extent of which, in his judgment, is such as to justify such a determination.

(f) The amount of pension payable under the terms of part III shall be $30 monthly, provided that—

(g) Any veteran of the Spanish-American War over 62 years of age, (1) who meets the other requirements of part III, or (2) who was on the pension rolls March 20, 1933, shall be entitled to receive a pension in the amount of $15 monthly, except that under (2), the pension being paid to the veteran on March 20, 1933, shall be continued in the same amount if it was less than $15 per month.

II. (a) Payment of pension provided by part III, except as provided in paragraph I (g), shall not be made to any unmarried person whose annual income exceeds $1,000, or to any married person or any person with minor children whose annual income exceeds $2,500.

(b) Whenever the income of any beneficiary to whom pension has been allowed under part III exceeds the amount specified in this paragraph, the award of pension shall be discontinued.

(c) Whenever it may be considered to be necessary for the purpose of this paragraph, the Veterans' Administration may require from any beneficiary under part III such information, proofs, or evidence as may be desired in order to determine the annual income of such beneficiary.

III. (a) The surviving widow and/or child or children of any deceased person who served in the active military or naval service during either the Spanish-American War, the Boxer rebellion, or the Philippine insurrection, and whose service therein was as defined by part III, paragraph I hereof, shall be entitled to receive a pension at the monthly rates specified next below:

Widow, but no child	$15
Widow and 1 child (with $3 monthly for each additional child)	20
No widow, but 1 child	12
No widow, but 2 children (equally divided)	15
No widow, but 3 children (equally divided) with $2 monthly for each additional child; total amount to be equally divided)	20

(b) The total pension payable under this paragraph shall not exceed $27 monthly. Where such benefits would otherwise exceed $27 monthly, the amount of $27 may be apportioned as the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs may prescribe.

PART IV

COMBINING OF PENSIONS

I. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to provide for the combination of ratings and to pay pension at the rates prescribed by Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), part I, to those veterans who had war-time service as defined in Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), paragraph I (a), and peace-time service as defined in part II, paragraph I (a) thereof, who have suffered disability in line of duty in each period of service.

II. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby further authorized and directed to provide that for the purpose of determining whether a veteran is suffering from permanent and total disability as defined in part III, Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), ratings for disabilities incurred in active military or naval service and in line of duty may be combined with ratings for disabilities which are not shown to have been incurred in active military or naval service: Provided, That in those cases in which the veteran, by virtue of the above provision, is found to be entitled to a pension under part III of Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), and is entitled to a pension under part I or part II of Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized and directed to pay to the veteran the greater benefit.

EXECUTIVE ORDER

VETERANS' REGULATION NO. 3 (a)—SCHEDULE FOR RATING DISABILITIES

Whereas section 3, title I, of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", provides:

"For each class of persons specified in subparagraphs (a) and (b) of section 1 of this title the President is hereby authorized to prescribe by regulation the minimum degrees of disability and such higher degrees of disability, if any, as in his judgment should be recognized and prescribe the rate of pension payable for each such degree of disability. In fixing rates of pensions for disability or death the President shall prescribe by regulation such differentiation as he may deem just and equitable, in the rates to be paid to veterans of different wars and/or their dependents and to be paid for—

"(a) Disabilities and deaths resulting from disease or injury incurred or aggravated in line of duty in war-time service;

"(b) Disabilities and deaths resulting from disease or injury incurred or aggravated in line of duty in peace-time service;

"(c) Disabilities and deaths not incurred in service."

Now, therefore, by virtue of the authority vested in me by said law, the following regulation is hereby promulgated, canceling Veterans' Regulation No. 3 and substituting therefor Veterans' Regulation No. 3 (a), to read as follows:

I. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to adopt and apply a schedule of ratings of reductions in earning capacity from specific injuries or combination of injuries. The ratings shall be based, as far as practicable, upon the average impairments of earning capacity resulting from such injuries in civil occupations. The schedule shall be constructed so as to provide 10 grades of disability, and no more, upon which payments of pension shall be based, namely, 10 percent, 20 percent, 30 percent, 40 percent, 50 percent, 60 percent, 70 percent, 80 percent, 90 percent, and total, 100 percent. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall from time to time readjust this schedule of ratings in accordance with experience.

II. In connection with the review directed by section 17 of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the schedule of ratings provided for herein shall not operate to reduce by more than 25 percent (exclusive of special statutory allowances) the payments being made to any veteran who on March 20, 1933, was properly rated on a permanent basis and who meets the requirements of Regulation No. 1, part I.

EXECUTIVE ORDER

VETERANS' REGULATION NO. 9 (A)—PAYMENT OF BURIAL EXPENSES OF DECEASED WAR VETERANS

Whereas section 17 title I, of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government" provides:

"That subject to such regulations as the President may prescribe, allowances may be granted for burial and funeral expenses and transportation of the bodies (including preparation of the bodies) of deceased veterans of any war to the places of burial thereof in the sum not to exceed $107 in any one case."

Now, therefore, by virtue of the authority vested in me by said law, the following regulation is hereby promulgated canceling Veterans' Regulation No. 9, and substituting Veterans' Regulation No. 9 (a), to read as follows:

I. Where an honorably discharged veteran of any war dies after discharge a flag to drape the casket shall be furnished in all cases, such flag to be given to the next of kin after burial of the veteran.

II. Where an honorably discharged veteran of any war dies after discharge, the Administrator, in his discretion and with due regard to the circumstances in each case, shall pay, for burial and funeral expenses and transportation of the body (including preparation of the body) to the place of burial, a sum not exceeding $75 to cover such items and to be paid to such person or persons as may be prescribed by the Administrator. Burial allowance, or any part thereof, authorized under this regulation shall not be payable if the veteran's net assets at the time of death, exclusive of debts and accrued pension, compensation, or insurance due at time of death, equal or exceed the sum of $1,000. The Administrator may, in his discretion, make contracts for burial and funeral services within the limits of the amount herein allowed without regard to the laws prescribing advertisement for proposals for supplies and services for the Veterans' Administration. No deduction shall be made from the sum allowed because of any contribution toward the burial and funeral (including transportation) which shall be made by a State, county, or other political subdivision, lodge, union, fraternal organization, society or beneficial organization, insurance company, workmen's compensation commission, State industrial accident board, or employer, but the aggregate of the sums allowed from all sources shall not exceed the actual cost of the burial and funeral (including transportation).

III. Where death occurs in a Veterans' Administration facility the Veterans' Administration will (a) assume the actual cost (not to exceed $75) of burial and funeral, and (b) transport the body to the place of residence or to the nearest national cemetery or such other place as the next of kin may direct where the expense is not greater than the ascertained cost of transportation to place of residence. Where the ascertained cost of transportation to a place directed by the next of kin exceeds the amount allowed in accordance with (b) hereof, such allowable amount shall be available for reimbursement purposes or partial payment in such manner as the Administrator may determine.

IV. Claims for reimbursement must be filed within 1 year subsequent to the date of death of the veteran. In the event the claimant's application is not complete at the time of original submission, the Veterans' Administration will notify the claimant of the evidence necessary to complete the application, and if such evidence is not received within 6 months of the date of the request therefor no allowance may be paid.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 6, 1933.

EXECUTIVE ORDER

VETERANS' REGULATION NO. 10 (A)—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Whereas section 4, title I, of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government" provides:

"The President shall prescribe by regulation (subject to the provisions of section 1 (e) of this title) the date of the beginning and of the termination of the period in each war subsequent to the Civil War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, service within which shall for the purposes of this act be deemed war-time service. The President shall further prescribe by regulation the required number of days of war or peace-time service for each class of veterans, the time limit on filing of claims for each class of veterans and their dependents, the nature and extent of proofs and presumptions for such different classes, and any other requirements as to entitlement as he shall deem equitable and just. The President, in establishing conditions precedent, may prescribe different requirements or conditions for the veterans of different wars and their dependents and may further subdivide the classes of persons as outlined in section 1 of this title and apply different requirements or conditions to such subdivisions."

Now, therefore, by virtue of the authority vested in me by said law, the following regulation is hereby promulgated amending Veterans' Regulation No. 10 as hereinafter provided:

1. Regulation No. 10, paragraph VI, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"VI. The term "child" shall mean a legitimate child or a child legally adopted, unmarried and under the age of 18 years, unless prior to reaching the age of 18 the child becomes or has become permanently incapable of self-support by reason of mental or physical defect, except that the payment of pension shall be further continued after the age of 18 years and until completion of education or training (but not after such child reaches the age of 21 years), to any child who is or may hereafter be pursuing a course of instruction at a school, college, academy, seminary, technical institute, or university, particularly designated by him and approved by the Administrator, which shall have agreed to report to the Administrator the termination of attendance of such child, and if any such institution of learning fails to make such report promptly, the approval shall be withdrawn."

2. Regulation No. 10, paragraph X, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"X. No person holding an office or position, appointive or elective, under the United States Government or the municipal government of the District of Columbia or under any corporation, the majority of the stock of which is owned by the United States, shall be paid a pension or emergency officers' retirement pay, so long as he continues to draw a salary from such employment, except (1) those receiving pension or emergency officers' retirement pay for disabilities incurred in combat with an enemy of the United States; (2) those persons so employed whose pension is protected by the provisions of the act; however, the rate of pension as to this class shall not exceed $6 per month; (3) those persons whose salary or compensation for service as such employee is in an amount not in excess of $50 per month; and (4) widows of veterans."

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 6, 1933.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the orders have now been made public, I shall refrain from further comment on the statement made yesterday until I have had an opportunity to study the regulations. Whenever regulations of this kind have been issued in the past there has been some "joker" in them which nullified completely the explanatory statements which have accompanied or preceded them.

I do not know, of course, what we may find in the regulations which will justify the statement put in the RECORD yesterday that the average deduction will approximate 18 percent; I cannot see any way by which any such provision as that can possibly be written into the regulations. I do think, however, that it is better policy to give out the regulations at once, as soon as they are issued, rather than to indulge in the practice of giving out a statement one day and transmitting the regulations a day later.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator whether when he inquired this morning of the Veterans' Administration, and requested a copy of the regulations, he was given any information then that they would be sent to the Senate today?

Mr. CUTTING. No; I was given no such information.

Mr. NORRIS. Was the Senator given any information as to when the regulations would be published, or anything of that kind?

Mr. CUTTING. I was given no such information whatever.

Mr. NORRIS. I would be interested to know, if the Senator feels that he has a right to repeat the conversation, which I assume probably took place over the telephone——

Mr. CUTTING. It took place over the telephone.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator have any information to give to the Senate as to the reasons, if any, which were given to him by the Veterans' Administration for not giving him a copy of the regulations?

Mr. CUTTING. The only information vouchsafed on that subject was that they had orders to that effect.

Mr. President, I should like to place in the RECORD a letter from the Governor of New Mexico to me, setting forth the reasons why he desired a list of the ex-service men in New Mexico who are drawing compensation, which list has been refused him by General Hines.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Santa Fe., N.Mex., June 1, 1933.

Hon. BRONSON CUTTING,
United States Senator, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CUTTING: Again replying to your recent telegram regarding the refusal of General Hines to furnish us with a list of the ex-service men who are drawing compensation in New Mexico and your request for further information, I beg to enclose herewith the following suggestions and 14 reasons why, in our opinion, we should secure the list of individuals who are receiving monetary benefits from the Government as a result of honorable service during various wars and conflicts:

1. We should know definitely who the beneficiaries were and where they live.

2. Approximately 85 percent will be discontinued entirely.

3. The remaining 15 percent will be reduced from 30 to 60 percent.

4. I estimate that one third of the 85 percent are not physically able to work.

5. Relief agencies are not conscious of the situation ahead of them and are not preparing for this additional burden.

6. As these beneficiaries have not heretofore been supported by charity, they will be very hesitant in seeking assistance, thereby neglecting themselves and families, which will result in malnutrition, causing undue physical distress.

7. Relief agencies should be furnished a list of veterans and their dependents who may require assistance, so that undue suffering and sickness may be kept to the minimum, as this would be the most economical course to follow and would be a general humanitarian act.

8. Many widows and orphans and remarried widows will be discontinued from the rolls in the 85 percent above mentioned. In the majority of cases they have no one to assist them, and special attention should be given this class.

9. County commissioners should be advised, so that additional funds can be made available for the actual necessities, including medical treatment that will be required.

10. Sparsely settled communities have many homesteaders who are totally dependent upon the benefits they have been receiving.

11. Property and monetary losses to the veterans should be determined.

12. The definite information that we would secure from an accurate survey should be used for the foundation of a definite recommendation to effect the proper changes in the Economy Act.

13. Appeals can be made providing they are presented within 6 months from date of notice and under no circumstances after January 1, 1934; therefore, immediate action should be taken on claims where it is found that they have grounds for appeal under the new regulations, further considered that in the event the appeal is won they are reinstated, effective the date the appeal is received and not the date of discontinuance.

14. New evidence in any claim now pending cannot under the circumstances be submitted after January 1, 1934. It is, therefore, not to exceed 7 months in which to secure this evidence.

I think it would be rather unfair and unjust to have an ex parte hearing as only the Government side would be represented unless we can secure these lists and make contact with our people, some of whom would not be able to know what it is all about, and these are the ex-service men whom we would like to contact so that we can present their claims in a fair and intelligent way. In many cases our people have no one to assist them, and I believe that special attention should be given to these cases. I, therefore, strongly urge that you make every effort possible to see that we get the lists, as it is our desire only to be of help to those who are deserving, and I can see no reason why the Government would not like to receive the benefit of our willingness to help in seeing that those who are deserving will not be cut off from their compensation.

With kindest and best wishes and hoping this finds you enjoying the very best of health and happiness, I am, as always,

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR SELIGMAN,
Governor.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, pending an analysis of the Executive orders which have been issued, I shall comment no further on that matter. However, I do wish briefly to call the attention of the Senate to a statement issued in connection with this subject by the National Economy League.

First, let me remind the Senate for a moment how far we have gone in about 10 days in the Senate. On Monday last the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], and several Members of the House of Representatives appealed to Congress to remain in session until the injustices which had been perpetrated by the Veterans' Administration could be modified. On Tuesday, in conjunction with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], I introduced a motion to suspend the rules in the consideration of the independent offices appropriation bill, in order to save veterans suffering from combat-connected disabilities from being cut more than 25 percent. At that time there did not seem to be the slightest chance that even such a moderate motion as that would receive any consideraion from the Senate.

On the following day I know that prominent members of the administration were calling up Senators to try to get them to vote against the amendment which I had proposed.

On Thursday the spokesmen of the administration on this floor agreed to accept the amendment which I had proposed, provided the Senate would stop at that and go no farther.

On Friday the Senate went much farther than I had originally suggested, and agreed to a motion to suspend the rules in order to consider a motion to restrict the President's power to cut veterans' compensation more than 15 percent. The Senate adopted that motion by a vote of about 3 to 1, and thereafter modified the proposal only by making it 25 percent instead of 15 percent and by including both the so-called "presumptive" cases and the veterans of the Spanish-American War.

I think the action of the Senate on last Friday one of the most honorable in its history. I hope now, after gaining such a victory and after taking action, the validity of which and the righteousness of which have not been challenged by any Member of this body, that we may not reverse ourselves or allow ourselves to be diverted from the goal toward which we so honorably set our faces on last Friday.

Mr. President, the channels of publicity have been set in motion against us. On Sunday night we heard from the President's private secretary. We now have the National Economy League making a statement. I have nothing against the members of the National Economy League; they are no doubt acting in good faith. I know most of the prominent members of that organization personally. They are honorable gentlemen, and many of them consider themselves idealists. It is very easy, Mr. President, when one is well off to be idealistic at the expense of someone who is suffering.

I quote from this morning's Washington Post:

If the bill is passed with the Connally amendment, the National Economy League asked that it be vetoed. The request was made in a telegram addressed to President Roosevelt by Gilbert G. Browne, chairman of the managing committee of the league.

"The principle that our citizens fight for country and not for pensions must be established", Mr. Browne said. "This is the time to clinch this principle."

Think of it, Mr. President! Think of the noble "principle" which is hereby held before the President of the United States for his guidance. Every Senator knows there were hundreds of thousands of men who made profits out of the World War, who became millionaires and multimillionaires as the result of that war. I am not criticizing those men. They no doubt had a right to make what profits they could. They are the men, on the whole, who are guiding the policies of the National Economy League. The "principle" which is held before us is a principle that these men should not be taxed in order to take care of the men who lost limbs and who lost health in the service of their country.

Mr. Browne says:

The principle that our citizens fight for country and not for pensions must be established.

In other words, he makes it appear as though the pensions were pay for the services which our veterans rendered the country. Those men were paid a dollar a day, or whatever it may have been. That was their pay. Nobody contends that the payments were not made. A pension or a compensation is supposed to compensate for the loss of limb or health suffered by reason of these men having been drafted or having volunteered to enter the service of the United States. These men were not fighting for a pension. This is not the time to "clinch" any such "principle" as that. No such principle has ever before been suggested. The "principle" for which these gentlemen are fighting is a principle that they do not care to be taxed any further in order that justice may be done to the defenders of the country.

I said yesterday, in response to an inquiry from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], that I had so far received no criticism whatever of the vote which was taken in the Senate on last Friday. This morning a large number of post cards began to come. I had expected them. None of them has come from my own State. Practically all of them have come from New York, at the Wall Street Station, or from Brooklyn or the nearby New Jersey suburbs. I read one which is interpretative and in character typical of the mass of them:

Your remarks regarding Howe's speech will cut your vote more than it will help. There are 10 times as many people who directly or indirectly pay taxes as there are veterans who demand your vote.

There is the principle. There is a great principle which is set before them: Let us stand by the taxpayers, 10 times as many in number, and let us desert these 250,000 or 300,000 veterans, whatever their number may be, who will soon be dead anyway, who are so weak and so helpless that they are not able to do very much for any Senator. Desert them and stand by the people who can deliver votes in 10 times the number.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am struck by a phrase on the post card from which the Senator read—that there are veterans in this connection who are "demanding" our votes. I have said before, and I want to say again, that I think the most striking thing about the reaction of the veterans of the country to the brutalities which were perpetrated in the rules and regulations under the Economy Act is the utter patience and tolerance with which they met the situation. I know of no organized propaganda which undertook to repeal the Economy Act or to amend it. I heard no political threats. I was not bombarded with organized demands from a selfish minority.

I have seen no evidence of anything of that nature. I heard only from individual veterans who asked for a review of their own individual cases in the belief that the Government order must have been a mistake. Yes; a tragic mistake. I am perfectly sure that the votes in the Senate which insisted upon partially retracing those steps were the result not of any demand of any nature except the sheer demand for simple justice as disclosed in case after case and in one legitimate battle casualty after another which no man could confront with a clear conscience and not undertake to cure. I think that was the only pressure put upon the Senate. We have not deserted economy. We have deserted ingratitude. We have not surrendered to a lobby. We have simply surendered to the proofs that the Economy Act has been administered contrary to every assurance given us when the Economy Act was passed, and with unconscionable results in tens of thousands of individual cases. I am firmly convinced that every American citizen in full possession of the full facts would agree to the justice of this action.

Mr. CUTTING. I agree entirely with the Senator from Michigan. I agree with every word he says. Yet the Senator knows that in every metropolitan newspaper the allegation is made that we have been overwhelmed by a vocal minority, by a so-called "veterans' lobby", by special interests who demand favors for themselves.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. A few moments ago the Senator referred to a statement inserted into the RECORD by request of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator stating that he had endeavored to secure a copy of the regulations and was unable to do so. I have taken the trouble to inquire why a Member of the Senate should not receive a copy of those regulations.

Mr. CUTTING. May I say before the Senator continues that within the last 30 seconds I have received a copy of the regulations?

Mr. BYRNES. May I say to the Senator, in fairness to the officials of the Veterans' Administration, that they advised me that the reason why they could not be made public yesterday is that the regulations in the afternoon went to the White House and from there had to go to the State Department, and were not received at the Veterans' Administration certified until after 7 o'clock last night, and before that time could not be given to the public?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me at that juncture?

Mr. CUTTING. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let me add to what has been said by the Senator from South Carolina that copies of the regulations themselves have not yet reached me. I have not seen them. I merely placed in the RECORD a statement or an analysis in the nature of a press release that was issued yesterday. I assume that the regulations, if they have not been made available, will be supplied in the very early future.

Mr. CUTTING. I want to assure the Senator from Arkansas that I made no criticism whatever of him for putting in the RECORD the statement he did. I was merely anxious to get the actual regulations.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I did not understand the Senator had made any criticism of my action in putting the regulations in the RECORD, but I was informed that while I was absent from the Chamber some mention had been made of the fact that I did not present the regulations and did not analyze the statement.

Mr. CUTTING. I was merely anxious to get the regulations; and as I have just received the copy for which I asked, I shall take time to consider them before I comment on them in detail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair state that a message from the President containing the Executive order has just come to the Senate and is now on the table?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The thing that to me seems amazing, I will say to the Senator, is that the President is quoted as saying that no injustice under his new regulations will be done to any deserving veterans. If he is correctly quoted, how he can make the statement with a clear conscience is beyond all understanding so far as I am able to see it. The Senator from New Mexico, interested deeply in this subject as I know him to be, knows full well that literally hundreds of disabled veterans have committed suicide and are dead and in their graves, while others have been thrown out of hospitals in the most ruthless manner, thrown out into the streets without being given even transportation to take them home. Talk about no injustice being done! The injustice that has been done is irreparable, and, of course, the Senator knows the only way justice can possibly be done to the disabled veterans who still remain alive is to repeal the whole indefensible so-called "Economy Act."

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I am trying to get what action we can to rectify as many of these instances of brutality as is possible. I do not care to engage in the task of assigning blame to various people. I think no one, least of all the President of the United States, would attempt to justify all the individual instances of hardship which have been perpetrated by the Bureau of the Budget and by the Veterans' Administration. I hope that when we read the new regulations, we shall find that they are susceptible of a better interpretation than I should imagine by reading the preliminary notices concerning them.

Mr. President, I do at least want to call to the attention of the Senate again what was so finely emphasized by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], that thus far no veterans' organization and no individual veterans have asked for anything but justice and decency and fair treatment, and that the only selfish appeals which have been made to us have come from the National Economy League and from people like Mr. Howe, secretary to the President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, my attention has just been called to a statement made by Mr. KVALE in the House yesterday—a very brief statement which I desire to read in the Senator's time, if he does not object.

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (reading):

> Regardless of where the responsibility may be placed and regardless of where the buck is passed, the statement that veterans will be taken care of does not apply to three veterans from my own State who have committed suicide and who are in their graves today as the result of the application of this Economy Act.

And may I state in my own language, Mr. President, that it should always be borne in mind that all of those affected, without a single exception, are disabled veterans.

Mr. CUTTING. Of course.

So far as I know, there has not even been any complaint about the so-called "disability allowance cases" which were cut off the rolls by the original act. Those were the cases against which the National Economy League was originally organized to protest. Some of them were in themselves deserving cases, but so far there has not come to my attention any effort on the part of anybody to restore those cases to the rolls. The only difference between the amendment as I originally drew it up and the amendment as it passed the Senate is the inclusion in it, first, of the Spanish-American veterans who cannot trace their disability to service connection on account of the lapse of time, and, second, the inclusion of the so-called "presumptive cases", which, in my judgment, include men who are suffering as deeply, and who deserve as much from their country as any other class of disabled veterans.

Insofar as those two classes are concerned, I sincerely hope that the Senate and the House will see that justice is done to them, and that justice is done not through regulation, whether regulation by the Bureau of the Budget or by the Veterans' Administration, but by action of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico further yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I call the Senator's attention to this further fact?

The action of the Senate was pilloried by the Presidential secretariat on the theory that it would involve $170,000,000 of new taxes upon the American people.

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And the entire action of the Senate was criticized on the basis of that prospective assessment. There seems to be nothing said, however, about new taxes to meet the sixty or seventy five million dollars which is to be necessary to meet the Presidential Executive order. I submit that at least we must now be absolved from $75,000,000 worth of new taxes, which the President evidently expects to absorb in some other fashion as a result of his own Executive order; and I suggest that the next time Colonel Howe speaks on the radio, instead of telling the American people that the Senate is going to cost them $1.25 apiece for veterans' allowances in addition to existing situations, he acknowledge the fact that Executive orders are already responsible for 40 cents apiece, which is just the initial confession that the Senate was at least a third right.

Mr. CUTTING. I agree with the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I do not hold any brief for Secretary Howe; but I insist that when Senators refer to him they refer to him as "the secretary", not "the secretariat." [Laughter.]

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I desire to express my approval of what the Senator from Michigan said, and, in addition, to call to the attention of the Senator the fact that practically every bill we have passed in a long time contains an appropriation, and that the argument never has been used with regard to any other piece of legislation that that particular thing, whether it be farm bill or home loan bill or whatever it may be, will add so and so much to the expense of every family, including the wife and the kiddies. Those arguments are used only when it is a question of doing justice to men who served their country. This argument which the National Economy League is trying to hold up as a "principle" is the most ignoble, the most disgraceful, that could be put before the people of this country. These men who are comfortable, who are living in luxury, have the effrontery to issue to the President of the United States a demand that he must establish the "principle" that men shall die in order that the members of this league may be saved a few taxes. It does not make any difference to them that the men who are to die are the men whom Congress picked to serve the country when it needed service. That does not concern these league members. We are confronted with a question of "principle", that service by itself is enough for those who serve, and that we must forever hereafter adopt the idea that men for whose injuries and for whose loss of health the United States is directly responsible should be left to take care of themselves on their beds of pain and anguish.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5755) to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes.

Mr. LONG and Mr. TRAMMELL addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator from Florida desire me to yield to him?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to make a few remarks on the subject which has just been discussed by other Senators.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator pardon me for a few minutes? I will yield the floor in a few minutes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. LONG addressed the Senate. After speaking for about 1 hour, he said:

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.
Ashurst	Cutting	Keyes	Russell
Austin	Dale	King	Schall
Bachman	Davis	La Follette	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LONG resumed his speech. After speaking for about 30 minutes, he said:

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Johnson	Reed

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LONG resumed and concluded his speech, which is as follows:

AGAINST WRECKING A PARTY

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, in line with what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has been saying, and also with regard to what the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] has just said, I wish to say that I had no opportunity, not being a member of the Finance Committee, to attend the hearings on the bill now under consideration, House bill 5755. I did not attend the meetings and I did not keep up with what was really going to be done in anything like a specific way, because one day the newspapers would give the idea that one thing was going to be done and then the next day that something else was going to be done.

We started out with the Black bill, providing for a 30-hour week. I understand that this bill is to take the place of the Black bill, and to do more.

The Black bill passed the Senate providing for 5 days a week of work, 6 hours a day. I was for that and the platform of the Democratic Party was in favor of that law.

The party platform, as the Senator from Idaho charges, and as I, one who was in the convention that voted for it, happened to know to be true, pledged the party not only to a strict enforcement but, wherever necessary, correction of the antitrust laws of this country to make them more stringent. We came along with the Black bill, carrying out the Democratic platform by letter and by title and by figures.

I was astounded because I never heard a word from the Democratic White House, as it is at this time, in favor of the Black bill, until one day we were told that the President of the United States had sent word down here to make that 36 hours instead of 30. Whether or not he sent that word I do not know, but that is what we were told around in the corridors. I do not remember anybody in particular who said it. But when the President of the United States sent word down here that he wanted that law lengthened by 6 hours a week, through a coalition of certain Republicans and those of us of the Democrats who felt that we ought to regard this party platform a little more sacredly, we voted down that suggestion, and kept the Black bill providing for 30 hours, as it was introduced.

The bill went out of this body in that way. The bill was opposed by some of the most prominent men on this side and on the other side of the Chamber, I admit. But it was the consensus of an overwhelming majority of the Democrats of this Chamber, and I believe of the Democrats of the United States, that such was a means of carrying out this party platform, and the promises of the President who ran on that platform and whom I heard promise to carry it out in a speech made at Boston, Mass., in the closing days of the campaign.

Mr. President, the Black bill went over to the House. We are told that it has been sidetracked. It is not going to come up. Instead of the Black bill they come in here with this composition as something to take the place of and do the same thing as the Black bill. As I said to the author of the Black bill in the Chamber this afternoon, you might as well have told a turkey to hatch out a turkey, and had it hatch out a rattlesnake, as to bring this thing in here and say that it is the same thing as the Black bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, if the only way we can get the promises of the Democratic Party carried out is to authorize the President of the United States to do such an infernal thing as he would be allowed to do in the first title of this bill, then, so far as I am concerned, we will wait for a performance of the Democratic Party platform until a more propitious time occurs.

Why, it has got to the point where we cannot pass a law. There is no longer any such thing as "Be it enacted by the Congress of the United States" that such-and-such a thing is the law. We have quit that. There is no such thing as that if a certain thing is declared by the Congress of the United States those letters and those figures and terms and words mean what they say. The only way we can do anything in this Congress is to authorize the President of the United States to suspend the Constitution of the United States and the antitrust laws and everything else that the people are living under and give him authority to do something.

I am about the last man on earth who would be willing to give anybody that kind of authority; but if I am going to give anybody that kind of authority, I am going first to inquire of him, "What did you do with the last trust that we imposed in you? What did you do with the bank law, in which we gave you dictatorial authority, except to freeze up $8,000,000,000 of bank deposits? What did you do with the reforestation sapling bill here except to purchase 200,000 sets of kits and pay, on a subordinate's order, $1.40 for something the Army refused to buy for 85 cents? What did you do with the veterans' compensation law that you told us was going to be administered in a nonpartisan, merciful manner, except to throw people out of the hospitals in their underclothes, men who had stood and served the purpose of stopping bullets across the seas and who had been afflicted with fatal diseases? What did you do with them, except to put them at the mercy of the world here, so that they are crying aloud now for a crust of bread or anything on God's earth?"

With that kind of examples of administration I would not vote to give these powers to anyone, and certainly will not vote to lodge them in the hands of anyone at this time until he has time to correct the maladjustments that already have prevailed under what we have already authorized here.

Evidently Senators have not read this bill. I had not read it until today, and that is not to be held against me. The bill was not printed until yesterday. I have been trying to read some of these Executive orders. They are laws, you know. Everyone is at least presumed to know the law. Even my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is presumed to have read all the laws, or to have had them read to him, every day; and I here am under the same presumption. I am presumed, when I go home at night, to know what the law is; and under the varied authorities we have granted to the President, and to the Secretary to the President, and to the secretary to the Secretary, and to the supervisors, and to the assistant supervisors, and to the secretary to the supervisors, and to the supervisors of the secretaries [laughter], I am presumed to know what those things are, every morning and every night. Therefore I have tried to keep myself from violating any penal provision of the law. Up to this time I have reached page 49 of the second resolution. I will probably be all summer reading the balance of that, provided they do not issue any more, but at this time I have only been able to read these regulations containing penal provisions about one half as fast as they have been issued. Therefore this bill, which was printed yesterday morning, I had no opportunity to read until today, 24 hours later, and I venture the assertion that I am one of the few Members of the Senate who has had an opportunity to read and to study some of the provisions of the bill.

I have probably paid more attention than some of my brothers of this senatorial organization because I had intended to offer an amendment to the bill at the proper place.

Let me read just a word. I have been in this business of making codes before in my lifetime. I remember the time when we went out to make a code for the oil business. I know how codes are made. Let me read a provision of this bill, starting on page 3:

The President may delegate any of his functions and powers under this title to such officers, agents, and employees as he may designate or appoint, and may establish an industrial planning and research agency to aid in carrying out his functions under this title.

The President of the United States not only can, but the chances are 999 to 1 that he will, have hundreds of thousands of agents, as this title says, combing literally the face of the earth, providing under just what kind of a condition corn can be sold on the market and at what price, and the same as to ground meat, figs, dried peaches, and everything else. Anything under the sun which may possibly be imagined as within the realm of manufacture or livelihood down to the lowest little thing will be placed under the tens and hundreds and thousands of agents, with the power to approve codes, with the power to promulgate those codes of one, two, two hundred, or a thousand pages, as laws, with the power to provide penal provisions to the effect that the failure of any man a thousand miles away to observe every part of the context will render him liable to be haled before a court and be sent to the penitentiary.

A code for what? The meat packers, we will say, have a code for sausage, just to take a little example. We buy link sausage from the meat packers. I use that just as an illustration. They prescribe that that sausage shall be manufactured with so much sage and so much cereal in it, with so many links, and weighing so many pounds, and then that it is to be sold at such and such a price. Some little old country woman grinding up hogs in the fall of the year who dares to use the ordinary process of making link sausage, and put a single pound of it on the market, or swap it with a neighbor for a sack of potatoes, would be violating the provisions of this proposed law, and be liable to arrest and imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. REED. This measure is not limited to manufacture; it applies to every variety of trade.

Mr. LONG. I know that.

Mr. REED. Practically everything a human being can do to earn a living.

Mr. LONG. I understand that. I understand that it covers every phase of human endeavor. I do not often agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania, but at least most of us believed, when we went north and tried to free Pennsylvania about 55 or 60 or 70 years ago, and failed to do it, and had them free us, that when we freed the black man it meant that slavery was a finished subject. Never did we think that the entire course of human endeavor would be relegated and subjected to a more concentrated form of despotism, a million times worse than that under which the black slave ever lived before he was freed in the sixties. Nothing to compare with it has even been heard of, and yet we sit here and talk about it. I say that we sit here and talk about it; I have not talked to a single man on the floor of the Senate who gave me the impression that he was enthusiastic at this kind of an outrage being perpetuated upon the backs of the American people.

Where is South Carolina when this kind of thing is proposed? Where are the sons of Texas? Where are the peoples who have gone through wars and scourges of war, that they will come here and pass a measure that will authorize the President of the United States to designate his secretaries, when they are not engaged in radio announcements and newspaper feature writing, to prescribe rules of conduct for everyone engaged in producing anything—and when I spoke of the activities of the President's secretaries I should have excepted the times when they were attempting to buy kit sets—where is the man who will come here and propose to put such power in the hands of anybody?

They are going to meet and prescribe a code. What does it mean when they prescribe a code? I hope I will not drive the Senator from Pennsylvania away from me, because I want to tell him just how these things ought to be done.

Mr. REED. The Senator so seldom agrees with me that I am impressed with the fact that he is agreeing now. I am wondering wherein I am wrong. [Laughter.]

Mr: LONG. I rather think the story between the Senator from Pennsylvania and myself is that of two kittens. It seems that kittens are a popular subject to talk about—not kits, but kittens.

We are told that when two cats were rowing over a piece of cheese, a monkey came up and offered to decide the matter so as to end the row. He broke the cheese into two parts, and placed one part on one side of the scales and another part on the other side. One part was heavier than the other, so the monkey picked up the heavier piece and bit off a piece of it and put it back on the scale. Then the other part was a little bit the heavier, so he picked up that piece and bit a chunk out of it and put it back on the scale. Then he found that the first part was the heavier, and he raised that piece and bit a chunk out of it. One of the cats said, "Hold on; never mind your regulating this row any more. You give me the littlest piece that is left." [Laughter.] I think the Senator from Pennsylvania and myself have reached the point where we can say, "Never mind anybody settling this row between us any more. You give us just the littlest piece left, and we will take this thing and go along with it." [Laughter.] I hope that answers the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Let me read this code provision. The President may delegate any of his functions and powers to anybody he wants to, and pay him a good sum of money for handling it.

Let me read what we are asked to delegate to him:

Upon the application to the President by one or more trade or industrial associations or groups—

What kind of groups they are to be, I do not know; and how they are to form them into groups, I cannot tell—the President may approve a code or codes—

In other words, the group can write out 14 codes and send them along. They ought to have plenty of codes, because they have lots of feature writers down there who have not contracts yet. They will need some more, and this will provide jobs for them all.

The President may approve a code or codes of fair competition for the trade or industry or subdivision thereof.

Mr. President, they will have more monarchs and submonarchs, more dictators, administrators, and supervisors, set up over the sundry and various industries, so that before we get through with the swine industry they will have a chief supervisor over it, and then they will have a man to regulate the ordinary side meat end of it, and one over the ham industry end of it, and then the mattress industry, which uses the hair end of it, and the glue industry end of it, and the sausage industry end of it. We will not be through with it then. We will have 25 different codes to be written up to regulate that kind of an industry and that kind of an occupation alone.

The President may approve a code or codes of fair competition for the trade or industry or subdivision thereof, represented by the applicant or applicants, if the President finds—

He is the man who is to find out. All these various and sundry things are put in, that the President is to find out whether no. 1 or no. 2 or no. 3 existed, and who is the man who decides whether or not he found that out or not? That is great protection to the American people! I therefore will dispense with the reading of what the President has to find out, because he is the only man who knows anything about what he finds out.

Provided, That where such code or codes affect the services and welfare of persons engaged in other steps of the economic process, nothing in this section shall deprive such persons of the right to be heard prior to approval by the President of such code or codes.

That does not mean that he has to be heard by the President, gentlemen of the Senate. That means that he has a right to be heard by somebody whom the President designates, that the person whom the President designates, designates who shall hear him.

The President may, as a condition of his approval of any such code, impose such conditions (including requirements for the making of reports and the keeping of accounts) for the protection of consumers, competitors, employees, and others, and in furtherance of the public interest, and may provide such exceptions to and exemptions from the provisions of such code, as the President in his discretion deems necessary to effectuate the policy herein declared.

Under that the President may prescribe a code, and then, if he wants to except somebody or to exempt something, he can do it. If he wants to say that from the month of June to the month of August it shall not apply in the South, I suppose he can do that. If he wants to say that it shall apply only to the man who happens to live up above a certain latitude and east of a certain longitude, he can do that. If he wants to say that the price that is fixed shall apply to one man and not apply to another, he can do that. We are asked to empower him by this title and by this measure to perform monstrosities which would never come within hailing distance of being incorporated in a law passed through the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, if there is a desire to do anything of this kind, why should not Congress do it? No; Congress cannot do it. Why cannot Congress do it? I will show why Congress cannot do it. It is because this is not what Congress promised to do through the Democratic platform, I say to those on this side. It is not what the Republican platform pledged the other side of this Chamber to do. I defy any man on the floor of the Senate or anywhere else to point out to me one letter, one word, one sentence, or one paragraph, which ever justified Congress in abdicating its functions and placing them in the hands of anyone else, instead of doing directly what the party had promised to do.

Mr. President, I defy any man on the floor of this House or the other one to show where we have ever justified our conduct so far as we have gone even up to this time in abdicating the functions of this Congress into the hands of someone else, as we did in the case of the veterans. We find distinguished Senators admitting to themselves and to others that they never would have voted for such measures as passed this Congress had they ever thought that those administering the laws were going to promulgate any such rules and regulations as came from their pens. I defy any man, I say, Mr. President, in the first place, to show where this Congress ever has been authorized to abdicate any such functions as that. That is not the only point I make.

Second, I call upon any Member of the Congress to show where there was ever a promise or a pronouncement made by the Democratic or by the Republican Party that they were going to do indirectly, directly, or otherwise, anything that in the remotest degree or to the least extent meant the waiving of the antitrust laws, the placing of industries under codes, directorships, administratorships, the subjection of 125,000,000 American citizens, white and black, to the ipsi dixit of secretaries and subsecretaries, negotiators and administrators in the conduct of affairs out of which they make a living.

I call upon anybody to show one single line, one single paragraph, one single sentence that ever justified or warned the people that they were voting to allow any such kind of thing to be done in this free country of America. Why is it here? Why am I faced with it? Why are such men as myself, who fought for a change in the administration of affairs in this country, having to fight here now, not for a change, Mr. President, but to keep from being done something that is twofold more obnoxious and destructive than anything which we fought to correct? We are not moving in the direction of the corrective that we fought for; we have gone the other course in empowering one man and his satelites and subordinates to do the thing which is here proposed. If it is going to be done, I would swap what we have got to get Herbert Hoover back tomorrow, and I would give some boot on the trade, if that is what is going to be done in America. Mr. President, before I would put that kind of thing on the American people I would vote tomorrow to get back what we had rather than pass an iniquitous thing of this kind and character.

I do not believe that the man whom we voted out of office would have had the power, if he had the effrontery, to have ever gotten this far with this kind of legislation. If the Congress is inspired from the White House, I do not believe he could ever have done it; I do not believe he would have had the courage to do it.

Here are 96 upstanding and distinguished Members of the United States Senate, presumed to know the law—and they do not. I say that with all charity [laughter], and I will take back everything I have said if a single Member of the Senate will hold up his hand and tell me he has read two thirds of the regulations that have been promulgated by the departments that carry with them penal provisions putting one in jail if he does not observe them. Let one man in the Senate hold up his hand and tell me he has read them! Yet we are voting to put everybody else in the penitentiary who has not read them. There are 96 upstanding Senators sent here from 48 southern, northern, eastern, and western States [laughter], and several of them have been sent here from the South.

Mr. President, what was the issue of the war of the sixties? One side was fighting for the freedom of humanity; the other side was fighting for State rights. We have had a new war since then, and we have lost both issues here in 1933. We have lost State rights. We not only have surrendered what the Union won in 1865, but we have, by such pernicious and abortive legislation as this, surrendered the freedom not only of the black but of the white people of the United States, and in a worse form than we ever heretofore thought would be possible.

I want to say, Mr. President, that I have tried hard to get along with this administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Can the Senator tell us what the trouble has been? [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. One trouble has been that the administration has been for too many things that the Senator from Pennsylvania stood for. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have wanted to cooperate. I voted for the bank bill on the first day of the present session of Congress, after trying to amend it and hoping that the administration would do what we wanted; but it has done everything else. When they brought the economy bill in here I would have swallowed that if I could, but I could not swallow it. So when they came in here with the reforestation bill I should have liked to have been for that, but I saw that it was a fallacy to go out and cut the veterans' compensation $400,000,000 and then turn around and pass a "sapling" bill and pay out $500,000,000 more; and then we talk about economy. We talk about being on the right road somewhere; we talk about carrying out a consistent policy to restore the national credit, and yet in one day we take $400,000,000 away from the soldiers who fought the Nation's wars, put them out of the hospitals, put their wives out to begging alms in order that they may feed their husbands lying sick in bed from wounds received in the service of their country. When I saw we were taking $400,000,000 from that kind of men and that kind of women, men who had fought on the battlefields, some of whom had bled and suffered grievous injuries for the benefit of their country, and then turning around the next day after having done that, under the guise of restoring the national credit, and taking $500,000,000 and sending men off to plant saplings, I realize, Mr. President, as everyone else could realize, that we were not on any consistent road going anywhere with that kind of legislation.

Then we are confronted a little bit later with this kind of a bill. All of the proposals which were suggested that I could support I did support; but, Mr. President, after we were told that we could not pass sound laws, we decided to try one ourselves. I do not know whether I am doing the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] a wrong, but, whether I am or not, I am going to tell the story. We have been of great service to this administration. Some of my colleagues who have given me rather kindly, smiling glances at some of the few things I have said may not know it, but there are more ways of feeding people than through the mouth. Science has developed methods of feeding so that some people are fed through the nose and others are fed through the arteries. The President of the United States was not for inflation. We pressed the Wheeler bill here. I introduced the Cross bill, and my colleague from Montana introduced the silver 16-to-1 bill, and, by a vote of 28 to 24, the Wheeler bill was voted for by the Democratic side of the Chamber. It was the votes of our kind friends on the other side that kept the Wheeler bill from becoming the expressed will of the Senate.

A few days later, Mr. President, the President of the United States saw the light as we had pictured it rather than as the light as the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] had pictured it. There is such a thing as feeding policies into the national administration, as we did in that particular case. The best thing that has been done, if anything has been done, was the announcement from the White House that we were going to have a conservative expansion of the currency in some way. But what did we get?

Mr. President, you do not know what the money of the United States is today or what it is going to be tomorrow morning. It is liable to be wood; it is liable to be zinc; it is liable to be wild honey. [Laughter.] You do not know what kind of money is going to be used in the United States tomorrow morning. If we had adopted the Wheeler bill, we would have known that gold and silver were going to be the only commodities called money in the United States. We tried to get that done, but we could not get enough votes to do it.

Then, the President comes along and says that he wants an inflation bill, authorizing him to inflate, whether by cuting down the gold or whether by using silver or whether by printing or by something else, and in order to get the kind of legislation that might make inflation possible, we had to vote for that kind of a bill or get nothing. Therefore, we have voted to make the President the absolute arbitrator, dictator, monarch, and anything else he can be called, over the issuance of money in the United States and over the value of money. One night we see a little note in the press that the Government is going to issue $200,000,000 worth of currency, and, lo and behold, the market goes down on the particular commodity that is affected by it and perhaps up on another commodity. In other words, he announces that so much silver is going to be issued, and tomorrow morning when the newspapers publish the statement it will send certain metals up and others down. Certain individuals who guess right go in on the stock exchange on that rumor and take advantage of the market.

The next morning the President announces that he is not going to do any such thing, and the market rebounds the other way, and if they are "in the know" they have sold out in the meantime and taken their cleaning out of the particular picture. In other words, on these rumors circulated in the newspapers, if a man happens to guess right, that the President of the United States is going to put out a billion dollars' worth of paper, he is in a pretty good position to play the market; but if the President changes his mind in the meantime and decides he is not going to put out the billion dollars of paper, nobody knows what is going to happen to a man unless he can guess right; but it affords a chance for manipulation up and down, up and down, up and down, 400 times, for every kind of market rigging and market manipulation that is known on this earth, because the law is liable to be one thing on Monday at 10 o'clock and something else at 11 o'clock; it is liable to be one thing tonight and something else tomorrow morning. Instead of the Congress deciding to inflate and pass such legislation as would put a congressional valuation upon money and the amount of money that is going to be issued, in order to get any chance whatever to have inflation, we have adopted the very worst course we could adopt.

(At this point Mr. LONG suggested the absence of a quorum, and the roll was called.)

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have marked certain passages in the Democratic platform that I want to read. This document was adopted only a few months ago. I want to show just how the pending bill not only violates every constitutional spirit that we have in the Government, but I want to show wherein it is most specifically condemned by the party platform. It is said in the Democratic national platform of 1932:

> We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance, to accomplish a saving of 25 percent.

We did not advocate a reduction of the veterans' compensation to save any money at all, but we did advocate doing away with numerous useless commissions. Have we abolished them? On the contrary, we are setting up by this bill alone many new commissions—there is no telling how many. I make the prediction that in this bill alone we are providing for setting up in the United States more commissions than we will ever abolish in the next 4 or 8 years, if we stay in office that long.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to suggest to the Senator, if he is entering into a discussion of ways in which the pending measure violates the Democratic Party platform, that he can find by an examination of every Democratic national platform for the last 40 years a specific declaration in favor of laws regulating trusts and monopolies in this country. The pending bill violates the provisions and declarations of every national platform adopted by the Democratic Party for the last 40 years.

Mr. LONG. I was coming to that. I am going to read that too. That was the next thing I had marked.

> We advocate—

Says the 1932 platform, as my friend from Missouri has stated—

> We advocate strengthening and impartial enforcement of the antitrust law.

Let me read the modern philosophy as this bill tries to expound it, and then let me read what the Democratic national platform says. I want to read them side by side. By the way, there is a song with a title like that. I want to read them side by side. I read from the bill first. Let me ask my friend from Missouri what is the specific provision in the bill doing away with the antitrust law?

Mr. CLARK. Section 5 at the top of page 9.

Mr. LONG. Oh, I have the wrong print of the bill evidently. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to admonish the occupants of the galleries that it is contrary to the rules of the Senate to make any expression of approval or disapproval. The rules will be enforced. The occupants of the galleries are here as guests of the Senate and must obey the rules. They must not make any expression of approval or disapproval.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, section 5 on page 9 of the reprinted bill covers the matter which I was about to mention, and provides:

> While this title is in effect (or in the case of a license, while section 4 (a) is in effect) and for 60 days thereafter, any code, agreement, or license approved, prescribed, or issued and in effect under this title, and any action complying with the provisions thereof taken during such period, shall be exempt from the provisions of the antitrust laws of the United States.

Anything that is prescribed in any of these codes or negotiations under one of these secretaries, subsecretaries, supervisors, or assistant supervisors, or subsupervisors, is exempt from the operation of the antitrust law, and yet the people of the United State saw us over in Chicago only a few months ago proclaim that "We advocate strengthening and impartial enforcement of the antitrust laws." Here we have gone before the people saying that we were not only going to enforce such antitrust laws as we have, but I, for one, introduced an amendment which was pending before the Judiciary Committee at the time, purporting to strengthen the antitrust laws. In line not only with what was the law, but in order to take care of such amendments as I and others at that time were advocating, the Democratic Party not only said we were not going to throw down the bars of the antitrust laws, but we were going to strengthen the antitrust laws of the United States and give them impartial enforcement. Here is what we said:

We advocate strengthening and impartial enforcement of the antitrust laws, to prevent monopoly and unfair trade practices, and revision thereof for the better protection of labor and the small producer and distributor.

That is not all we said. Did we say we were going to put the Government in the field of making clothes, manufacturing cotton, and put the Government into every livelihood in existence? No indeed. On the contrary, here is what we said:

We advocate the removal of the Government from all fields of private enterprise except where necessary to develop public works and natural resources in the common interest.

We pledged ourselves to get out of these businesses of a private character. We were not going to be in the clothing business. We were not going to be in the grocery business. We were not going to be in the sawmill business. We were not going to have this Government engage in any of the 14 or more different kinds of agricultural pursuits and the thousands of kinds of manufacturing pursuits and as many other kinds of maritime pursuits. We had pledged ourselves to get out of what we were in then and to keep the Government out, but instead of doing that we come along and say, notwithstanding we pledged ourselves to the enforcement and strengthening of the antitrust laws, notwithstanding the fact we pledged ourselves to get the Government out of private business, notwithstanding all that pledge, we are going to tear down the walls of the antitrust laws and let these people under sanction of the laws of the United States get together and make everything into a monopoly and put the people into pools governing their own private business, all under the sanction of the benevolent institutions and laws of the United States Government.

Every fault of socialism is found in this bill, without one of its virtues. Every crime of a monarchy is in here, without one of the things that would give it credit. It is a combination of everything that is impracticable and impossible under the socialistic system, and everything that has robbed us in disasters under the monarchical system. It is a combination of every evil that can possibly be imagined, worse than anything proposed under the soviet, because in this thing we go into the realms of the imaginary and the unknown.

You do not know what you are voting for. You have no more idea what you are voting for under this bill than what you are going to meet in the nighttime a thousand miles from your own doorsteps.

Why, it reminds me of the time when we used to leave a boy in the woods to hold the sack. We had a game up in my country. Every now and then some young man from the city would come out there and we would take him out snipe hunting. We would give him a sack and stand him up in the dark, and he would stand there with the sack, waiting for us to drive the snipe in, and if he stood there long enough he would be there until morning holding the sack, waiting for us to drive in the snipe.

Mr. President, you are taking the American people out here with a bill like this; you are standing them up in the solitary nighttime, and you are telling them, "Wait and see what I am going to drive in there." You have not even told them in the realms of imagination what this bill means.

If you had a bill here saying that for men in the textile industry the hours of labor should be 8 hours, then you would know what you were voting for.

If you had a bill here saying that in interstate commerce the hours of labor were going to be 6 hours a day, and 5 days a week, whether you were for it or not, you would at least know what you were voting for.

If you had a bill here saying that women should not work longer than 6 hours a day, you might not be in favor of that, but you would know what you were voting for.

If you had a bill here saying that children should not be employed in industry, you might not be in favor of it, but you would at least know what you were voting for.

Yet every one of those things is within the contemplation of this bill; and that does not even start to cover it, topside nor bottom.

You are voting for a bill vesting someone, and the appointees of someone, and their appointees, with the right to prescribe laws, rules, and regulations. You are vesting not only in them but in the supposed-to-be rulers of the particular line of trade then under consideration the right to adopt a code for approval that may be 1 page, 100 pages, or a thousand pages, and that becomes as sacred a law as anything that goes through Congress; and yet no man here knows what he is voting for. No man here, however learned he may be, however scholarly he may have proved himself to be on the floor of the Senate, knows what he is voting for today.

I believe that if there is anyone on this floor who has proved that he knows what has happened in the past it probably is the distinguished senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]; but when he reaches this bill, he has reached the point where, regardless of all he knows of what he has voted for in the past, he cannot begin to contemplate or to surmise, or to guess, or to imagine what he is voting for in the way of law for the future.

I am not going to indulge in any more blind voting. I have cast my last blind vote. I have been given eyes with which to see, and ears with which to hear; and I am not going to cast another infernal blind vote on the floor of the Senate. If the President of the United States has something that he wants to recommend for the good of the American people, let him tell us what it is, and we will pass on it. If he has anything that he thinks is going to be good for this country, then let him pull it out from under the barrel and let it out here, and let us see what it is, and we will pass on whether we will vote for it or not. But when he comes in here and says he thinks he may have something that he is going to discover that might be good for the American people, and says, "Now, vote for it, and see whether or not I can find it," I am going to wait until he finds out what it is before I am going to vote for it in this Congress.

I have had enough of that. A burnt child is afraid of the fire. I have had enough of that. If we have a Congress of the United States, let us have a Congress of the United States. If not, if you do not want a Congress, write out your resolution, and I will vote to adjourn it and abolish it, and go home with you. Let us quit. That is what we have done, anyway. Let us quit and get out of here. Let us not stay here and draw the people's money in order to legislate for them when we are not doing it. Let us get out of here. Let us be honest. Let us help to carry out the Democratic platform by abolishing all useless commissions. Here is one we can start with under this bill, Mr. President. We can start right here. If you are going to pass this law, the next thing to do, in order to carry out the provisions of the Democratic Party about abolishing useless commissions, is to get rid of this one right here.

Here is the place to start. Whenever you are going to empower the President of the United States to appoint somebody to annul the antitrust laws, then South Carolina has got through needing to have anybody sit in the United States Senate. Mississippi does not need anybody here. Louisiana does not need anybody.

Yes; we had a little bit more in the party platform. I do not know why we wrote this document. I was there when we wrote it, and I was there when we adopted it; and we fought over every one of these provisions, backward and forward. We fought over these letters and over these terms. We had fights over where we were going to put the commas. We fought over the "ifs" and the "ands", and we carried the fight right down on the floor of the convention, and we fought over them as though we thought we were doing something.

The only thing we had a right to do was to vote for the preacher and receive sacrament, and it did not amount to anything at all. All we had a right to do was to vote. We had a committee on the platform, and a committee on rules, and a committee on something else, and a committee on nominations. I was sitting in on one committee, and contesting before another committee, and offering a resolution before another committee, and running around like everybody else around there, thinking that whatever came out of there was going to be almost like it had fallen from the lips of some immortal personage; and, lo and behold, we come in here, after we have won a political campaign in which we said we were going to strengthen the antitrust laws, and in this bill we say we are going to do away with the antitrust laws.

There never has been anything ever heard of on the topside living face of the earth, ever since we have had national conventions and party government, like the Democratic Party coming in here with this kind of a bill to annul the party platform, and to put not only agriculture, not only industry, not only manufacturing, not only maritime works, but everything on the living face of the earth that a person could be engaged in under one hammer, to be decided on this kind of a flimsy pretext.

Put somebody back to work? Yes; you will put somebody back to work. You will have them all ready to go in the penitentiary under this thing. [Laughter.] They need not work. They will all have a steady job. It reminds me of the fellow who wrote a letter to a man who wrote a book, and said, "After reading your book I have got a steady job—No. 6,218, Leavenworth, Kans." [Laughter.]

That is all they will have to do, Mr. President. You will have everybody employed under this thing. There will be no more unemployment, because there will not be a man on the living face of the earth that will not be subject to go to the penitentiary 24 hours after you get this thing enacted. That is all you will have to do. Codes and rules and petitions and memorials are to be prescribed by the President and the Secretaries and the Assistant Secretaries and the supervisors and the administrators and the negotiators and the custodians, and you will have to run to the dictionary to find titles to give before you get through the operation of this bill. [Laughter.]

Talk about adjourning Congress! Let us adjourn now and give the people a break. Let us get away from here right now. Let us adjourn now, while the people have a chance to save themselves somehow, maybe, somewhere; I do not know. Let us adjourn before we put them under any such kind of a proposition as this bill contemplates.

Let me read a little bit more from this bill. I have not read much from it yet.

We get down here to administrative agencies. This bill is couched in rather simple language, Mr. President. I want to say that the words of the bill are very simple. I read an article yesterday which said that these articles were being written in simple words, because they were being used by the various and sundry agencies that were writing these laws as column writers for the newspapers; and by breaking the words up they would naturally get that much more. In other words, if they wrote in one of these feature stories the word "circumlocution", they would get only 50 cents; but if they wrote in there "in a roundabout way", they would get over $2 for the same words. [Laughter.] So, therefore, this bill comes out in simple language if it does not come out in anything else. You can tell that a Senator did not have much to do with it.

Now, we read from this epistle:

After the President shall have approved any such code—

That is one of these codes they are going to get up. Who is going to write and prescribe this code?

Some morning some man will go out and tack up on the blackboard, or they will send to some newspaper, or they will put up on some bulletin board:

Notice: All people engaged in the synthetic manufacture of cream cheese shall meet at such and such a place on the 15th day of so-and-so.

All right. There is a notice that everybody who has anything to do with cream cheese shall come in here. That is a manufactured commodity.

Then, a little bit later, they will put up another notice that will be put on the blackboard:

Notice: Everybody engaged in the business of manufacturing link sausage will meet at such-and-such a place.

All right. That is Code No. 2.

Another notice will be put up on the blackboard the next morning:

Notice: Everybody engaged in the business of manufacturing grits, grit products, or rice products, will meet at so-and-so.

And, Mr. President, in 30 days' time the ordinary 2-by-4 little man who wants to do anything at all to make a living will have more than 40 meetings that he will have to go to, if he is going to participate in prescribing a code for the conduct of his industry.

Why, the little old man that hauls wood when it rains, and maybe cuts wood when it rains, plants potatoes, plants cotton, plants soybeans, plants a little rice, sows a few acres of peanuts, goes out and works at odd times in a sawmill, cuts crossties 30 or 40 days out of the year when he has not anything else to do—and I used to do that kind of thing—that man will have to attend at least 35 or 40 conferences to prescribe a code, and he will not be able to do anything else in the whole year except attend conferences to prescribe codes.

Of course nobody is going to go to those code conferences. You know that, and all of us know that. Nobody is going to go to those conferences; and if they did go they would not know anything about it. They would not know any more about prescribing one of these codes than a hog does about a sidesaddle. [Laughter.] A few men will go in there, and they will have a code written up, and they will adopt a code. That code probably will be about as big as this book here, and they will have at the foot of it, "Anybody violating any rule or regulation contained in this code shall be punished by a fine and imprisonment at the rate of $40", or "$200", or "sent to the penitentiary for 2 years"; and in the case of some man or set of men, it does not make any difference who they want to punish; they can come along and find out where they did not have the proper content of meat or the proper content of cereal in their sausage, or they can find out that they worked too long, maybe, and fine them or send them to the penitentiary on account of it.

Take, for instance, the agricultural industry: In the wintertime we used to go out and kill the hogs that we raised in the woods from the mast that grew there, beechnuts, acorns, and things of that kind. We let the hogs run wild during the summertime, and in the wintertime we would go out and kill them. We would kill the fat ones, and we would mark the pigs. We might work all night and all day there in that particular line of industry, putting up the meat, grinding the meat, salting it down for the summertime, taking the bones out of the meat. Lo and behold, that is an industry that is going to be regulated by a code, the details of which will be 99 if not 100 percent written by the packing industry; and we will be in a condition, Mr. President, where not only will we fail to correct the conditions we are now suffering from, but they will be a million times worse.

At present we go and take a bushel of peanuts and swap it for a shoat, and the man who has no peanuts gets some peanuts, and the man needing meat gets some meat. We go out and take a bushel of peaches, and we go over across the lot, over to some neighbor a mile or so away, and he may not have any peaches, and we will swap those peaches in order to get something that he has.

We will take a horse and swap a horse, perhaps, for something else. As bad as conditions have been, the one thing that has made it possible for men in our section of the country to live has been that they can take a gallon of sirup over to their neighbor and swap it for a sack of rice.

Those are the ways in which we have to live down in my part of the country. We could not get any help from the Government, and we have lived from hand to mouth. But there is no man who ever passed through my part of the State of Louisiana who did not somehow or other find a place to sleep and something to eat. But all that is to be eliminated. A man has to get books and regulations from Washington. He will not be able to swap what he raises for something else. That will all be done away with. He will not be able to do anything except what is in accordance with the code approved here in Washington, and he dare not even go out the front door to take his breath for fear he will be likely to violate one of the many thousands of regulations contained in these codes which will be prescribed under the authority of law, the details and contents of which he is presumed to know at all hours of the day and night. I am not for that kind of a thing.

Mr. President, to show that I am not speaking out of turn and that I have not overpainted this picture one bit, I want to read just what the proposed law provides. I have not overpainted it—not a bit. I have not even let it approach the point where I could exaggerate what is being provided in this legislation. It is one time when a man could not exaggerate in specifying the possibilities of harm under a measure of this kind.

Listen to this:

> After the President shall have approved any such code, the provisions of such code shall be the standards of fair competition for such trade or industry or subdivision thereof. Any violation of such standards in any transaction in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce shall be deemed an unfair method of competition in commerce within the meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended.

A man will have to get hold of the Federal Trade Commission Act, and get that well in mind, though very few men in the Senate have a complete knowledge of it. But that is not half of it—that is only the smallest part. A man will have to take mandatory notice of the contents of these codes, and any violation of any one of these codes will be the same as though he had violated one of the provisions of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that it was admitted before the Finance Committee by the proponents of this measure, by the authors of it, in fact, that the term "interstate commerce" in this title practically means all commerce, because of the fact that intrastate commerce has no effect on interstate commerce, and therefore under the terms of the measure it would practically mean a dictatorship over intrastate commerce as well as interstate commerce.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I had understood that by the enlarged definition given to interstate commerce it practically included all human endeavor. As my friend from South Carolina used to say, that is the "genius behind this bill." The genius behind this bill is that everything we do in some way or other finds itself into the current of intrastate commerce; and if it ever reaches intrastate commerce, that is interstate commerce, and therefore everything one does is within the terms of this measure.

Mr. President, those who drew the bill did not stop with specifying just one little element for violation of which they could impose a fine. They went on and took another slap, by providing that anybody who violated the law should be punished. Let me read another provision:

> (f) When a code of fair competition has been approved or prescribed by the President under this title, any violation of any provision thereof in any transaction in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce shall be a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof an offender shall be fined not more than $500 for each offense, and each day such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense.

Mr. President, we produce sirup down in my section of the country. We plant cane down there. We manufacture sirup, and we sell that sirup all over the country, that is, all around the neighborhood. In the parish from which I come, by reason of a peculiar condition of the soil there, we produce a sirup the sweetness of which is equaled nowhere else in the whole world. [Laughter.] It bespeaks the spirit and disposition of the people coming from that climate. It is a peculiar thing that in the old parish of Winn, La., our sirup contains no impurity of any kind. There is no such thing as copper, or any corrosive content, in the sirup raised in that part of the country. It is such a good class of sirup that right on the ground the natives themselves pay as much as $2 a gallon for it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to say that for the sirup we raise in Maryland the natives frequently pay $3 a gallon. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I will not yield further. [Laughter.] I was attempting merely to illustrate my point. Let us take the Senator's State of Maryland or my State. We produce a sirup in Louisiana which we sell for $2 a gallon. Let us say that a man needs a sack of meal. There is not much money around that part of the country, maybe everybody is broke; but a man will go and buy a couple of bushels of meal for a bucket of sirup. The farmers will swap among themselves. Then the man who gets that meal will take it to the gin on Saturday. In connection with the gin there is in that part of the country a corn-grinding outfit, where they grind up corn and grits. We will take a bucket of sirup and swap the bucket of sirup for a couple of bushels of corn and take it to the gin and grind it up and come back with the meal. I wonder if the Senator from Tennessee, who is doing me the honor to listen to what I have to say, has ever gone to one of those gins?

Mr. McKELLAR. Many a time.

Mr. LONG. Then the Senator knows something I did not know he knew. We all go to these mills and grind up the corn. We swap the sirup.

According to this measure before us, we could not make that kind of a trade, because the sirup man would be under a code prescribed for sirup and the sugar man would be under a code prescribed for sugar. The sirup would have a price placed on it, and the sugar would have a price placed on it. The methods by which the sugar was made would have been prescribed by a code. There would be a fine if the product did not contain certain elements which the code found to be necessary in its manufacture, and a man would do well if he got his sirup made at all without having to go to jail. Then he could not market it, because the man who had corn would run into competition. He not only would have to comply with the regulations for the manufacture, but he would have to comply with the price-fixing regulations, and it would become a matter of almost impossible negotiation, under the varieties of codes we might reasonably anticipate would come through the enactment of this proposed measure.

> The President is authorized—

Mr. President, all these sections start off with the words, "The President is authorized." Hereafter I will eliminate the first 4 or 5 words when I read these sections. Just for the sake of brevity, I will eliminate hereafter reading the useless term, "The President is authorized" to do something. I read it now for the last time:

The President is authorized to enter into agreements with, and to approve voluntary agreements between and among, persons engaged in a trade or industry, labor organizations, and trade or industrial organizations, associations, or groups, relating to any trade or industry, if in his judgment—

They need not put in the "in his judgment." Let us wipe that out, because the President is the judge whether "in his judgement" there is or not.

If in his judgment such agreements will aid in effectuating the policy of this title with respect to transactions in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce, and will be consistent with the requirements of clause (2) of subsection (a) of section 3 for a code of fair competition.

(At this point Mr. LONG suggested the absence of a quorum, and the roll was called, following which Mr. LONG yielded to Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. BYRNES for the consideration of Senate Resolutions 97 and 93, which appear under the appropriate headings.)

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have wanted to see some of the provisions of the pending bill enacted. I am anxious to see the public-works feature of the bill enacted, though I think some modifications ought to be made to it; but, in principle, I should like to see a public-works program adopted. Again, however, I remind the Senate that in order to carry out this first proposal we are once more departing from our platform. I want to say, Mr. President, I am trying to keep within the terms of the party platform. I have not heard anybody contending at all that in suspending the antitrust laws we are not anything like standing still; even at the best we are not standing as near the antitrust law as we were. I understand, from all the documents I have read and all the debates I have ever heard, that the purpose of the antitrust law was to prevent the concentration of wealth into a few hands. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has brought that out; the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] has brought that out. The Senator from New York says to me that the law has not worked. No. Why? It has not worked because we made those whom the law was supposed to regulate the masters of the laws; because, Mr. President, everybody knows that we have been just as silent in the enforcement of that law as it is possible for a government to be. Not only that, but because when the Supreme Court of the United States put the rule of reason into the Standard Oil case we did not immediately call the Congress into session and provide by law that the rule of reason was not a part of the antitrust law.

Why did not the antitrust law work? The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] must evidently know. It is because the Supreme Court of the United States in five separate opinions had held that there was no such thing as a "rule of reason" under the common law written into the antitrust law, but that every restraint of trade was a violation of the antitrust law and punishable by fine and imprisonment.

But lo and behold, when that had been so interpreted time after time, there came along a national campaign and it was said that big, stalwart champions of the Republican Party had promised the financiers and industrial magnates of the East that they were going to modify the antitrust law. After the election had been held and Mr. Taft was elected President of the United States they came right here to the Congress and introduced a bill—when Mr. Taft was President, in 1910—and provided in that bill that there should be a common-law rule of reason in the antitrust law. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate in the year 1910 submitted a statement saying that in five decisions of the Supreme Court that Court had distinctly held that no such thing as a rule of reason should be in the law to weaken it, and the committee would not even report a bill out weakening the antitrust law by writing the rule of reason into it. But notwithstanding that decision, the Supreme Court of the United States was stacked and packed in order that a case might be taken before the United States Supreme Court to get it practically to nullify the best part of the antitrust law.

We had five decisions on the books rendered by the United States Supreme Court, each one of which had decided that there was no such thing as a rule of reason in the antitrust law; and yet with Congress refusing to amend the law on the ground that it would not write the rule of reason into the law in order to nullify the law, the Supreme Court of the United States in the Standard Oil Co. case wrote a little something to the effect that it had to be interpreted according to the rule of reason, and according to the rule of reason they held the United States Steel Corporation was not even a trust.

A few days after I became a Member of the Senate I introduced a bill providing that the Supreme-Court-made law on "the rule of reason" in the antitrust law should be wiped out, as it had been held by the United States Supreme Court theretofore that every restraint of trade would be prohibited by law of the United States. That bill has never come out of the committee up to this time. It died with the Seventy-second Congress. I had planned to introduce it again, but I saw it would be futile and that the best chance I would have would be to try to tack it on to some other measure that would come before the Senate, and to do that on the floor of the Senate. I have never yet found a propitious moment when I thought I would succeed, and that is why I have not introduced it in this session of the Congress.

That is what we ought to have done. The Democratic Party pledged itself to make the amendment that I proposed when it said it was in favor of strengthening the antitrust laws. But after all that we are told by my distinguished and learned colleague from New York [Mr. WAGNER], learned in the letter and learned in the spirit of the law, that the antitrust law has failed, and therefore we will take the bars down and we will have a soviet council prescribing the rules of conduct for the operation of each and every profession and trade, pursuit and livelihood that is known to any kind of region or section of the whole country. In doing that we will tear down the antitrust laws. We will permit the big man here to go into a combination with a big man over there, and they will decide how much they will pay for various commodities. They will not only decide how much they will pay for the raw materials, but they will decide how much they shall receive for them. The man at the bottom, who consumes, is entirely left out of the picture. He is subjected to codes, rules, and precepts, under which his business and livelihood are to be regulated. He cannot depart from any one of them which has Presidential approval, and therefore all such men are entirely lost sight of in this kind of legislation.

Somebody comes around here and says that this thing has the approval of certain people who are affiliated with the industry. I do not care if it has. It is said that it has the approval of some of the people who are working in the industry. This past Sunday, coming from New York, I was in conversation with certain men coming down here to advocate the passage of the bill. They told me of certain features they wanted to write into the measure, and I could see no reason why that should not be done. I had no idea that we were ever contemplating this kind of legislation. I had no idea in my mind that the Democratic administration was contempating anything of this kind.

This morning, when the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] walked over to me and asked me if I was in favor of the provisions of the bill, I told him I expected to support them, and upon his simply stating to me what the provisions of the bill were and of the title of which I am now speaking, I could not believe the Senator. I told him evidently he must be mistaken; that certainly there was no such legislation contemplated. I knew we had gone to awful lengths, but I had no idea the junior Senator from Virginia was correctly giving me the picture of what is contained in this title. But, lo and behold, when I read it I could not believe my eyes. I could not believe my eyes, that we would come here with such provisions as these written into a bill that is supposed to be a public works bill. If Senators want to shift hours of labor and keep production up with consumption, there is a way to do it without enacting into law any such monstrosity as this.

Things have come down to the point that if a man wants to be fed he has to sell himself into slavery. In other words, in order to get any distribution of the blessings of the Lord in the way they are made here by humanity, a man has to sell himself into a governmental slavery and into such other forms of slavery as were never before contemplated at all. We have been offered a slavery as a means by which we can get meat and bread to eat, and we do not even have a guaranty of the meat and bread even though we do become slaves. There was one good thing about the old slave system before the sixties, and that was that a man owning a slave had to feed him. A man was under obligation to feed and clothe his slaves. Under the proposal contained in this bill it is pretended that this is something that is going to make it possible to feed the American people, but there is not anything under the living sun in the form of guaranties except that we are asked to authorize the President to annul the antitrust laws and have a system of codes running the country. No longer are we to be regulated by a system of law, the Constitution and laws of the United States, the constitution and laws of the States of the United States. That is all to be wiped out. What we are having now is ipse dixit, codes, rules, negotiations, approvals, orders, booklets, pamphlets, and a thousand and one various and sundry things that are to be promulgated throughout the country and which are to stand instead of and above all the laws of the country and of the States.

What is to become of my State? Why, Mr. President, this law has in it something that our State government by its constitution restricted and prohibited the Governor and the legislature of the State from doing. We have not only been asked in this bill to abolish State rights, but lo and behold, we have provided authority in boards and in commissions and in administrative agencies, we have given into the hands of custodians and negotiators, we have landed the people in the hands of appointees, and in the hands of appointees of appointees, giving them authorities that are denied even to Governors and legislatures of the States, even within the confines of a State.

In the State of Louisiana there is a constitutional provision that the legislature of the State cannot prescribe certain laws affecting labor. That is in the constitution of my State and was one of the things I had to meet when I was Governor of the State. I had to bear in mind that there was a constitutional limitation to that effect. Yet we have decided here in this bill that we are going to let someone go into the absolute provinces of the States themselves and promulgate rules and codes and articles—from what and for what? Who knows? Who knows whether the board to which a man must make his plea will be in Washington or will be in the principal city of the State or will be located in every county of the State? If we are going to have any such thing as this for the law, it is going to be necessary that the public be made aware of the law and be made cognizant of the terms and provisions of the law. It is not going to be possible to have a law of this kind that is going to regulate every phase of livelihood and industry and agriculture and commerce and everything else, and not bring it to the attention of the people.

Who is going to make it possible to understand all these provisions and codes under which they are going to be working? That is what I call upon the United States Senate to decide. If a thing like this had been proposed in ordinary days, we would have hesitated many hours and days and weeks. I feel confident a thing of this kind would not have reached the front door of the committee in many months, even for respectable hearing or consideration. It would have been so obnoxious to the ears of any talented lawmaker that he would not have made the suggestion of approval in private, let alone in public. Never would a man have thought that in this day of Democratic power we would take advantage of the power placed in our hands by the people to set at naught not only all we had promised them, but the rules of order and fundamental regulations we have been respecting and adhering to long even before we adopted the Constitution of the United States, long before we ever heard or anyone else ever heard of or saw the Declaration of Independence promulgated in 1776. Long before that men believed they had the right to hew their living out of the ground and out of the forests of the country, and not to be under some potentate who set himself up above all law to determine whether that man had complied with a code of a certain kind.

I read further from this document some of the many things that we promised:

> We advocate a firm foreign policy * * *;
> International agreements for reduction of armaments * * *;
> We oppose cancelation of the debts owing to the United States by foreign nations;
> We advocate independence for the Philippines * * *;
> Simplification of legal procedure.

Do you know what you have done by this bill, Mr. President? The ordinary little man does not know anything about any United States court. You have given the United States court here jurisdiction to try every case that has ever been heard of in the realm of human activity. The ordinary little man who comes before the Federal court is scared to death. You indict the ordinary little old man, and take him a few hundred miles away from home, or 50 miles away from home, and stand him up in a Federal court before judges and district attorneys and United States marshals that he has never seen before, and he is scared out of his wits. He is in position almost to surrender everything he has.

I remember when first I was a lawyer, and went to try my first case in a United States court. Why, I felt like I was on foreign soil. I shivered in my boots, even as a lawyer, to go into a United States court. Yet here we are proposing to enact a law that puts it in the power of these little 2-by-4 potentates that are to administer it to go out and have the United States attorney hale a whole community before the United States court, and take them a hundred miles away from the place where they were born and reared, to be tried on these little, insignificant charges that are going to be lodged against them by the administration of an act that wipes out the antitrust law.

Why, it is an outrage to do a thing like that. Instead of conferring more jurisdiction upon these United States courts, we ought to be taking away some of the jurisdiction they have. These United States courts have been allowed to reach out and take over jurisdiction to try people for the most trifling offenses; and now we propose under this bill to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to a point where the man who is making sirup, or the woman who is packing a few little sausages, or the poor devil who is salting down a little meat, or the man who is starving and who takes a sack of rice and swaps it with somebody in order to get a few pounds of lard or a little meat—that kind of a man, Mr. President, who is not acquainted with all the pages and pamphlets and codes that are adopted by these monopolistic interests that come in under the approval of the Government to wipe out the antitrust laws, the man who does not offer his product for sale at the price at which they say it ought to be offered, the man who does not exchange it only for money, if they say so—that kind of a man, and his wife and his children, are to hold themselves every night and every day, without its being possible for them to know what is in the law, subject to arrest and to be tried before a Federal court hundreds of miles away from where they live!

Talk about tyranny! This is the most tyrannical law that I have ever seen proposed since I have been in the United States Congress. Talk about oligarchy or anarchy or monarchy or any other form of government! There has never been anything so detestable and so reprehensible as this measure that makes criminals out of practically the entire American people. Think of our standing here, on what is supposed to be a free day in the American Government, and voting for any such thing as this!

That is what we are complaining of here. I am trying to get up Democratic sentiment. I am trying to call back Democrats to the faith of the fathers and to our own promises.

INVESTIGATION BY BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE—EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY

During the delivery of Mr. LONG'S speech.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as is well known, the Committee on Banking and Currency is proceeding with the hearings being conducted, and the authority of the committee has been challenged in certain respects. A resolution has been prepared which I should like to have acted on now. I ask unanimous consent to submit the resolution at this time; and I further ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration, in order that we may proceed with the hearings in proper order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution, which will be read.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, just a moment. May I ask the Senator if the resolution provides that the committee may go into the tax returns of the gentlemen, members of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., who have been before the committee?

Mr. FLETCHER. The resolution gives the committee ample power.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, I think it ought to be adopted, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. FLETCHER. It gives the necessary power; but does not add very much to the authority we already have.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution may be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 97) submitted by Mr. FLETCHER, on behalf of himself and Mr. STEIWER, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, in addition to and supplementing the authority granted under Senate Resolution 84, Seventy-second Congress, agreed to March 4, 1932, and continued and supplemented by Senate Resolution 239, Seventy-second Congress, agreed to June 21, 1932; Senate Resolution 371, Seventy-second Congress, agreed to February 28, 1933; and Senate Resolution 56, Seventy-third Congress, agreed to April 4, 1933, shall have authority to investigate any transactions or activities relating to any sale, exchange, purchase, acquisition, borrowing, lending, financing, issuing, distributing, or other disposition of, or dealing in, securities or credit by any person, firm, partnership, company, association, corporation, or other entity, and/or any other acts or operations of any one or more of them or of agents, affiliates, or subsidiaries of any one or more of them or of any entity (corporate or otherwise) directly or indirectly controlled or influenced by any one or more of them, which may affect or bear upon, either directly or indirectly, any of the foregoing transactions or activities. Such investigation shall be made with a view to recommending necessary legislation under the taxing power or other Federal powers.

For the purpose of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, either in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, during the first session of the Seventy-third Congress or any recess thereof, and until the termination of the first regular session thereof, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance of such witnesses and the production and impounding of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the investigation authorized by this resolution shall be paid out of the sums heretofore or hereafter made available for the investigation authorized under Senate Resolution 84, Seventy-second Congress, as continued by the resolutions above specified and by this resolution. The authority conferred by Senate Resolution 84, Seventy-second Congress, as continued by such resolutions, shall extend until the termination of the first regular session of the Seventy-third Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, do I understand that the wording of the resolution gives the committee full authority to go into income-tax returns of anybody who has been before the committee or who may be called before it in the future?

Mr. FLETCHER. This resolution, together with the resolutions heretofore adopted, gives such authority.

Mr. DILL. I heard no mention in the reading of the resolution of authority to go into income-tax matters.

Mr. FLETCHER. The resolution, including the authority which the committee now have, is broad enough to cover all that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. Just a moment. Do the resolutions already adopted give the committee authority to go into income-tax returns of any person or firm who may be called before the committee?

Mr. FLETCHER. There is a joint resolution, as the Senator will remember, giving the committee the power to go into income-tax matters.

Mr. DILL. But there is some question as to whether the committee have that authority, and I have heard nothing in the resolution that gives the committee any greater authority than it now possesses.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think there is no question that the committee have the authority; but in the joint resolution provision is made that hearings and examinations must be in executive session. That is one of the limitations of that resolution.

Mr. DILL. Does the pending resolution remove that limitation?

Mr. FLETCHER. It does not absolutely remove it, but we think we can get at the facts under the pending resolution which will lead to a thorough understanding of the situation.

Mr. DILL. Why should there be any doubt about it? There ought not to be any doubt under the pending resolution as to the authority.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is what we are trying to cover by the resolution.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida will yield for a moment, it will be recalled that under the income tax law income-tax returns may not be made public except under certain circumstances and by certain agencies. The committees of the Congress have the power to examine into income-tax returns, but a resolution of the Senate cannot repeal the law with reference to them. All we seek in this resolution, is to get the authority to examine witnesses with respect to their income taxes, but it is not contemplated that the income-tax returns themselves shall be made public, because we cannot do that under the law by simply adopting a resolution of the Senate.

Mr. DILL. I heard no reference to the income-tax returns in the resolution as it was read, and that is why I asked the question.

Mr. FLETCHER. The reference in the resolution to the exercise of the taxing power, I think, covers it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. It seems to me, from the proof that has already been adduced before the committee, that unless the committee shall have the right to force witnesses appearing before it who have not paid income taxes in the last 2 years to divulge the facts concerning those income taxes, the whole examination will be abortive and of no use to the American people.

Mr. FLETCHER. We will be able to develop the facts so that we will know exactly what the situation is. We cannot expose the income-tax return. Under the law that can only be done in executive session by special committees under a joint resolution known as No. 42, Seventy-second Congress, but we will be able to get at the facts; and those facts will enable the Department of Justice and Internal Revenue Bureau to proceed as may be required.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is now after 5 o'clock; a number of Senators have left the Chamber to care for correspondence in their offices and to attend to other public matters. This resolution has not been printed; no opportunity has been given to any Member of the Senate to read it. It has been my uniform practice, under such circumstances, to object to immediate consideration. That has no connection with any consideration of the merits of the resolution. Conformably, Mr. President, to my judgment and the practice which I think is a fair one, I shall have to object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, let me appeal to the Senator with this statement: We are now in the midst of this hearing and about to conclude a certain phase of it. We will meet tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock; probably tomorrow will be the only available day we will have ahead of us; and it is very important that we secure this authority.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I should like to accommodate the Senator as well as my colleague from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] in the matter. The resolution may be very important; but it is also important that Members of the Senate have an opportunity to study such resolutions as this and to be present when they are considered. I have told several Members of the Senate that in my judgment there would be no business transacted this afternoon; I feel the necessity of preserving the rights of those who are absent from the Chamber with that understanding; I cannot yield my view in the matter; and therefore I shall have to persist in my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BYRNES subsequently, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which Senate Resolution 97 was referred, reported it without amendment, and it was ordered to be placed on the calendar.

ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR INVESTIGATION BY BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE

Mr. BYRNES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 93, providing funds for the continuance of the investigation being conducted by the Committee on Banking and Currency. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration, if the Senator from Oregon does not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S.Res. 93) submitted by Mr. COSTIGAN June 6, 1933, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the limit of expenditures under S.Res. 84, Seventy-second Congress, agreed to March 4, 1932, to investigate the practice of "short selling" of listed securities upon stock exchanges and its effect on actual values, as continued in force by S.Res. 239, Seventy-second Congress, agreed to June 21, 1932, and further continued in force by S.Res. 371, Seventy-second Congress, agreed to February 28, 1933, and as supplemented by S.Res. 56, Seventy-third Congress, agreed to April 4, 1933, is hereby increased by $100,000.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not understand the nature of the request of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. I am asking unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution just reported by me, which provides funds for a continuance of the investigation now being conducted by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. McNARY. Can we not take up both resolutions in order tomorrow or next day?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the resolution does not involve the investigation that has been ordered, except insofar as it provides additional necessary funds.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not speaking for myself personally in regard to this matter, but I think we owe something to those who have left the Chamber under the impression that no business of this kind would be transacted. We have the unfinished business before us, and no notice has been given of the transaction of any other kind of business. As I said a few moments ago, it is after 5 o'clock. A number of Senators are absent, and I do not think we should depart from the consideration of the unfinished business. Therefore I must object.

Mr. BYRNES. I made the request because it has been the custom to give notice about resolutions of this character.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the resolution will be placed on the calendar.

WORLD TRADE BARRIERS IN RELATION TO AMERICAN AGRICULTURE

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to Senate Resolution 280, Seventy-second Congress, a report prepared by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics pertaining to restrictions upon international trade in major agricultural products throughout the world, the measures taken by various countries in aid of agriculture, and the effect of these restrictions and measures upon American farmers, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5755) to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes.

Mr. LONG (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p.m.). Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until tomorrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not do that. I think we ought to go on.

Mr. LONG. I think we ought to adjourn, then. I am going to call for a quorum a little later on. An adjournment is going to be necessary if we do not have a quorum. Senators will have to come in here and listen to me. I am not going to spend my time and my effort trying to tell the Members of the Senate what I know about this bill and not be listened to. If they go home, I am going to call for a quorum and have an adjournment.

I want to be listened to. I think what I am saying here is valuable. If Senators do not come in and stay around here, we are going to have to adjourn, and then I will come back here and tell them about this bill tomorrow.

I will proceed for a few minutes if the Senator from New York insists, but I want him to make Senators come in here and listen to me.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I should like to assist the Senator in any way I can.

Mr. LONG. All right. I will give the Senator a little time to make Senators stay around here.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator from Louisiana has a very fair audience.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I think it is better that we knock off for the afternoon. [Laughter.] I am hoping that the Senator in charge of the bill will see fit to do that.

There is a part of this measure which I have not had the time to digest as thoroughly as I wanted to. I had hoped that we could get together and strike out this iniquitous part of the bill known as "title I." It is practically impossible, Mr. President, for me to get into my mind the impression that a serious effort will be made tomorrow, after Senators have had a night to sleep over this bill, to carry title I into the bill. I know that the committee itself did not want it in the bill, from what I have understood, to start with.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator whether he will agree that we shall vote tomorrow at 11 o'clock on a motion which he may make to strike title I from the bill?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that it is my intention, at the proper time, to make a motion to strike out title I, as I did in the committee; but it does seem to me that the perfecting amendments ought to be offered and acted on before the motion to strike out is made.

Mr. HARRISON. I think so, too. That is why I asked about a unanimous-consent agreement; but I wish we could get along on this measure in an orderly way. Of course, I do not want to restrict the Senator with his speech, and could not if I wanted to; but I wish he would proceed, so that we can get up these committee amendments and conclude the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I have no disposition to delay the consideration of the committee amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. I appreciate that.

Mr. CLARK. I do think, however, that the other amendments should be considered before the motion to strike out the title is considered.

Mr. HARRISON. I made that suggestion only in order to come to a vote on the proposition, and to let us travel along. I think it is more orderly. That is why I secured unanimous consent that the Senate committee amendments should be disposed of first, but I hope we can proceed.

Mr. LONG. After we get through with title I can we not then consider amendments to title I, and move to strike it out, and do the same thing with the rest of the bill, title by title?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; after the committee amendments are finished, then any other individual amendments will be in order.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, that being the case, I think I have about concluded my remarks on this title at this stage of the game. I do not think I would have much more to say on it, because we can come back and take up this matter later; but I know that there are other Senators who want to be heard on this matter. Under those circumstances, does the Senator intend to suggest a recess at this time?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I should like to finish the committee amendments as far as possible, because I imagine the real fight on this bill will be on the motion to strike out title I, or on the motion to strike out the licensing features of title I. Those were the major questions that were before the committee. If we can dispose of some of the committee amendments, so that we will have done something today with the bill, then we can proceed along the line suggested by the Senator tomorrow morning.

Mr. LONG. I suggest that we wait and take up the bill tomorrow, because practically everyone has gone away from here this afternoon. Let us just pause where we are now. Tomorrow morning we can come back here and take up the committee amendments; and then, after we get through with that, we will go forward with our motion to strike out title I.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me suggest to the able Senator from Mississippi that I could not consent to any unanimous-consent agreement involving a set time for voting on any problem or any provision or any title of the bill, nor could I consent to a limitation of debate.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have not made any motion. It was merely a suggestion that I hoped we might get together, so that we might get along with the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Let me suggest to the Senator that when the Senator from Louisiana has concluded his remarks we recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. REED. Could not that be made 11 o'clock, Mr. President?

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent now that when the Senate concludes its session today it recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, make it 11 o'clock. All of us are overwhelmed with mail.

Mr. HARRISON. I realize that all of us are overwhelmed with mail and that the Committee on Finance has been working night and day to try to expedite the consideration of the bill and get it before the Senate; but it is contemplated by the Senator from Arkansas—a contemplation that we think can be realized—that we can adjourn Saturday night, provided we can get through with the consideration of this bill by tomorrow night, because some other matters must be disposed of before we adjourn if we are going to adjourn Saturday night.

I know what a difficult task everyone has had. I know what a hard session of Congress we have had. I know that everybody is anxious for Congress to adjourn as soon as we can get through with the program, and this bill is a part of the program. We cannot adjourn until at least we have expressed ourselves on it.

Therefore I sincerely hope everyone will try to cooperate in the matter of bringing these difficult questions to a vote so that we will know what the expression of the Senate is, and get through with the bill by tomorrow night. Then, in all probability, we can adjourn by Saturday night.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I will say that I have wanted to vote on all these matters as quickly as we could; but one great trouble here is that we have given so little consideration to some of our votes, as was proved here the other day, when we passed, by almost a 2 to 1 vote, a measure to undo a good deal of the Economy Act. We have acted entirely too fast on the various measures; we have not given consideration to what we have done; and we are about to barter away the liberties of the American people in haste with this bill.

I am anxious to have the Senate thoroughly consider what they are doing here; and that is one of the reasons why I have spoken today at the length I have. I am willing for the Senate to vote any time they want to, provided I think the Senate understand what they are voting for. We all have our committee work to do. We have our correspondence to answer. We have many things to do. Realizing that, I am hoping the provisions of this bill will be known before we vote on it.

Many Senators have been to me today since this discussion started, particularly since the speech of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and told me they could not understand how we could keep title I in this bill. In view of that fact, I have strongly hoped that the Senators in charge of this legislation, after thinking over the matter tonight and seeing the shoals into which we are about to land, would come here with some kind of a proposition to take title I out of this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator that the gentlemen who are in charge of the bill have been working night and day considering the matter? We think we know what is in the bill. The House of Representatives considered this matter, and, by a vote of 5 to 1, kept title I in the bill. The President and his advisers have been considering the matter, not for weeks but for 2 months' time, and they know what is in the bill.

The representatives of labor who appeared before the committee know what is in the bill, and they have approved the bill. Representatives of the great industries of the country, and of the trade organizations, came before the committee, and they approved the bill. Of course, I have no fault to find with those who do not want to support this or that part of the bill; they have a perfect right to do as they please about that. But the Senate ought to express itself within a reasonable time, and we ought to assume that each Member of the Senate has given consideration to these propositions.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that when the Senator from Louisiana shall have concluded his statement we take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow, and that at the same time the Senator give notice that if we do not make sufficient progress we will have a night session tomorrow, so that Senators will have notice.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon suggested to me earlier in the day that we take a recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. I did, but several Senators on this side thought that was a little bit early.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, if we are to get consideration of and action on the bill, if we are not to prolong this special session of Congress indefinitely, those who desire to see the legislation disposed of must pursue a course that will bring about that result. Is it proposed that we recess now?

Mr. McNARY. At the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest that the recess be until 10 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope that when we do recess we can recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow. Was not that the order, or was there objection made to that request?

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Pennsylvania suggested 11 o'clock. I am willing, and I think the Senator from Pennsylvania is willing, to agree that we meet at 10 o'clock.

Mr. REED. I shall not object.

Mr. HARRISON. I renew the request that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana we take a recess until 10 o'clock. I understood that was the arrangement had with the Senator from Oregon, that we should meet at 10 o'clock.

Mr. McNARY. I agreed to that; but several Senators on this side thought that was a little too early.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURPHY in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Louisiana that there are a number of committee amendments which might be disposed of without prejudice to any important controversy, and I think we might proceed with the consideration of some of them this evening.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understood we had entered into a unanimous-consent agreement to take a recess.

Mr. HARRISON. We have agreed that when we do take a recess we will recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is no agreement to recess at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Louisiana and to Senators generally that there is one amendment about which there will be controversy; that is the one relating to the oil regulation. I would not want to have that taken up this evening. With that exception, however, I am sure there will be no controversy about the other committee amendments to title I; and if we could get those out of the way tonight, we would have made some progress.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, there is going to be a great deal of controversy about the amendment providing for an embargo.

Mr. HARRISON. I had forgotten that was in the first title. Of course, that ought to be passed over. If there should be controversy about any amendment as it was read, we could pass it over until tomorrow; but it would not take very much time to get action on most of them.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I shall be glad to facilitate the matter in any way I can. However, several Senators who have already left the Chamber apprised me of the fact that they expected to speak on some of these amendments. I assumed we were going to take a recess at 5 or 5:30, as we have been doing, and I should not like to have the Senate go ahead and consider any of the amendments in the absence of the Senators to whom I have referred. If we come back tomorrow at 10 o'clock, I think that will be as far as we ought to go. That will be 2 hours ahead of our regular meeting time. I was hoping that at that time we might take up the resolution of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to appropriate money enough to enlarge the powers of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency so that they could go on with the Morgan inquiry. Did I not understand the Senator from Oregon to ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of my remarks we take a recess?

Mr. McNARY. I had in mind that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana we would recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow. At the same time I offered the suggestion to the Senator from Mississippi, having the bill in charge, that he notify Members of the Senate in advance that probably we would have a night session if we did not make sufficient progress.

Mr. HARRISON. I make the statement now that it is contemplated that if the consideration of the bill is not concluded by tomorrow evening, we will have a night session, and I hope that those Senators who have made other arrangements will rearrange their engagements so that they can be here tomorrow night.

Mr. LONG. Then if I care to conclude at this time, might we not recess, so that there would be no disappointment to Senators who have left?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has concluded his remarks, as I understand?

Mr. LONG. I have if we are to have a recess now. I thought we had that understanding, that if I concluded my remarks, we would take a recess. That is why I was willing to agree to a recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not contemplate going on tomorrow, as I understand, unless he might have something to say on some particular amendment?

Mr. LONG. No; I do not anticipate speaking again.

VETERANS' COMPENSATION—THE CONNALLY AMENDMENT

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from today's New York Journal of Commerce, expressing approval of what is known as "the Connally amendment" to the Economy Act.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Editorial from the New York Journal of Commerce, June 7, 1933]

MAKING ECONOMY HATEFUL

The controversy over the action of the Senate in voting to limit pension cuts in case of veterans with service-connected injuries has given rise to a great deal of violent and misleading comment on this whole subject. A reading of the prolonged, able, and restrained debate that preceded enactment of the Connally amendment ought to set at rest alarmist predictions that the entire economy program of the administration is about to be sabotaged by Congress unless the President resists this unwarranted assault upon his authority. The fact is that the amendment which has passed the Senate was voted in response to protests that came from people with just grievances. Senators cited many attested cases in which helpless men, seriously disabled, had been made the victims of Executive orders administered in accordance with hard and fast rules. If the Senate had not acted, would the officials connected with the Veterans' Administration be as willing as they now are to admit that errors of judgment have been made? Would they show the same readiness to revise the harsh rulings that have resulted in passage of the Connally amendment?

If economy is to be effective and sustained, it is very important that it should not be made hateful to the average citizen. Senator VANDENBERG summed up the view of a large number of his colleagues when he said: "The worst service that could be rendered to permanent, sound, rational economy in behalf of the Treasury of the United States at this moment would be to allow contemporary outrages to stand without correction, because if we do not correct them, we will find an outraged public opinion which will sweep all the economy program off the statute books the next time the issue arises."

There is certainly nothing unreasonable in voting to limit to 25 percent the permissible pension cuts applicable to service-disabled veterans and Spanish War veterans (most of whom would be unable to establish the service origin of their disabilities). Senator CONNALLY asserts that under the regulations that have been issued, more than half the Spanish War veterans would go off the rolls entirely, and most of the others get only $6 per month. Does the country want to economize at the expense of this particular group of elderly men and their dependents by subjecting them to such drastic cuts?

Many of the World War service-connected cases, protected under the Senate amendment, are undoubtedly suffering from disabilities related remotely, or not at all, to active service. Nevertheless, a wrong done to the taxpayer in the past will not be righted by subjecting disabled men to the hazards of arbitrary Executive redetermination of their pensionable status. The taxpayer, furthermore, will not be relieved, if helpless pensioners are thrown upon the charity of local relief agencies. In the interests of a permanent economy program, such as Senator VANDENBERG emphasizes, to say nothing of human elements involved, it seems wise to give this special group of service-connected men the benefit of the doubt and not completely destroy expectations created by the ill-advised action of the Government itself.

The public needs to be reminded, too, that the economy bill did not specify any definite amount which was to be saved by reducing pensions; it was merely estimated that about $400,000,000 could be obtained by passage of the measure. Possibly Congressmen closed their eyes at the time to what that sum meant translated into actual cuts; but they are now filled with a realizing sense of what has been done, and have acted accordingly in view of the special circumstances. The greatest evil of the veterans' legislation lay in the constant increase in non-service-connected beneficiaries and the certainty that the numbers of pensioners would be constantly augmented for years to come. That danger has been met by the vigorous action taken by the President, and the veteran groups that thought they could control Congress have been given a salutary lesson.

In view of the major long-time gains to which we can look forward, an increase in current appropriations for pensions should be accepted philosophically, given reasonable restrictions. Either the Connally amendment, which still leaves a large amount of discretion to the Executive, or some alternative compromise proposal acceptable both to the President and to Congress would provide a proper solution of the present conflict. An additional expenditure of $170,000,000, more or less, is unfortunate, but it is absurd to talk as if it would jeopardize the financial stability of a Government that is preparing to expend several billions on nonproductive public works and hundreds of millions more on direct relief.

IRRATIONAL BUDGET MAKING

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain excerpts from an address by the noted educator, Glenn Frank, president of the University of Wisconsin, before the Department of Superintendence of the National Education Association, entitled "'Irrational Budget Making' Scored"

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The sword that hangs over education and the other social enterprises of government is the sword of imperative retrenchment forged in the fires of an irrational depression. The peril lies not so much in the existence of the sword as in the way we wield it.

That economy, drastic beyond anything we have been accustomed to think of, is imperative in the conduct of local, State, and National affairs no intelligent man will question. Since 1929 our income has gone steadily down, and outgo has gone steadily up in its relation to income. The expenditures of local, State, and National Government, when related to the toboggan slide, down which the national income has raced, have bent the back of the American people. Either the back must be strengthened or the burden must be lightened, for a nation cannot long endure a consistently falling income and a consistently rising outgo.

It is confessedly a critical situation that confronts us. In 1931 Americans were putting slightly less than one out of every four dollars of the national income into the enterprise and obligations of local, State, and National Government. When the books of 1932 are fully balanced, we shall probably find that at least one out of every three dollars of the national income went into the enterprises and obligations of government. According to the analysis of the National Industrial Conference Board, in 1928 approximately 11 percent of the national income went into taxes, whereas in 1932, it was estimated some months ago, some 33 percent of the national income went into taxes to carry the enterprise and obligations of government.

There are those who would have us believe that this dramatic rise of the tax draft on national income from 11 to 33 percent in 4 years is due solely to an unintelligent and unjustified, a wasteful and worthless development of the public services of organized Government. That lie must be nailed at the outset unless public thinking on the scientific, social, and educational enterprises of government is to be gravely muddled and grossly misled.

The man in the street, hearing of this rise in the tax rate on national income from 11 to 33 percent in 4 years, is all too likely to think that the cost of the public services of Government has trebled in that time. Obviously this is not true. Had the national income remained steady at the 1928 level, the tax draft on national income for last year would probably have stood at not more than 18 percent instead of 33 percent, even if all the extraordinary expenditures incurred by depression had been in the picture. The factor that lifted the tax draft on the national income to 33 percent was the dramatic drop in the national income owing to the economic muddling that landed us in depression.

I am quite aware that this does not remove the stubborn fact that a 33-percent tax draft on national income is a serious matter with which political, social, and economic leadership must wrestle. It does suggest, however, that the blame for the large proportion of the national income now going into taxes cannot justly be placed upon the shoulders of social and educational leadership, but must, to a very material degree, be placed squarely upon the shoulders of the economic leadership that proved incapable of steering our economic ship past the shoals of depression.

And now this very leadership that has done most to unbalance the Nation's life is insisting that we shall balance the Nation's Budget by plunging a sword to the heart of all those scientific, social, and educational enterprises to which alone we can look to produce a leadership for the future that will be less inept, a leadership that might conceivably use this magnificent machine economy of ours to free the race from drudgery, poverty, and insecurity instead of letting it starve like Midas in the midst of plenty. I, for one, protest the current attempt to make educational leadership the scapegoat for the sins of economic leadership.

Unless this fact is kept clear we shall see an uninterrupted increase in a propaganda that will, with insulting scorn, brand even the most self-sacrificing public servants as greedy and grasping pay rollers. This now popular propaganda, if persisted in, will divert men of capacity and self-respect from public service for a generation to come. And it will be our children who will pay the price of this diversion.

* * * * * * *

Now, there are three popular assumptions respecting Federal finances being sedulously cultivated by certain groups: First, the assumption that the present Federal deficit threatens the Federal credit; second, that the Federal Budget must be balanced at once; and third, that new taxes must be levied and drastic retrenchment effected in order to save the Federal credit.

I think there is a good deal of hokum in all three of these assumptions. I hesitate to run counter to the counsel of the Baruchs and the Traylors and like business leaders who, in testimony before the Senate's clinic on economic dislocation, have contended that the road to recovery can be charted on a calling card with the succinct sentence: "Balance the Budget." But I ask very modestly, is the counsel as realistic as it sounds?

* * * * * * *

How do those who insist that the Federal deficit today threatens the Federal credit and that drastic alterations in tax policy and social expenditures must be made in order to preserve the Federal credit compute the deficit they are talking about, and what does the deficit they talk about really represent?

As anyone who has made even the most elementary studies of the financial situation knows, there are two popular methods of arriving at the Federal deficit, used by many of those acting upon the three assumptions I have just listed.

One method is by noting the rise or fall of the gross Federal debt from year to year. Another method is by noting the cash condition of the Federal Government on a given date by the simple grocery-store daybook method of checking expenditures against receipts.

Now, granting the technical accuracy of the figures used in statements resting on these two notations, I submit that they do not necessarily give a true picture of the financial status of the Government, and let me indicate why such figures standing alone do not.

First, take the matter of the gross Federal debt: The cold figures on the gross Federal debt for the 2¼-year period ending last fall were as follows: On June 30, 1930, the gross Federal debt stood at $16,185,000,000. Two and one-quarter years later, on September 30, 1932, the gross Federal debt stood at $20,611,000,000. These figures indicated a deficiency of $4,426,000,000 or about 4.4 billions. But this cannot be taken as an accurate index of the situation unless we examine two related sets of facts. First, what were the purposes for which this debt increase was incurred? Were they purposes that should logically be financed out of current income? What were the number and nature of Federal assets that might offset that deficiency?

Let me mention only one offsetting asset to those figures that many of the budgetary Jeremiahs ignore. When the gross Federal debt, in the summer of 1930, was some $16,000,000,000, the net balance in the general fund was only $319,000,000. But when the gross Federal debt in the fall of 1932 was some $20,000,000,000, the net balance in the general fund had risen to $862,000,000. In other words, with the offset of the balance in the general fund alone, the asserted deficiency of $4,426,000,000 drops to $3,883,000,000, or a drop from 4.4 billions to 3.8 billions, a difference of $543,000,000, more than one half billion.

It is by ignoring such factors (and I use only this one by way of illustration) that an apparent deficit which is far beyond a true deficit can be put up by certain business men to scare legislatures and congresses.

* * * * * * *

But these variations, due to obscure or obsolete Federal bookkeeping, are not the important considerations. The important consideration is whether or not there are included in an asserted deficit, expenditures for purposes which a far-sighted government should not, in a period of depression, seek to finance by current taxation, by bleeding white the basic services of government, or by withholding valid public works that might at least soften the tragic impact of unemployment.

The deficit that is said by some to be threatening the Government credit and shaking business confidence does include several such expenditures, expenditures that in my judgment should not be covered now either by a serious rise in taxes or by a serious retrenchment in productive Government expenditures.

Some of such expenditures that enter into the existing deficit are as follows: (1) Public debt retirements of the last 2 or 3 years; (2) Federal loans and investments, such as the half-billion-dollar purchase of Reconstruction Finance Corporation stock in 1932; (3) capital outlays, such as the approximately one third billion dollars of public construction in 1931 and in 1932. We shall, in my judgment, deepen the depression if, following the lead of those who think all our ills begin and end in the Federal Budget, we insist that all expenditures of this sort be lumped with the ordinary expenditures of the current services of government and the total impact be absorbed by a serious rise in taxes and a serious retrenchment in those basic services which alone have made government a stabilizing and creative force.

It is my sober judgment, ladies and gentlemen, that the Federal credit can be kept sound if as a people we keep our heads and refuse to be rushed by a budgetary hysteria into a wrecking of the scientific, social, and economic services that are the very beating heart of constructive government.

It is the part of political wisdom, it seems to me, to spread the load of depressions out over a more prosperous period. Otherwise, relatively speaking, whenever a serious retardation hits us, we must wreck, in a few years of depression, values and services that will take us a generation to recreate.

Balance the Budget out of current revenues with respect to ordinary expenses? Yes. With respect to extraordinary expenditures, loans, investments, capital outlay, emergency relief, and the like? No. They should be financed out of borrowings and met out of the revenues of a more prosperous time.

If now we stop extraordinary expenditures for public work and go recreant to our relief responsibilities, or if we insist upon paying for them out of seriously increased taxes, we shall surely deepen and prolong this depression. And if now we cut the heart out of the basic services of government, we shall in preventing a financial deficit, produce a social deficit for which our children and our grandchildren will damn us.

Do not misunderstand me. Upon the imperative necessity for economy in public expenditures there can be no disagreement. I insist only that the situation challenges us to effect that economy with statesmanlike foresight for the future of community, State, and Nation. It is possible to be quite as short-sighted in administering economy as in allowing extravagance. And just because there is this possibility of short-sightedness in the administration of necessary economy, a grave national danger lurks in our current concern with economy. We can so easily economize blindly or let limited interests dictate the schedules of retrenchment. We dare not be gullible. Alongside the foresight, intelligence, and sincerity behind the insistence that we establish a sounder relation between our income and our outgo, there is much blindness, blundering, self-interest, and sheer insincerity in the almost hysterical campaign against public expenditures now sweeping the Nation. By all means, let us give prudence a permanent seat in our public counsels. By all means, let us stop waste. But let us be sure that it is real waste that we are stopping. Real economy may mean national salvation. Bogus economy may mean national suicide.

I ask you to remember that we could dismantle every Federal bureau and stop every civil function of the National Government—with the four exceptions of construction, relief, loans for shipbuilding, and the Federal Farm Board—and still reduce the Federal Budget by only 8 percent. The complete cost of the legislative, executive, and judicial activities of the Federal Government absorbs less than two thirds of 1 percent of the total Federal outlay. Where, then, you may ask, does all the money go? Well, for one thing, almost three fourths of the total expenditures of the Federal Government goes to pay the costs of our current Military Establishment and to carry the obligations incurred in past wars. That is to say, of every dollar we pay in taxes to the Federal Government about 75 cents go into payments for past wars and preparation against future wars. Think of that the next time you are tempted to applaud the blatherskite or jingo who denounces as pulling pacificism every intelligent attempt to outlaw war.

The more deeply we analyze the problem of public expenditures, the clearer it becomes that it simply is not the scientific, social, and educational services of the Nation that are bending the American back. And yet, throughout the Nation we are trying to balance budgets by cutting the very heart out of the only things that make government a creative social agency. We slash scientific bureaus. We drastically shrink our support of social services. We hamstring our regulatory agencies. We fire visiting nurses. We starve libraries. We reduce hospital staffs. We squeeze education. And we call this economy. And actually think we are intelligent in calling it that. How the gods must be laughing at us! And how our grandchildren will damn us!

* * * * * * *

The real issue confronting us is not economy versus extravagance. That question is well on its way to settlement. Leaders who foster extravagance will be broken. The issue is real economy versus bogus economy. The sword that hangs over education and over all the other social and cultural enterprises of government is the danger of bogus economy.

* * * * * * *

The real results of a bogus economy will not show up in 1933. But if now we hijack the fundamental scientific, social, and educational services of government, it will be a generation or more before we shall be able to climb back even to the efficiency these services now display. If now we beat down the salary scales of public servants, we shall but succeed in further diverting superior capacity from public service. Business and the professions have long drained off from public service the very sort of men and women public service most needs. We dare not intensify this diversion of exceptional ability from public service. I am quite aware that salaries and wages outside public service have had to take drastic cuts in these trying days, but, once the economic curve turns upward, it will be but a question of months until the salary and wage curve in business and the professions will follow the economic curve in its upward sweep, but this will not be true of the salary and wage scales of public servants. And in the meantime, with the memory of the almost insulting scorn to which disinterested public servants are all too often subjected in the midst of an economy campaign, in the years immediately ahead fewer men and women of outstanding ability will be inclined to give their lives to public service. All of which means that it will be our children rather than ourselves who will pay the price of our short-sighted economy.

THE SALES TAX

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, in view of the fact that I understand the question of the sales tax is going to be raised, and an amendment is going to be offered providing for a sales tax, I desire to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD pages 137 to 150, inclusive, of the book entitled "Taxation and the Distribution of Wealth", by Mr. Frederic Mathews, beginning on page 137 with the words "Article 2—Luxuries."

I invite the attention of Senators who are interested in the sales tax to what I consider to be one of the best discussions that has ever been given on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter indicated by the Senator from Alabama will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ARTICLE 2. LUXURIES

Taxes levied upon luxuries present, to a certain extent, the advantages mentioned with reference to indirect methods. On the other hand, as Adam Smith[1] says, "Such taxes, in proportion to what they bring into the public treasury of the State, always take out and keep out of the pockets of the people more than almost any other taxes. They seem to do this in all the four different ways in which it is possible to do it." The four ways are: (1) The great expense in elaborate customs and revenue administration required; (2) the discouragement to industry when voluntary consumption is concerned; (3) corrupting practices; (4) the necessary annoyance and complicated supervision. As taxes of this kind are practically voluntary, they are subject to much variation, both in the amount of revenue produced and in the proportion of total revenue created. They are thus open to two objections from the administrative point of view, the most serious found in a tax, those of variation in amount and uncertainty in produce. Expensive, variable, and uncertain, such taxes offer a correspondingly unsatisfactory basis for revenue.

ARTICLE 3. NECESSARIES

Taxes on necessaries, from an administrative attitude, are greatly preferable to those upon luxuries. The necessaries of existence, vital and industrial, must be consumed by the entire people. Such commodities will, therefore, form a vastly greater bulk than luxuries. In price, also, necessaries present important advantages. As they are cheaper, they support a higher rate of taxation and thus produce, actually and relatively, a larger revenue than taxes upon higher-priced goods. This revenue, again, will be more constant, as the consumption of necessaries varies within narrow limits, and can never cease altogether. The taxation of the staples of life and industry thus becomes the most constant source of revenue derived from indirect methods, and as such, the most important of modern fiscal systems.

The foregoing considerations are advanced from an administrative point of view. There is another point of view, however, from which a fiscal system may be studied; that which regards a society as a whole. Looked at in this light, the indirect taxation of necessaries presents a different field for analysis and different considerations. The first of these is the fact that such taxes must bear much more heavily upon the poor than upon the rich and thus form a proportionately unjust and unsatisfactory source of revenue, irrespective of temporary advantages. The taxation of vital needs places a sure and easy method of raising revenue in the hands of an administration, independent of the suffrage of the mass of the population, and may thus seem to lend permanence and stability to the society. On the other hand, a fiscal system bearing more heavily upon one class than upon another, and that class always the more numerous, must lay the foundation for political disturbance, revolt, and final revolution. The very ease with which an administration may support itself through indirect channels increases the ultimate difficulties of the social organization. The following considerations serve as illustration:

It is evident that a much greater proportion of the revenue of the poor is spent on the actual requirements of life and industry than of the incomes of the well-to-do. Three fourths, or all the income of the very poor man, may be spent upon the essential needs of existence, and all the income so spent falls under the influence of taxes on necessaries. On the other hand, such taxes will absorb a much smaller proportion of the income of the richer classes. A man with £50 a year in wages will be forced to spend nearly 100 percent of his total revenue upon necessaries. If these necessaries are taxed, 100 percent of his income falls under contribution. If the increased prices caused by taxation amount to £5, he will pay that amount or 10 percent of his income in taxes. On the other hand, it is possible that a man in receipt of £50,000 income might not expend £5,000 a year in the purchase of the commoner needs of the people; in which case, instead of 100 percent of his income being taxed, only one-tenth part of it would contribute to the public treasury, and thus instead of paying 10 percent of his income to the state, but one tenth of his income would be taxed and he would contribute but one tenth of 10 percent, or one one hundredth of his greater resources. The poor man will thus be taxed 10 times as heavily, proportionately, as the rich man.

This form of taxation, in which contribution is levied upon the necessaries of life, is universal today, and forms what might be called, approximately, an inversely progressive income tax; that is, a tax increasing as a man's poverty, and decreasing relatively to his wealth. The smaller the income, the greater the proportion of taxation it is forced to pay; the larger the income, the greater the proportion it may escape. If indirect taxes on necessaries were assessed directly, their effects upon the two incomes considered would be as follows: On assessment day the poor man, in all probability, would be compelled to produce his entire £50 of income, 10 percent of which would be taken in taxes. The rich man, on the contrary, would be required to produce that portion alone of his resources spent upon necessaries; in the case supposed, he would be taxed but on £5,000, leaving £45,000, or 90 percent of his income untouched. The disproportion of the burden thus placed upon the two incomes is evident; yet this disproportion seems to be the least important of the results produced in any society supported by the indirect taxation of necessary living expenses.

Where 100 percent of one income is taxed, and but 10 percent of another, the larger, or least taxed income, possesses an untaxed reserve, or saving capacity, of which the smaller, or most taxed incomes, are deprived. Thus, an income of £50,000, taxed upon £5,000 alone, might easily save £10,000 a year out of the total income; while an income of £50, taxed on 100 percent of its amount, could save nothing or a disproportionate percentage. In the second year of the action of such taxes, the first income will have added 10 percent to its capital, that is, the income, increased by 10 percent, will be taxed upon a smaller scale and possess a greater power of accumulation; the smaller income, saving nothing and still taxed upon 100 percent of its amount. Where a society raises its revenue, wholly or in part, therefore, by means of the indirect taxation of necessaries, a process of accumulation sets in toward the larger or least taxed incomes. In other words, the larger incomes will possess a progressively increasing and untaxed accumulating power in proportion to the wealth represented, while smaller incomes will be denied such an untaxed reserve in proportion to the poverty involved. The greater the income, therefore, the greater will be its power of accumulation in reference to taxation; the smaller the income, the less the possibility of creating a reserve untaxed through living expenses. This process carried on generation after generation, throughout the entire series of the incomes of a society, can produce but one result: The distortion of the distribution of the annual wealth of the society in such a way that the larger incomes will absorb a constantly increasing proportion, while the smaller incomes will be brought under an increasing process of taxation. When it is realized, in addition, that the action of taxation enforced through living expenses may be greatly modified under specific conditions, the effects of the disparity of burden become more marked.

The forced action of such taxes, with reference to the two incomes considered, would be as follows: The man with £50 a year is forced to pay £5 in taxes, the man with £50,000, however, is not forced to pay any more; thus the forced burden upon the smaller income is one-tenth part of its total, while the forced burden upon the larger income is one ten-thousandth part of its greater amount. The forced effects of such methods, however, do not end here; for by means of the protective theory, the "balance of trade", "infant industries", the "pauper-labor", the "attraction of capital", "weapon-taxes", and so on, an increased burden of taxation may be piled cumulatively upon the smaller incomes, producing little or no revenue—producing nothing, apparently—other than the indefinite swelling of the larger incomes.

SECTION IV.—CONVENIENCE AND SECURITY OF INDIRECT TAXATION

ARTICLE 1. CONVENIENCE

It may be urged in favor of indirect fiscal methods, in which the tax becomes an indistinguishable part of price, that the contributor pays the tax at the most convenient time or escapes it altogether. As Prince Bismarck has been quoted in support of this position, the words of another German may be cited in the same connection.

"On penalty of death", says a writer,[2] dealing with taxes on necessaries, "nature compels us to eat, and so on penalty of death we are compelled to pay the bread and meat taxes. The man who fails to pay his direct taxes may have his goods distrained, but he cannot be punished. But the man who is unwilling to pay the taxes on bread and meat must die of hunger. It is a truly diabolical system. For by increasing burdens on the food of the people civilization in general is deteriorated, the masses are placed in the unworthy position that they can only satisfy their most urgent needs, while the resources of culture which they create are monopolized by those who have no right to them save the fact of possession. The system of indirect taxation is in direct antagonism to civilization."

Taxes of this kind, pressing upon wages everywhere, deteriorate the whole food supply of the masses. The German Labor Market Correspondence for December 1901 reported[3] that the average price of provisions had increased 7½ percent at Leipzig, and at Chemnitz and at other Saxon towns 12¼ percent. So, too, Dr. G. Creuzbacher, in his inquiry into the food consumption of the town of Munich, shows that the consumption of meat has decreased, even in that well-to-do city, during recent years. While the population of Munich increased between 1881 and 1900, 109.75 percent, the consumption of meat only increased 81.33 percent, the decrease per head being from 94.8 to 81.8 kilograms. * * * Meanwhile the consumption of horseflesh has increased—a sinister fact whose significance cannot be misunderstood. * * * In his report for 1902 the factory inspector for Leipzig said: "The economic conditions of the workers have not improved during the past year, since the incomes of many work people have undergone a further diminution, partly owing to a reduction of wages and partly owing to a curtailment of the hours of work, and since the prices of the most important articles of food have increased. The endeavor to economize shows itself in the diminution of the consumption of meat and the larger demand for horseflesh." The same thing was reported from Berlin, Hamburg, Halle, Altona, Bochum, Dortmund, Horde, Schwerte, and other industrial towns.

M. Yves Guyot[4] gives a like account of the taxation of food products in France. "In Paris", he says, "while taxes have increased, the consumption of fresh meat has decreased relatively to the population. * * * The annual ration of the adult Parisian is only 87 kilos of meat, instead of the 108 kilos of the soldiers. There has been a decrease instead of increase." An analogous condition is shown in the reports from Amiens, Bordeaux, Bourges, Grenoble, Lille, Limoges, Lyon, Marseilles, Nantes, Nimes, Rennes, Roubaix.[5] "The conclusion is that the relative decrease of the consumption of meat in the majority of large towns of France proves the injury resulting from the taxes which increase the price 0.35 cents per kilogram."[6]

Thus the convenience of indirect taxation of vital needs seems chiefly the convenience of relative degrees of starvation, for the payment of such taxes can never be long deferred, or they will indeed be escaped in this world at least.

ARTICLE 2. SECURITY

Another advantage urged in favor of indirect fiscal methods is that they permit the taxing of a people without their knowing how much they pay or having any control over the process. A people which would not tolerate a certain amount of taxation, if levied directly, may with ease be forced to pay a much greater amount without being conscious of the fact. As has been well said, when a direct tax would cause a revolution, indirect methods permit the taxation of the bread out of the mouths of a population with no results other than complaints of hard times. Indirect methods thus render the administration largely independent of popular suffrage. Where an administration controls a few distributive centers it may live with ease upon the resources of a population, even though it may be in a state of revolution. "When in Ireland, during the height of the Land League agitation", says Henry George,[7] "I was much struck with the ease and certainty with which an unpopular government can collect indirect taxes. At the beginning of the century the Irish people, without any assistance from America, proved in the famous Tithe war that the whole power of the English Government could not collect direct taxes they had resolved not to pay; and the strike against rent, which so long as persisted in proved so effective, could readily have been made a strike against direct taxation. Had the government, which was enforcing the claims of the landlords, depended on direct taxation, its resources could thus have been seriously diminished by the same blow which crippled the landlords; but during all the time of this strike the force used to put down the popular movement was being supported by indirect taxation on the people who were in passive rebellion. The people who struck against rent could not strike against taxes paid in buying the commodities they used. Even had rebellion been active and general, the British Government could have collected the bulk of its revenue from indirect taxation, so long as it retained command of the principal towns."

This passage shows the distinction between direct and indirect fiscal methods, in relation to popular political movements. With control of a few ports and industrial centers, an administration may support itself indefinitely from the resources of a population, which, under a direct system, would be in active revolution. This is not always a disadvantage to the people so governed. Such a possibility may tide them over ignorant and aimless popular agitations which, if successful, would work wreck and ruin. But, when the necessary action of the indirect taxation of necessaries is understood in relation to the distribution of the wealth of a society, such security seems but the crust over a volcano, whose certain eruption is but rendered more dangerous.

SECTION V. EXPENSE OF INDIRECT TAXATION

Great expense is involved in all indirect forms of taxation, in comparison to the amount realized by the State. By indirect means of raising social revenue the people are forced not only to pay the tax in increased prices but in addition all profits and interest charged by traders on capital advanced in the payment of excise and customs, together with a host of other augmentations, varying with conditions and articles. The following calculation serves as illustration: It was estimated at one time in England that an extra tax of 2s. per gallon imposed by Parliament upon ardent spirits would produce £1,000,000. Based on the conditions in Scotland, the following estimates may be made: When the act imposing the 2s. tax came into operation, meetings were held by spirit dealers in Edinburgh and Glasgow; the resolution adopted was that the price of whisky should be increased by 1 penny per gill. There being 32 gills in the imperial gallon, the increased price was at the rate of 2s. 8d. per gallon, one third more than the increased tax imposed by Parliament. The duty on all spirits was, however, charged per gallon on what was technically called "proof strength." The spirits were sold to consumers at about the proportion of 1 gallon of water to 4 gallons of proof spirits.

"Starting, then, from this point", says a writer,[8] treating the subject in this connection, "with a new calculation respecting the total burden imposed on the public, these are the results: On 4 gallons of proof spirits, Parliament has imposed an additional duty of 2s. per gallon, or 8s. in all. The publicans and retail spirit dealers, by the addition of 1 gallon of water, convert these 4 gallons into 5 of the strength which is desired by the purchasers; and, in accordance with the resolutions already referred to, they charged an increased rate of 2s. 8d. on each of these 5 gallons, or 13s. 4d. in all. Thus while the Chancellor of the Exchequer receives 8s., the public pays 13s. 4d., to enable him to collect the smaller sum. To obtain £1,000,000, then, from these parties, it is necessary to impose an additional burden of 66⅔ percent, or £666,666 in all."

It is estimated that equitably devised direct taxes cost on the average 2½ percent in the collection, on which basis the cost of the revenue derived would have been but £25,000.

"It is, therefore, the same", says Mr. M'Laren, "as if a landowner should prefer to borrow £10,000 at an expense of 66⅔ percent, or £6,666, to obtaining it at the rate of 2½ percent, or for £250 in all by mortgaging his estate."

The above estimates refer to excise taxation. The import duty is more extravagant for the reason that it raises the price of the home product while not bringing a shilling of revenue into the treasury. Two sources of supply are taxed, while one alone produces income. This is shown by a study of the following estimates, based upon the supposition that England some day decides to tax her grain supply, as has been suggested, both for revenue and preferential objects:

With a duty of 2s per quarter, or about 6d per hundredweight (1 hundredweight=112 pounds, 1 quarter=480 pounds). Mr. Chiozza-Money[9] gives the following figures, representing the total grain consumption of the United Kingdom for 1902:

	Hundredweights
From foreign countries	176,000,000
From British possessions	35,000,000
Home grown	160,000,000
	371,000,000

"At 6d per hundredweight", he continues, "the extra cost to the consumer would be £9,275,000, but the revenue would gain only 6d per hundredweight on the foreign supply, viz, £4,400,000."

Thus revenue raised through import taxation swells the price of all goods affected directly or indirectly, while only a part of these produce revenue for the state.

A striking instance of the waste of wealth due to taxation of this kind is reported from Australia: "Meat in Victoria", says Mr. Chomley[10] "has been raised to great prices by the stock tax on sheep and cattle coming into the southern colony from the pastures of New South Wales and Queensland. * * * Another effect of the stock tax, entirely logical, yet so grotesque and tyrannous as to shock even convinced protectionists, arose through the admission of sheep in bond to be slaughtered in Melbourne and exported as frozen mutton to England. The sheep's heads were not exported, and during the time of severe distress in Melbourne poor women and children visiting the slaughter yards obtained there a nutritious article of food which was a blessing in many households. But on these heads no duty had been paid, and therefore a paternal protectionist government had to devise means to prevent them from going into consumption and afflicting the people with the curse of cheap food. Accordingly they sent to the abattoirs customs officers and barrels of kerosene oil. The heads were piled in great heaps, soaked with oil, and burned before the eyes of hungry women and children."

INDIRECT TAXATION

Under ordinary conditions such demonstration of the destructive nature of indirect taxes would never appear; the consumer, instead of having his food and the necessaries of his trade burned before his eyes, is compelled to work longer to obtain the same goods. The destruction of his wages and the return for his labor is, however, no less real in one instance than in the other; his strength and wages are burned instead of the things they buy.

Indirect taxation of consumption redounds to the disadvantage of the people supporting such measures in many other ways. Taxes on consumption diminish the quantity consumed; where the actual amount is not checked the possible gain is restricted. All industries not supported by indirect taxation will find their markets suppressed by such methods. An instance may be presented in which an indirect tax levied by England upon a foreign population suppresses English industry. Among the most effectually indirect taxes in existence is the Indian salt tax. Here, the English people lift the burden from their own shoulders and place it upon those of their fellow subjects in India. Such methods at first sight seem the height of political wisdom; the English consumer at home is unaffected, and the Indian administration obtains the entire revenue. The average annual consumption of salt in England is 62 pounds; 25 pounds are considered essential; the average consumption in India is about half that amount, while the consumption of the upper classes will reduce the average still lower for a large portion of the Hindu millions.[11]

The medical profession traces the prevalence of leprosy and other diseases to the lack of sufficient salt,[12] and the cattle and agriculture of the country seem vitally affected by the same cause.[13] What are the effects of such restricted consumption on English trade?

"It is also very curious", says Mr. Pennington,[14] "to see what the merchants and others concerned in the British salt trade have to say about this question of the consumption of salt in India when the falling off begins to touch their pockets. 'To the population of India', says an advocate of more English salt for Indian consumption, 'the complete abolition of the salt tax would be a reform beneficent beyond conception. The consumption of salt would probably be trebled within 3 years—' and yet no one would eat more salt than was good for them. 'Finally, the salt producers and shippers have worked themselves into the belief that the salt tax ought to be abolished. On this point they say: The question of the complete abolition of the salt tax—not inaptly termed the "bread tax of the Hindu"— is probably the most important question that can receive the attention of members of the English salt trade as a united body at the present time, and so on.'" The following[15] is an extract from a letter to Mr. Pennington in this connection:

LONDON, July 23, 1904.

DEAR SIR: I have read with great pleasure the report you have been good enough to send me of your paper on the salt tax in India, a subject which much interests me, as 50 years' experience in the salt trade of this country has often brought it directly to my notice. * * *

From this point of view the Indian salt tax is not exclusively an Indian question, but one which also materially affects many interests in England itself; and now that we are invited to "think imperially", it cannot be inappropriate to deal with the matter on the broader basis, and consider it in its relation to British imperial interests. It is computed that the consumption of salt in India, with its population of 240,000,000, would soon be trebled were the duty abolished, and this calculation is to some extent supported by the fact that since the reduction of the duty on March 31 of last year the consumption has greatly increased, so that, besides the larger demand for salt manufactured in India itself, the exports from Liverpool to Calcutta, etc., for the 6 months to the end of June last amount to 140,000 tons, against 88,000 tons in the same period of 1903, and 82,000 in the same period of 1902. This extra trade benefits not only the English salt makers, both employers and employed, and the English railways and canals engaged in transporting it to the coast, but is also a boon to the British shipowner and sailor, giving them better employment outward to the Indian ports. Nor does the advantage end there, for the larger supply of tonnage thus available to the Indian producer for the export of his rice, wheat, jute, cotton, linseed, etc., is an item of great importance to the development of the Indian export trade with other countries.

Besides this, it is obvious that the large increase in the consumption of salt in India, which it is expected would result from the abolition of the tax, would give employment to an enormous number of hands required for its distribution throughout the country, would add to the revenue of the railways and canals of India, and increase the profits derived from the salt trade by those engaged in its manufacture. When all this is taken into account, I believe the advantages accruing to the various interests enumerated above, added to the direct benefits derived by the Indian natives from the freer use of salt in their food, in the curing of fish, the preservation of meat and vegetables, the feeding of cattle, the cultivation of land, and in many other ways, would, if it were possible to express them in figures, be found to far outweigh the amount (some £6,000,000, I believe) of the revenue derived by the Indian Government from the tax. * * * I remain, dear sir,

Yours truly,

J. W. FOX,
Late Managing Director Weston & Westall, Ltd.,
London Agents to the Salt Union.

This most indirect of indirect taxes thus suppresses a great English industry, with all its ramification of transportation and distribution, and must, consequently, check English production and the demand for English labor. Cicero[16] says that the Romans used to protect their growers of grapes and olives by forbidding the people beyond the Alps to raise these articles of food. This destroyed not only the vineyards and orchards of others but the labor of the Roman people, required to pay the increased price. The modern duty has the same effect; it stifles productive industry at home and abroad, and destroys the labor necessary to pay taxed prices.

The continental system of Napoleon was one of the most elaborate networks of indirect taxation ever woven, and the amount of wealth it destroyed in France must have been enormous. A striking example of such destruction is found in the pages of Thiers.[17] Speaking of Marseille, formerly the queen of the Mediterranean, and since become its queen again, he says: "For 25 years she saw more than 300 vessels of commerce rotting at her quays without moving. * * * The only distraction in her distress was when some captured English merchandise was abandoned to the flames under the eyes of a people dying of hunger, watching the destruction in a few hours of riches upon which they might have lived.

"Born and brought up at Marseille", he adds, "I still recall this spectacle and seem to see the rank of motionless vessels ranged in lines from the Place de la Cannebière as far as the Fort St. Jean. A child at the time, and often on the quays, I used to study these vessels; I knew their names and appearance as one knows the houses in a familiar street, and I never saw one move during the last years of the Empire. Its fall", he says, "was the occasion of a joy such as I have never seen in any other time or circumstances."

In this way it is seen at a glance how the taxes imposed by Napoleon in support of his continental system destroyed all the wealth represented in these vessels; all the wealth their natural occupations might have created; all the wealth which might have been enjoyed and consumed by the men employed in working, loading and unloading them, during that period both at home and abroad; all the wealth burned in Marseille and at other places, together with all the wealth wasted throughout the country on account of the artificial scarcity due to such methods. Direct destruction due to taxation of this kind, such as the burning of food products or the locking up of shipping, is rarely seen in its crude forms. During the Napoleonic regime the people of central France did not see a portion of their crops and vineyards burning or rotting before their eyes, but their produce and labor were destroyed, however, exactly as in a fire by means of forced prices on one side and the strangling of the consuming powers of the people on another. And as the Indian salt tax starves the cattle and population of India, does it force English labor out of employment, reduce the returns to English shipping, force up the price of foodstuffs in the English market through the checking of tonnage in foreign ports, and react adversely upon the population of England in direct proportion to the consuming powers suppressed. Permanent and profitable commerce cannot be forced; commerce must be profitable to all concerned or cease; and where ports or markets are forced or protected by artificial fiscal methods, the nation imposing the taxes congests its wealth and checks its industrial development through the stifling of consumption.

The advantages of indirect systems have been summarized under four headings: (1) taxing the foreigner, (2) the best source of revenue, (3) convenience and security, (4) expense. Counter considerations may be presented:

1. There seems reason to believe that no nation can ever tax foreign sources in reality. Where such results are temporarily apparent, the nation burdens the unrealized possibilities of its own commerce. It is, moreover, always possible for foreign nations to retaliate in kind, so that no even apparent advantage could be gained for any length of time.

2. Indirect taxes, in order to produce important or constant revenue, must be laid upon the necessaries of life and industry. The taxation of such necessaries is, in consequence, the same thing as the direct assessment of living expenses. As the necessary living expenses of the poor form a relatively larger part of income than the necessary living expenses of the rich, the forced effects of such taxation will be the same thing as an inversely proportionate income tax; levying increasing tribute upon poverty, and exempting wealth in proportion to its amount.

3. The convenience created by indirect methods seems largely measured by the convenience of different forms of starvation, and their security dependent upon ignorance and the time necessary to bring about the inevitable political upheaval due to disproportionately placed burdens.

4. The expense of such taxation is in two ways greater than necessary: First, in order to raise revenue from consumption, it is essential to raise the price of all sources of supply, although but few of these produce revenue. Again, checks on consumption, at home or abroad, destroy the industries which might supply the suppressed demand, resulting in the loss of the wealth such markets might create.

The subject may be left with the following passages from Adam Smith and Mill. "A tax upon the necessaries of life", says the former,[18] "operates exactly in the same manner as a direct tax upon the wages of labor." To the extent in which wages are influenced by the price of provisions, wages will rise with such taxes, but, as wages are controlled chiefly by the supply and demand in the labor market, and not by the price of provisions, such taxes act as a direct burden upon wages which can apparently never raise the return to labor beyond mere subsistence as long as an unemployed supply exists.

"There are some forms of indirect taxation", says Mill,[19] "which must be peremptorily excluded. Taxes on commodities, for revenue purposes, must not operate as protecting duties, but must be levied impartially on every mode in which the articles can be obtained, whether produced in the country itself, or imported. An exclusion must also be put upon all taxes on the necessaries of life, or on the materials or instruments employed in producing these necessaries. Such taxes are always liable to encroach on what should be left untaxed, the incomes barely sufficient for healthful existence.

Taxes on consumption in the light of the foregoing considertions, are at variance with the principles laid down by Adam Smith.

LAKE CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, a bridge bill has been favorably reported by the Commerce Committee today. The Senate passed a similar bill at the last session, but too late for the House to pass it. The bill, which now comes from the House, is one on which immediate action is needed by the men who are asking for the construction of the bridge. I ask that the Senate may consider the bill now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Is the bill on the calendar, Mr. President?

Mr. DALE. The bill is not on the calendar, but it was considered by the Commerce Committee and favorably reported this morning by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD].

Mr. McNARY. Is it an ordinary bridge bill, in the usual form prescribed for such measures?

Mr. DALE. Yes, sir. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] knows what the bill is.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Vermont is entirely correct.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The bill (H.R. 5793) to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act authorizing Jed P. Ladd, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Lake Champlain from East Alburg, Vt., to West Swanton, Vt.", approved March 2, 1929, was read, considered by unanimous consent, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved March 2, 1929, authorizing Jed P. Ladd, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct a bridge across Lake Champlain, between a point at or near East Alburg, Vt., and a point at or near Swanton, Vt., be, and the same is hereby, revived and reenacted: Provided, That this act shall be null and void unless the actual construction of the bridge herein referred to be commenced within 1 year and completed within 3 years from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of E. Barrett Prettyman, of Maryland, to be general counsel for the Bureau of Internal Revenue, in place of Clarence M. Charest, resigned, which was ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURPHY in the chair), as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received see the end of Senate proceedings.)

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until tomorrow at 10 o'clock a.m., pursuant to the order heretofore entered.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p.m.), under the order previously entered, the Senate, as in legislative session, took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, June 8, 1933, at 10 o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Forney Hutchinson, pastor of Mount Vernon Place Methodist Episcopal Church South, Washington, D.C., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, we are glad we can call Thee Father and feel that Thou art interested in us and concerned about us. We would begin, continue, and end everything we do with Thy blessing and favor. We come to Thee for help and strength today. We need Thee every hour.

Command Thy blessings to rest upon this assembly of Thy servants. Give them clear heads, discerning minds, and understanding hearts. Make their work here a benediction to this Nation and our sister nations throughout the earth.

Remember also the President and his Cabinet and all who have any part in the leadership of this Thy so great a people. Bless the States of this Union and all those charged with the responsibilities of leadership therein.

Remember each of us personally today. Forgive our sins. Strengthen our faith. Bless our families and our interests. Hasten the coming of Thy kingdom and help us to have some little part in it. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

On May 27, 1933:

H.R. 5152. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Commission of Virginia to replace and maintain a bridge across Northwest River in Norfolk County, Va., on State highway route no. 27;

H.R. 5173. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Commission of Virginia to maintain a bridge already constructed to replace a weak structure in the same location, across the Staunton and Dan Rivers, in Mecklenburg County, Va., on United States Route No. 15;

H.R. 5476. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Savannah River at or near Burtons Ferry, near Sylvania, Ga.;

H.R. 5480. An act to provide full and fair disclosure of the character of securities sold in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, and to prevent frauds in the sale thereof, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 5390. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

On May 29, 1933:

H.J.Res. 159. Joint resolution granting the consent of Congress to a compact or agreement between the State of Kansas and the State of Missouri authorizing the acceptance for and on behalf of the States of Kansas and Missouri of title to a toll bridge across the Missouri River from a point in Platte County, Mo., to a point at or near Kansas City, in Wyandotte County, Kans., and specifying the conditions thereof.

On May 31, 1933:

H.R. 4014. An act to authorize appropriations to pay in part the liability of the United States to the Indian pueblos herein named, under the terms of the act of June 7, 1924, and the liability of the United States to non-Indian claimants on Indian pueblo grants whose claims, extinguished under the act of June 7, 1924, have been found by the Pueblo Lands Board to have been claims in good faith; to authorize the expenditure by the Secretary of the Interior of the sums herein authorized and of sums heretofore appropriated, in conformity with the act of June 7, 1924, for the purchase of needed lands and water rights and the creation of other permanent economic improvements as contemplated by said act; to provide for the protection of the watershed within the Carson National Forest for the Pueblo de Taos Indians of New Mexico, and others interested, and to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to contract relating thereto; and to amend the act approved June 7, 1924, in certain respects.

On June 3, 1933:

H.R. 4494. An act authorizing a per capita payment of $100 to the members of the Menominee Tribe of Indians of Wisconsin from funds on deposit to their credit in the Treasury of the United States.

On June 5, 1933:

H.J.Res. 192. Joint resolution to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business, in order today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INTERSTATE RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1580) to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation, and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, with a House amendment thereto, disagreed to by the Senate, insist upon the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. RAYBURN, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. LEA of California, Mr. PARKER of New York, and Mr. COOPER of Ohio.

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNOR OF HAWAII

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 176, a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 176

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 5767, a bill to authorize the appointment of the Governor of Hawaii without regard to his being a citizen or resident of Hawaii, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Territories, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present. This is an important matter, and I think there should be a quorum here to listen to the debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighteen Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and forty-four Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

FREIGHT RATES ON FURNACE RAW MATERIALS

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short table of freight rates on furnace raw materials in my district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the discussion of increases in railroad rates in my speech made on June 2, 1933, and as illustrative of the burdensome rates referred to, I refer to the following table:

WHAT CONGRESS HAS DONE

Mr. DUFFEY. Mr. Speaker, last evening there was delivered over the radio an address by the Honorable HENRY T. RAINEY, of Illinois, Speaker of the House of Representatives. Many of us had the pleasure of listening to that address. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Members.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUFFEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, of Illinois, Speaker of the House of Representatives, over a national hook-up Tuesday, June 6, 1933:

Ladies and gentlemen of my radio audience, the first session of the Seventy-third Congress is approaching its close.

The economy bill, which was among the first measures passed, has been challenged by the Connally amendment to the independent offices appropriation bill. This amendment in its present form, if it should be enacted into law, will mean a loss of $170,000,000 in the economies we thought we had accomplished, and the Budget will again be out of balance. If it is adopted by the House and becomes a law, it will be necessary for Congress to remain in session and by new taxes meet the deficit this amendment will create. It is hardly possible, however, that the President will willingly permit this very large amount of money to be lost from his economy program; and while I have no authority from the President to make the statement, I have no doubt whatever that the bill will be vetoed if the Connally amendment in its present form remains in the bill, and I do not think the bill will pass over the veto of the President. We are anxious, however, to avoid this situation, and the Democratic steering committee of the House is now at work on the proposition.

Today the new regulations were issued by the President. They have to do with the compensation allowances for the veterans of the World War and the Spanish-American War. The Executive order was signed this afternoon, and the new regulations are now in effect. The regulations were made possible by the President's original direction that the tentative regulations heretofore suggested be carefully reviewed and amended. Some of the cuts in compensation of service-connected veterans were deeper than were intended, and today it seems that new taxes may be avoided and that the movement upward of prices may not be interfered with by large additional taxes.

The new regulations are more liberal even than the Connally amendment. Under them no directly service-connected veteran will be reduced in his compensation by more than 25 percent, and the average reductions will approximate 18 percent, and this regulation applies to Spanish-American War veterans, World War veterans, and peace-time veterans who have incurred a disability while with an expenditionary force engaged in a campaign or expedition such as Nicaragua, China, Russia, or Haiti. Under this regulation service-connected Spanish-American War veterans, and some even of the peace-time veterans, will receive payments very substantially in excess of those which they were receiving prior to the passage of the Economy Act.

I might suggest that with reference to World War veterans under the new regulations promulgated today by the President, those who are suffering from injuries and are receiving $150 per month for the loss of both hands or both feet, or one hand and one foot, or in any case where the veteran is so helpless as to require the aid of another, and in the case of the more severely injured, the President's new regulations increase the allowance under existing law from $150 per month to $175.

Spanish-American War veterans who are over 62 years of age and who served 90 days or more, even if their disabilities are not service-connected, are increased from $6 to $15 per month, and in the case of either World War or Spanish-American War veterans, those who are permanently and totally disabled have their compensation increased from $20 to $30 per month.

Burial and funeral expenses are also liberalized under the new regulations.

Pensions continue to be paid to children of deceased veterans up to the age of 18 years, and, in the event of a child being in an approved school or college, the pension may continue for an additional period until the completion of the course, but not beyond the age of 21 years.

The regulations also contain a provision exempting from the prohibition against payment of pensions to Federal employees, the widows of deceased veterans, and those veterans whose pay is $50 per month or less.

Under the regulations today promulgated the reasons for the Connally amendment, which appealed to those who are supporting it, are largely eliminated, and it is to be hoped that such action can now be taken in conference as will make unnecessary additional large amounts of taxes.

The Nation is obligated to take care of its disabled veterans whose disabilities can be traced to the service. Members are today being deluged with telegrams urging them to support the President's program and with telegrams urging them to support the Connally amendment. The Connally amendment is not a part of the President's program and is not recognized as such, but it is to be hoped that the proponents of the so-called Connally amendment will be willing now to agree to continue their support of the President's program in the future as they have in the past, especially in view of the regulations which have today been promulgated.

THE RECONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

Congress has been in session now for only 3 months of time, but during that period of time a most remarkable and astounding program of legislation has been either enacted into law or is in process of enactment and soon will be enacted.

Nineteen bills are embraced in the President's program. Every one of these bills has been passed by the House except the bill which would authorize the President by reciprocal measures to make tariff changes in order to restore in large measure international trade. This bill must originate in the House. It is now in the process of being drafted and will be submitted soon. It will not require much time and will quickly pass.

In all the history of legislative bodies nothing approaching the amount of important legislation passed by the present House has even been dreamed of in an equal period of time. The President and the Congress have worked harmoniously. Party lines have been to a large extent obliterated. Congress will remain in session until his program of legislation is completed.

EFFECTS OF PROGRAM ALREADY IN EVIDENCE

Already the effects of it are being felt. The huge machine we are building, although not yet complete, has commenced slowly but surely to function, and the result is an increase in prices of commodities, a very perceptible decrease in unemployment, and there are no longer any hunger marches on the National Capital. Order is being restored throughout the land. The last veterans' march on the Capital completely disintegrated when the veterans, assembled here in a camp just south of Washington, accepted employment in the forest army. Factories are opening. On our markets stocks which have a real value are increasing in price, and hope is returning to the people of the United States, and what we accomplish here will have its favorable reaction throughout the entire world.

We have already passed and enacted into law the emergency banking and gold control bill, the bill for the legalization of beer, the economy bill—which soon will have the effect of balancing the Budget—the bill providing for the forest armies, the bill providing for the regulation of Muscle Shoals. The Tennessee Valley development and the Muscle Shoals development have been rescued completely from the Water Power Trust. We passed the bill providing a half billion dollars for direct relief, and we passed the farm relief bill and the inflation act. The Glass-Steagall banking bill is nearing disposal. The independent offices appropriation and economy bill will be in conference in a day or two, and in that conference we hope veterans' compensation matters will be worked out so as to avoid a Presidential veto; but if the veto is not sustained, there must be another large oppressive taxing bill. The bill providing for the extension of gasoline taxing measures, postage reduction, and the transfer of the electric tax from the householder to the companies is in conference and will soon be enacted into law. The reconstruction finance insurance corporation bill will soon be signed by the President and will become a law. The bill canceling the gold clause in existing contracts will soon be enacted into law. The railroad reorganization bill has passed both Houses. The public-works industrial-control tax measure has been passed by the House and will soon be enacted into law. The home-mortgage bill has been passed by the House and will soon become a law, and the measure providing for a regulation of the oil industry can be expected to pass within the next few days. We have also passed a bill protecting the public against fraudulent sales of securities.

Any two of these measures would have been a sufficient accomplishment in addition to the supply bills for any one session of Congress, and any administration could have pointed with pride to its achievements if it had passed only two of these measures in one session of Congress. But our national recovery depends upon the passage of all of them.

On the 4th day of March the people of the United States viewed with fear and despondency the outlook. From every hand came the crash of failing banks. For 12 years of time, and through three administrations, there had been no attempt to ward off approaching dangers. We occupied our time passing supply bills and raising the tariff. We hailed our economic isolation as a matter of national pride. We insisted upon our economic right to sell to all the world and buy little in return. We called attention to stock-market booms, and when the collapse came we ignored existing conditions, proposed no remedies, but simply insisted that prosperity was just around the corner, that brokers' loans were not too high and never had been. The depression was only temporary. We denied the proposition that the civilizations and cultures of different sections of the world are more closely interwoven than they ever had been.

But all these conditions and these theories came abruptly to an end on the 4th day of March of this year. In the days which have passed since then our entire national and international policies have been completely revised and changed, and this has been possible because back of the leadership which comes from the White House there has been a universal support, a universal chorus of approval.

Two days after the inauguration of the President of the United States a hand of steel reached out from the White House and closed every bank in the country. The people did not know what it meant. Banks did not know what it all meant, but everybody knew that in the future there would be no weak, vacillating leadership from the White House, and hope commenced to take the place of gloom and despondency.

The reforestation army will soon be at work in our forests—250,000 of them. Those who will be admitted first are now receiving the preliminary training which develops them physically and which restores their self-respect. They can be discharged whenever they can find a better job, a job which pays more money than $1 a day and sustenance, and it will not be much longer until jobs which will pay more than that will be available in greater number than for the last 12 years of time.

Perhaps among all the bills we have passed, first in importance comes the economy bill, under which we expect soon to balance the Budget. It was passed through the House 3 or 4 days after the convening of the House in extra session. Without this bill our approaching national solvency would be impossible, and it is to be hoped that it will not be destroyed in part by the Connally amendment.

Of equal importance perhaps is the Farm Relief and Inflation Act. This is probably in its scope the most far-reaching measure ever passed by any legislative body in all the Christian centuries. It has for its object the restoration of farm prices, and it has already commenced to operate even in advance of the promulgation and enforcement of the regulations which are now being prepared. This bill also carried with it the reorganization of our entire farm-loan system, so as to eliminate unnecessary overhead expenses, to reduce the interest farmers pay, and to provide for necessary moratoriums. It carried also the inflation act, which in brief authorizes the President to revaluate the gold ounce, to coin silver free, and to issue currency against bonds. He can adopt either one of these measures, or he can adopt any two of them or all of them as may seem to him necessary in order to meet the international economic war which is being waged now against us.

Congress has not abandoned any of its functions. We have not created a dictator. This is still a representative government and it will remain a representative government through the ages. What Congress has done by its constructive measures is to build a great economic machine and we have authorized the President to take control. We have authorized him to become the engineer in charge of the operation of the machine, and this is all, and no more competent engineer could be found. A strong leadership comes now from the White House. A superman is there, combining all the idealism and the initiative of a Wilson with the energy of a Jackson and the wide statesmanship of a Jefferson.

DANGER POINT PASSED

In our movement upward we have passed now the danger point, and if the support and confidence of the people of the United States will continue—and it will—we will soon be on a direct and a broad road to a permanent recovery. We must not expect too much in too short a time. This is not an age of miracles. We cannot hurry too much national recovery, but it will come, and it is coming. Already the rainbow of hope appears in the cloudy skies ahead of us and with a renewed confidence we journey toward it, and perhaps in due time, if we continue our advance and our support of the policies of the administration, we will be able to find the treasures which lie at its foot.

THE ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

Already our delegates are on the seas proceeding to the London Economic Conference. It has been said that we never win a conference and we never lose a war, but the indications are that we are going to win this conference. Back here in the United States, while the conference is in progress, we have armed the President with a battery of economic guns which he can fire if occasion warrants. We are the strongest nation economically in the world.

The hopeful thing for us is that during the present administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt in a short period of time we have abandoned our theories as to our own self-sufficiency. We are recognizing now that in order to be prosperous ourselves the rest of the world must prosper. From the President of the United States comes the statement with reference to the London Economic Conference that "it must come to its conclusions quickly. The world cannot wait deliberations long drawn out." I have just quoted the President's language. In advance of the conference came the President's message to the heads of the 54 nations of the world.

OUR ISOLATION POLICIES ABANDONED

Recently President Coolidge announced with reference to our international relations that we must be "independent, detached, and disinterested." In the last few days we have completely separated ourselves as a nation from that theory.

He also said in one of his messages, "Our financial favors are wide-spread", and he referred to our humanitarian interests in the rest of the world. Our financial favors have been wide-spread, but they have been distributed in a way which has crippled us and in a way which has not benefited the recipients. We have stopped talking now about charity.

Even after the panic of 1929 under the administration then in control we still insisted that we were self-sufficient. We still insisted that we had no need of the rest of the world. We still insisted that we could get out of our troubles alone, and we proceeded to build our tariff walls higher than ever and persuaded ourselves that we were protected and that we were completely detached and that that was what we wanted to be.

In his radio address of 4 weeks ago President Roosevelt said, and I quote his language, "The domestic situation is inevitably and deeply tied in with the conditions in all of the other nations of the world", and he continued by saying there can be no permanent prosperity in this country "unless we get a return to prosperity all over the world."

Our entire national methods of thought have changed in less than 3 months of time. Secretary of State Hull recently, in his chamber of commerce address, said, "It is now clear that no nation can live and thrive by itself. The proponents of the policy of economic isolation are now silent as to its world effect, but are still unable to offer any basic remedy for business recovery except this broken-down and discredited policy. They can only point to its colossal failure as a guaranty of its future ability to improve business conditions."

Congress will soon adjourn, and the attention of this country and of the world will then be directed to the London Economic Conference. The completion of our program of legislation, the balancing of our Budget, our own trend toward recovery, our own abandonment of the idea that we are self-sufficient, the fact that we have armed the President here with weapons to enforce favorable world action in the London Conference—all these combined will have its effect on this important conference, and after its conclusion it cannot longer be said of us that we always win our wars and lose our conferences.

Our work after the adjournment of Congress will be to convince the world that the nations of the world must trade with each other, that none of them are self-sufficient. We will be fighting in the London Conference for a restoration of world prosperity, and when we have won that fight we have insured that complete and lasting economic recovery which will then be an accomplished fact.

I thank you.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 1767. An act to authorize the acceptance of certain lands in the city of San Diego, Calif., by the United States, and the transfer by the Secretary of the Navy of certain other lands to said city of San Diego;

H.R. 5239. An act to extend the provisions of the act entitled "An act to extend the period of time during which final proof may be offered by homestead entrymen", approved May 13, 1932, to desert-land entrymen, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 5690. An act to legalize the manufacture, sale, or possession of 3.2 percent beer in the State of Oklahoma when and if the same is legalized by a majority vote of the people of Oklahoma or by an act of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4220) for the protection of Government records.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1094) to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to subscribe for preferred stock and purchase the capital notes of insurance companies, and for other purposes.

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNOR OF HAWAII

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the rule now offered is to make in order the consideration of H.R. 5767, which was debated and voted on on the floor on Monday last under a motion to suspend the rules. The motion was defeated under the requirement of a two-thirds vote by a vote of 2. This rule, if adopted, will make possible the right of the majority to legislate in Congress. The bill H.R. 5767 was prepared and offered by the Committee on the Territories in obedience to a request by the President of the United States to the Congress on the 22d day of May, reciting that particular reasons existed why the organic act for the Territory of Hawaii should be changed to permit the selection of a Governor of that Territory without regard to the qualifications fixed in the organic act, as amended in 1921. The House, of course, is advised that one of the requirements that enter into the selection of a Governor of the islands possession is that he shall be a resident of Hawaii.

It is the evident purpose of the President to make selection of this Governor from the continental area, although the bill as proposed by the Committee on the Territories still would permit selection of a resident of Hawaii.

There is very little I can say to you gentlemen that was not said in the course of the debate on Monday, but I do say to you that when the President of the United States appeals to the Congress for the privilege of making selection of an executive for the important island possessions of Hawaii, it is one that should have a favorable response from this legislative body. You are not entirely unfamiliar with some criticisms made of conditions in the islands with respect to law and order. Defense has been made to those allegations, and representatives of some departments of our Government have been especially charged with the duty of visiting the islands and making an investigation to ascertain the correctness of the most serious charges made. We have reports from those representatives to the effect that they have no organized crime in Hawaii. Possibly the racketeering that prevailed in the continental area has not prevailed in the islands, but the very fact that conditions are such as to justify this bill warrants the most serious consideration at the hands of the lawmaking body.

Evidently there are conditions that disturb and seriously interfere with the proper administration of the laws. Evidently factionalism exists in the islands to an extent. Evidently the local conditions are such as to make desirable and possibly necessary for a disregard of the qualifications of residence in order to remove the executive official of the islands from the midst of such factional differences.

Another thing I want to impress upon this body is the fact that the legislation we have passed recently with respect to the freedom of the Philippine Islands—and no one doubts that within a limited time we will remove ourselves entirely from that sphere of activity—will leave this possession the outpost, the frontier of our Nation, and a place where we must necessarily pin the defense that we must erect in order to properly secure the west coast of the Nation. Therefore is it unreasonable to conceive that the warrant of authority requested is based upon the necessity of giving more thorough attention to this great outpost and making it more secure for the protection of the people of our Nation, and especially the west coast of the United States?

As a rule, I am far removed from offering for consideration ex parte statements, and sometimes I am inclined to doubt the wisdom of offering newspaper articles respecting conditions that exist. I have had sufficient touch with the administration of judicial affairs to convince me that frequently what appears to be a perfect case, upon more mature reflection and opportunity for development of facts and circumstances bearing upon the matter dealt with, will appear that the facts are entirely different from those quoted. Therefore I am reluctant to offer for the consideration a newspaper article, but in view of the fact that there is so much controversy over conditions at this particular place, I feel that an article appearing in the Post this morning is a matter that should be at least offered for the consideration of the House within that limitation. It bears very largely on the conditions that have been reported to us at various periods of time.

HONOLULU, TERRITORY OF HAWAII, June 6.—An alleged outbreak of attacks on Army and Navy men here by civilian gangs has caused concern in high military and naval circles, it was reported tonight.

It was understood General Wells and Admiral Yates Stirling had sent reports to Washington.

Lieuts. Leroy Hudson and Walter Lee, Army aviators, were being treated in a hospital tonight, after allegedly being beaten by civilians. Arthur Carter, Melvin Paoa, Brede Karratti, and John Kamana were arrested as suspects.

The officers, driving with women companions, were halted by another machine and allegedly beaten. Unconscious, they were left on the banks of the Alawai Canal, near the place where Thalia Fortescue Massie was attacked last year.

If this article is based on fact, it is only a continuation of the unfortunate conditions that have developed and continued in the island for at least the past 2 years. It seems to me there must be some prejudice there against our Army and Navy officials and its personnel. I do not know the justification for it. These reports come to us to the effect that they have no organized crime in this island; that the conditions there will compare more than favorably with the prevalence of law and order than in the continental United States; and they may be true, but somewhere, somehow, these things continue to occur; and if permitted to occur, necessarily will increase such prejudice against the personnel of our Army and Navy, which must eventuate in trouble, if trouble does not exist now. The best time to treat the ills of human kind is when evidence of the disease appears.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRIVER. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Day before yesterday, when the motion was made to suspend the rules and pass this bill, it then received 222 votes for it, with only 114 votes against it; but it failed to pass because it required a two-thirds majority. If 2 votes had changed, the bill would have passed by a two-thirds vote. Many of those votes against it were caused by the ridiculous assertion from the Republican side that the author of the so-called "Companionate Marriage" was going to be appointed, which was absolutely without foundation.

Now, if we only lacked 2 votes the other day of passing it by a two-thirds vote, and under this rule today it can be passed by a bare majority of 1 vote, and we understand there is no chance of Ben Lindsey being appointed, why should we not move the previous question on this rule and pass it, and then pass the bill without further loss of time?

Mr. DRIVER. I have no doubt the House will pass the bill. We have brought in a rule to make it possible for a majority of this House to function in a legislative way. It is an open rule providing for 1 hour's general debate. The bill is then to be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the present Democratic-controlled House, having already passed legislation to a large degree that has destroyed the confidence of the average American citizen in the integrity of a contract in financial matters with the Federal Government, is now proposing to pass another measure that to a certain degree is going to destroy, or at least limit to a certain degree, the rights of citizenship in this country.

If this bill, affecting primarily the rights of the people of Hawaii, is indicative of the "new deal" the Democrats are going to give this country in the next 4 years, the Lord have mercy upon the average American citizen.

If there has ever been a rule that is absolutely inexcusable, I am sure this one is at the present time. This is a special session of Congress called for the distinct purpose of passing reconstruction measures of the President, measures that in some way it is hoped will rehabilitate this country and bring us out of the depression.

The only possible way I can see that this bill will work along this line is that it may make it possible for the President to appoint some deserving Democrat who has done good work in the last campaign to a fat political job. This is the real politics in this bill, and every man in this House knows it.

May I call the attention of the Members of the House to the Democratic platform of 1928. Hawaii was not mentioned in their last platform. I should like to read to the Members of the House what they said relative to Alaska and Hawaii in 1928. That statement reads as follows:

We favor the development of Alaska and Hawaii in the traditional American way, through self-government. We favor the appointment of only bona fide residents to the offices in the Territory.

That is the profound announcement of your Democratic Party in national convention. [Applause.]

If your action today is an indication of how you are going to interpret the promises made in your national platform, I fear for the effect on the country.

Mr. Speaker, the only reason given on the floor of the House for making this change in the law is that the President has requested it. I have listened to the debate very carefully, and I have read it since it was had on Monday. Every man said, "I know very little about it, but the President of the United States has requested it."

I also read the request of the President. He says he wants to appoint a forward-looking, experienced man. Would we expect the President of the United States to appoint any other kind of a man to an important executive position? Let me tell you Members on the other side of the aisle that if the President wants that kind of a man, he can do no better than to continue in office the present Governor of the Territory. [Applause.] That man has made one of the best records as chief executive of that island of any governor in any of the States during the past depression. The only reason I can see why you want to change it is that you have found out they have $10,000,000 in the treasury and you want to divide it among deserving Democrats.

It takes special qualifications to fit a man to be Governor of Hawaii. He should be a man who knows the problems of the island. He should know the problems of the various races that make up that diversified population, and no man can know these problems except one who has been there for some time and has given himself to the work of the islands and in helping to solve their problems. When you bring a man from the continental United States who, perhaps, has never visited the islands, and ask him to be chief executive, you have done a great injustice to a very important part of our people.

While no reason has been given for it, there are plenty of reasons why it should not be done. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, every single inhabitant of the islands, every man, whether Republican or Democrat, is absolutely opposed to the legislation you are proposing to pass here today. It is not very often Republicans and Democrats unite on anything, but here is one time and one place where they are absolutely united. They want a man who is a resident of the islands to be appointed as chief executive over the islands. Further, we have absolutely gone back on our word when we made the original agreement with these people that the Governor of the islands should be a resident of the islands.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. In what document was any such agreement ever made?

Mr. SNELL. In the original Organic Act which made the islands a part of the United States.

Mr. RANKIN. That does not happen to be the treaty.

Mr. SNELL. It is part of the fundamental law of the islands that the Governor of the islands should be a resident thereof. It has always been considered that he should be a resident of the islands.

Mr. RANKIN. Is it a law we passed here? It is not in the treaty annexing Hawaii to the United States.

Mr. SNELL. It is part of the original agreement, and the gentleman well knows it. No reason has ever been given on the floor of the House why we should violate or change that law. [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not part of the very enabling act itself under which we took the islands over?

Mr. SNELL. I have always understood it was one of the conditions upon which they became an integral part of this country.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield that I may give him a citation of the authority supporting his statement?

Mr. SNELL. It is in the original law setting up the government of the islands.

Mr. MOTT. It is in the original law. When Congress in 1899 took up the matter of making the organic law for Hawaii, they sent to Hawaii a commission of 5 members, 2 of whom were residents of Hawaii, and the entire commission reported this provision back.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from Arkansas, who presented this resolution, has spoken about the importance of these islands as an outpost of the United States. I appreciate well their importance to this country; but let me tell you, my friends, we better be very careful not to violate our agreement when they do hold such an important place in the defense of this country. When you consider their crime record ever since they have been a part of this country, no man has the right to point the finger of scorn at the present constituted government of the islands.

I maintain there has not been a word said anywhere about why we should do this, and it is simply a political move from start to finish, against the solemn mandate of your own party in convention assembled. [Applause.]

It seems to me it is a rather anomalous situation to have this bill introduced providing for carpetbag government of Hawaii by a Member from Mississippi and the rule presented by a Member from Arkansas. [Laughter.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. SNELL. If there is one part of this country that protested against carpetbag government—and I was always in sympathy with you in that protest—it is your part of the country, and when you consider that a majority of the men representing that part of the United States today are going to pass legislation to put carpetbag government in another part of the United States, it is beyond my comprehension of fair play and beyond my conception of what Representatives ought to do under such circumstances. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER].

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I know very well, of course, that nothing I can say here this afternoon will prevent the passage of this bill, yet I feel I should not let this occasion pass without at least giving my views of the reason this legislation should not become law.

Of all the amazing legislation which the House of Representatives has passed this year, this seems to me the most extraordinary. I do not speak from a political or partisan standpoint, but I deeply and earnestly feel that the House of Representatives in passing this bill today will commit itself to something which is justified in no way by morals or justice.

Mr. Speaker, Hawaii came into the Union under very particular circumstances. You could compare it with the way in which Texas came into the Union. The islands were not purchased, they were not conquered territory, they became a part of our Republic with the full wish and acquiescence of the inhabitants of that country, and in giving this acquiescence they relied on the good faith of the United States, on the promise of the United States to observe with them the compact by which they became a part of this Republic, and that compact is to be violated today. I do not know why it is to be violated. I am not imputing political motives to the President of the United States in asking for this legislation, but surrounding it all there is an air of the greatest mystery, an air such as surrounded a little while ago a bill that came down from the State Department to the House of Representatives—and for which I spoke upon this floor, and which was afterward passed—and when it was passed was repudiated, or practically repudiated, by the State Department.

I listened with the greatest of interest and earnestness to what the very able gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DRIVER] said here, and I am a warm admirer and respecter of his; but, Mr. Speaker, if the change in Hawaii's organic law is asked on account of a crime committed a year or two ago in these islands or on account of two or three incidents which have occurred since that time, we might very well look to ourselves, because I have been in the islands and I know something about conditions there. I know these islands are law-abiding, far more, I would say, than almost any section of the United States with which I am acquainted. In all the history of these islands there have been no such barbarous crimes as we have seen committed North and South, East and West in this country of ours during many years past. If for the reason of that crime alone we are singling out a single incident against the people of these islands in order to justify ourselves in giving to them an alien Governor—alien, at least, in the sense of coming from continental United States—it is not a good reason. This is not a good excuse. These people are a law-abiding people. I was on the great island of Hawaii, large as the State of Connecticut, not long ago, and I do not know how exact this information may be, but I was told that in 20 years past there had been but one murder committed upon that island, by a Filipino who had killed his employer, and who was promptly tried and sentenced for his crime.

The islands are, of course, as the gentleman from Arkansas said, of the utmost importance to the United States. Is it not of the utmost importance to us that we yield some respect to the wishes of their people, that we select from out of the great body of descendants of missionaries and other people of fine American stock who are living in those islands today a Governor who will know and who will have the opportunity of judging what is best for the people of this beautiful part of our country? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MARTIN of Oregon). The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELTSE].

Mr. ELTSE of California. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I would appeal to you gentlemen of the House as I would appeal to a jury, and I would qualify you as I would qualify a juror by asking you if you will give fair and impartial consideration to the evidence. If there is no evidence you, as jurors, should find against the petitioner. There is no evidence, and there was none before the committee.

These islands were, as has been stated, annexed to the United States in 1898. The Organic Act was adopted in 1900. Section 5 of the rOganic Act provides that the Constitution and all the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within said Territory as elsewhere in the United States. Thereby the Constitution of the United States became the Constitution of the islands, and the laws of the United States became the laws of the islands.

Now, section 4 provides that all persons who were residents of the Republic of Hawaii on August 12, 1898 "and all the citizens of the United States, who shall hereafter reside in the Territory of Hawaii for 1 year, shall be citizens of the Territory of Hawaii."

The gentleman from Mississippi said there was no contract or covenant with the people of Hawaii and that there was nothing in the Organic Act in relation to the qualifications of the Governor. Let me read from section 66:

He—

That is the Governor—

shall be not less than 35 years of age; he shall be a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii.

Therefore no one could be Governor unless be had resided there for 1 year or more.

In 1921 section 66 of the act was amended by inserting after the provision that the Governor shall be a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii the requirement that he shall have resided therein 3 years next preceding his appointment in lieu of the 1-year residential requirement.

There was a reason for the amendment of that act in 1921. The principal reason was that L. E. Pinkham had been appointed Governor and he was not a bona fide resident of Hawaii at the time of appointment. He had been in the Philippine Islands and China gathering up coolie labor for the sugar plantations and when he was appointed Governor he brought with him a lot of carpetbaggers with resulting misrule and dissatisfaction. That was the principal reason why the act was amended.

Now, it is proposed to allow the President to appoint someone from the mainland. It is perfectly obvious that the appointment is to be given a mainlander, else the power would not be sought.

The other day the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] referred to the Constitution of the United States as being dressed with the silver buckles, the powdered wigs, and long stockings of 150 years ago. Gentlemen, you have been stripping the Constitution of the United States every day since this session began. Here today you propose to further strip the Constitution of the United States as it relates to the people of Hawaii by appointing a man from the mainland, taking away its protection from the people of the islands.

The purpose of the Constitution of the United States was to establish justice. What justice is there in taking away from the islands their Governor? The purpose of the Constitution was to insure domestic tranquillity. How do you insure domestic tranquillity by appointing a man from the mainland? How do you secure the blessings of liberty to the Hawaiians by giving to the President the power to take away their Governor and appoint an outsider?

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I have been to the Hawaiian Islands twice. At one time I spent some 30 days on the different islands. With others, we met the Governors who were there, Governors like former Governors Frear and Farrington, men who were the equal of any Member here. Some of them were eminent lawyers, even chief justices of the islands. There is no State in this whole country or anywhere we have exercised jurisdiction that is better governed or that has shown greater progress than have the Hawaiian Islands. I have wondered as I listened to this discussion what we would say if England should again be in a position to overturn the will of our people by a pronouncement, "Let us appoint a Governor from England and give him complete authority and jurisdiction over one or more States." That is one thing that caused the war by a free people who resented such officials and opposed by a revolution. If we opposed such practices, why should we seek to impose political carpetbaggers on the Hawaiians? These Hawaiian people have made a wonderful record, and I understand they are all opposed to this bill that ignores their own people and wishes in such appointments. Under this bill you will have the President advised as to whom he shall appoint as Governor. You have just had some such advice that may be well to study now. The distinguished Director of the Budget, and the head of the Bureau of Veterans, have advised the President on proper treatment to be accorded disabled veterans. Their voice is greater than that of Congress. Are you going to follow the advice of such men on the Hawaiian Governorship? The people of the Hawaiian Islands want to make their own selection, just as you want it in Texas and other States. Would you have someone appointed Governor from the mainland who is without sympathy for the Hawaiians? We would not want such a thing to happen in any State, and I remind you that while we have done so in Puerto Rico and the Philippines, these are not American Territories but "possessions" with a different status. I would want the people to select their own Governor, and I believe that right should also go to our "possessions." I say to you gentlemen, whether Democrats or Republicans, you should permit the islands to select their own Governor. That privilege they ask, and in the effort to grab political plums, let us play fair with the Hawaiians. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN].

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, very able speeches have been delivered here, and there is nothing I can add to them except to say that I, too, visited the Hawaiian Islands 16 years ago. I went over there with some 21 Members of the House and Senate, members of the Committee on Territories. Mrs. Lundeen taught school over there for 1 year. We believe in the islands, we know the islands, and we know their capacity for self-government. If you were to leave this question today to Members of the House and Senate who have actually traveled in the islands and who know the people and know the conditions there, you would have an overwhelming vote against this bill.

In this debate Members frequently refer to the Hawaiian Islands as though there were but one island. It is true that there is only one large city—Honolulu—in the Hawaiian group of islands. This city is located on the island of Oahu. Here is located the seat of government of these islands.

The largest island in the group is the island of Hawaii. Upon this island are located the famous snow-capped extinct volcanoes—Mauna Loa, with an elevation of 13,675 feet above sea level, and Mauna Kea, with an elevation of 13,825 feet above sea level. On this island is also located the world's greatest active volcano—Kilauea—near Hilo, the largest city of the island of Hawaii. To see this fiery crater at night is the most awe-inspiring scene in all this earth.

We have had the pleasure of visiting Puuwaawaa ranch, a ranch of about 100,000 acres, owned and operated by Senator Robert Hind and family, and the marvels of that ranch and its surrounding territory are beyond my powers of description; and we hope some day to return to these islands and her people.

Our committee made a careful survey of these islands. We had a most delightful journey through the beautiful and fertile island of Kauai. Interisland steamers connect these various islands with passenger and transport service. There is also airplane service between the islands.

There are a number of other islands which are of importance in the group, and it would be well for our good citizens to get a map of the Hawaiian Islands—and I am sure you can get that by writing to the very able and distinguished Delegate in Congress from the Territory of Hawaii, the Honorable LINCOLN L. MCCANDLESS, who I am sure will be glad to furnish information and maps concerning these islands.

From a naval and military point of view these islands are of tremendous importance. They hold the key to the Pacific and the southern oceans. For more than 2,000 miles between the California coast and these islands there is an unbroken sea with not an acre of land, until finally you come upon this paradise of the Pacific, where cultured ladies and gentlemen reside—as fine a type of American citizen as can be found underneath the American flag. They are law-abiding, patriotic, American citizens, and their record in that respect far exceeds the record of the mainland, and I want to say that anyone who reflects upon these beautiful, wonderful islands and their splendid people because of any one incident which may have occurred among her people is not using good judgment. You must look over a period of a hundred years and more of history and take the average, and when you have done that you will find that they have a glorious history and that they are a splendid and a wonderful people, descended from the best races of Europe and that the Asiatics who are there are employed as servants of these people, who are highly educated, well financed, and well equipped to govern their islands. I want to say that they compare favorably with the finest and best people we have in any State of the American Union. I know, because I have lived among them for 28 days. I know, because Mrs. Lundeen, known to the people of the Hawaiian Islands as Norma Ward, served there as a teacher for more than a year, met these people every day, saw their children, noted their progress, and came back with the highest praise for these islands and her people.

Mrs. Lundeen was born in San Francisco, Calif., and frequently came in contact with the leading citizens of these islands and knows well these fine people. I have known Governors of the Hawaiian Islands personally. I have known their Delegates in Congress, both now and 16 years ago, including Prince Jonah Kuhio Kalanianaole, an able and distinguished gentleman, who served continuously for 20 years in the American Congress, and nothing can shake my confidence in their ability and in their integrity and in their patriotism.

To take from them self-government and send carpetbagging Governors in there, in order to pay off some political debt to some Democrat who does not know A B C about these islands, is an injustice to these people and a blow at their pride in their Hawaiian State. In my opinion, the Hawaiian Islands ought to be a State in the American Union, with 2 Senators and 1 or more Representatives in Congress.

I am in favor of keeping the islands well fortified. I am in favor of maintaining their harbors in a high state of efficiency, so that our warships may find shelter there and our merchant fleet in our very expanding Pacific trade may find there a port and a refuge.

There are seven good-sized islands in this group of surpassing interest and scenic beauty. I would like to have Members of Congress go out to these islands and try to tell these people that they are not capable of self-government. They would come back thoroughly ashamed of any such inference or reference, and they would come back to this floor and assert that they are as capable of self-government as any State in the Union, and that they are governing themselves as wisely as any one of our 48 States.

Very few people know that these islands have tremendous sugar industries, and that their pineapple fields are among the largest in the world, if not the largest; that their canneries fill our vegetable cellars with all sorts of wonderful canned goods; that their fisheries are of great importance.

But far and above all, these islands are the outlying bulwark and protection for the western coast of these great United States. It behooves us well to maintain good will with these fine people, and it ill behooves us to cast any reflections upon them, and it is a serious mistake to take any measure of self-government from them. We need their hearty cooperation, and in some day of great future trial and trouble, when Uncle Sam will need all of his children, he will find that in the front rank of the defenders of America, stand the Hawaiian people, sons and daughters of pioneers, missionaries, and natives, and others, who inhabit the islands; and they will form an invincible bulwark against any foreign foe that may seek entrance to our Pacific coast.

These people are highly intelligent; they have traveled widely and American citizens who have been their guests in the islands will not look with any favor upon any hostile action taken against the Hawaiian Islands here today.

I was glad to come to the floor on Monday and add my voice and vote which in part resulted in the defeat of this proposed measure and now we are being faced with a Democratic rule from the Rules Committee which seeks to force down the throats of these people, government from the mainland, administration by people who do not understand the islands and their people. I am against this rule and I am against this bill.

I hope my good friends in the Hawaiian Islands will know that I stood by them and that I helped fight their battle for Hawaii. [Applause.]

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, our friend from New York [Mr. SNELL] seems to forget past history. Mr. Pinkney was not born on these islands. He came from the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Mr. McCarthy was not born on these islands. He came from the great city of San Francisco.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. Governor Farrington, a Republican appointee, was not born on the islands. He came, likewise, from the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Oh, it is all right when Republicans are doing the selecting and the appointing. When they picked a Governor General for Puerto Rico, did they pick a resident of the islands? No; they picked our good friend and former colleague from Iowa, Mr. Horace Towner, from this very House, and sent him to Puerto Rico to preside over and control those people in a foreign land. It was all right then. It was Republican procedure under Snell regime.

I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. As a matter of fact, so far as I know there is nothing said about a man being born on the islands. The law provides that he must be a resident of the islands at the time of the appointment. That is the law. Why not confine yourself to the law?

Mr. BLANTON. I cannot yield further. Did you know that such a distinguished American citizen from the mainland as Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., a Republican, the son of an illustrious sire, was Governor General of Puerto Rico? Did you know that he was afterward made Governor General of the Philippines? He came from the mainland.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, but I cannot.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, just one minute. I want to get something out of my system. The gentleman from New York says that we ought not to do this because it is politics, it is partisanship, it is patronage, that the President just wants to remove a Republican and put in a Democrat. If that were the only reason, I would say it would be sufficient. I want to see every Republican officeholder in this Government removed and a good loyal outstanding Democrat put in his place. [Applause.]

The gentleman from New York forgets that just as soon as the Republican Party came into power it removed every Democratic postmaster in the country and put in their places Republican postmasters, who ever since have been donating out of their little salary so much per month to the Republican campaign fund. Every postmaster in my State has been donating to that fund, and we are here to put a stop to it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I decline to yield, Mr. Speaker. There is not one word in the treaty with Hawaii that requires us to appoint a man from that country; not one word. Get that! I challenge the minority leader, with all of his astuteness, I challenge him to produce one syllable of that treaty that shows that we are under obligation to appoint someone from Hawaii. There is not one word.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No. Just a minute.

Mr. SNELL. I accept the gentleman's challenge.

Mr. BLANTON. Not from the treaty.

Mr. SNELL. I said the organic act. I did not say the treaty.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I am talking about the treaty.

Mr. SNELL. Well, we are talking about the organic act.

Mr. BLANTON. You cannot mix up this bill.

Mr. SNELL. And you were quoting me.

Mr. BLANTON. I decline to yield to the former Chairman of the Rules Committee, Mr. Speaker.

Oh, there was an act of Congress passed; not a word in the treaty. There was an act of Congress passed, that somebody got through, requiring them to be there 1 year. Any Congress on earth can change its own acts whenever it gets ready. They first made it 1 year. Then when the Republicans got in, under the Snell regime in 1921, they were afraid that we Democrats would come back and remove their Republicans and so in 1921 they enlarged that and passed another statute, raising it to 3 years. [Laughter.] If they can raise it from 1 year to 3 years, why cannot we obliterate the one and go back to where we were under the treaty? We have the same right.

Now, the lawyer who spoke from the other side of the aisle said he wanted to qualify you as a jury. I want to qualify you in behalf of the United States Government. I want to ask you whether or not you know of a single reason, when you come to vote on this question, that would prevent you from rendering a fair and impartial verdict on this matter to the people of the United States; to the 120,000,000 people of this mainland. Is there anything that keeps you from rendering a fair and impartial trial to them?

We know those factions are existing there now. All the junketeers that have been over to Hawaii years ago and have returned have been banqueted there. They know that the present Governor is weak. They know he cannot control the situation over there. They know about the Massie crime. They know about the crime that occurred there yesterday. I want to say that the President of the United States wants permission to pick an outstanding American, an American of good judgment, an American of wisdom and sagacity; a man who has knowledge of how to mix with people; a man who knows how to make friends with them; a man who is able to earn and deserve their confidence. No Ben Lindsey is going there. No authors of free love are going there. No authors of companionate marriage are going there. It is going to be an outstanding American of whom you will be proud and I will be proud.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield to my friend.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Do you think it will be a Democrat or a Republican who will get this job?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, what does the gentleman think about it?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I do not know. I am asking you.

Mr. BLANTON. While I cannot speak for the President of the United States, I know he is not going to put a man over there who is not a loyal, 100-percent Democrat. [Applause and laughter.]

I want to tell the minority leader that before we celebrate Christmas eve, before he hears the sleigh bells jingling again, we are going to have a good Democrat in every single post office in the United States [applause and laughter], and we are going to have Democrats running this Government again.

Why, it is so easy for Brother SNELL to think about Mellon. He has been used to cutting melons, and he has been associating with melon cutters so long that he imagines the President has looked up and found out that there is $10,000,000 in the Treasury that could be split up and divided. That does not do you justice, Brother SNELL. You are not the SNELL I have always thought you were if you have such thoughts as that. That is beneath your dignity.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman obey the rules of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. That is beneath the gentleman's dignity.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman sit down.

Mr. BLANTON. I have not transgressed the rules of the House.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the words of the gentleman from Texas be taken down.

Mr. BLANTON. I am willing to have them taken down.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I move that they be expunged.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. MARTIN of Oregon]. The gentleman from Texas will take his seat.

Mr. BLANTON. At Republican command.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman should sit down.

Mr. BLANTON. At Republican command.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I insist on the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is going to sit where he damn pleases.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I insist on my point of order. That is not his seat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. MARTIN of Oregon]. The gentleman from Texas will take his seat in the seats provided for Members of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I still insist that the gentleman take a proper seat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will take care of the situation. The gentleman will take his seat in the seats provided for Members of Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms will remove that chair.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is out of order and may not be recognized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A point of order is pending.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas must take his seat. There are plenty of seats.

A MEMBER. Take this seat.

Mr. BLANTON. It was a Democrat, not a Republican, who gave me this seat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the words objected to.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The words objected to are the words immediately preceding my request.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the words objected to.

The Clerk read as follows:

He has been so used to cutting melons and has been associated with melon cutters so long that he imagines the President has looked up and found out there is $10,000,000 in the Treasury that could be split up and divided. That does not do you justice, Brother SNELL. You are not the SNELL I have always thought you were if you have such thoughts as that. That is beneath your dignity.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that does not violate the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Under the rules a Member may not refer to another Member by name.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the further point of order that the gentleman did not refer to him except either as "Mr." or "Brother" SNELL, expressions that are frequently used on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. A Member may not do that, though, as the Chair understands the rules.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute "Mr." for "Brother."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the gentleman from Texas may not be heard.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the "Brother SNELL" part and put in place thereof "the gentleman from New York, the minority leader."

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. I was inquiring what Mr. SNELL meant when he said he thought the President wanted to divide a $10,000,000 melon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the remainder of the remarks hold the gentleman from New York up to ridicule, and that is a violation of the rule.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I make the request that there be added to the words taken down the words which the gentleman from Texas spoke when directed by the Speaker pro tempore to take his seat. The gentleman from Texas said:

I will sit where I damn please.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I did not say that to the Chair. I said that to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], and I repeat it to him.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the gentleman from Texas be permitted to proceed in order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 263, nays 92, answered "present" 3, not voting 72, as follows:

Mr. Richards with Mr. Kee.
Mr. Lehr with Mr. Sadowski.
Mr. Lewis of Colorado with Mr. Kocialkowski.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas will proceed in order. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I make a privileged motion. I move that the words spoken by the gentleman from Texas in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and reported to the House be expunged from the RECORD.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the gentleman is too late.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor. I have been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. RANKIN. I make the point of order that the gentleman from New Jersey is too late. That motion should have been made before the motion was made and carried to permit the gentleman from Texas to proceed in order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman will yield, we are not in Committee of the Whole; we are in the House.

Mr. RANKIN. We have not been in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. If the gentleman will watch the mace, he will know that.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I am perfectly aware of that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is in order. There has been no intervening business.

The question is on the motion to expunge from the RECORD the remarks referred to by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a good many Members were absent when the words were spoken by the gentleman. I ask unanimous consent that they may be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the remarks referred to will be again reported to the House.

The Clerk again read the words referred to.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] by including in the language to be stricken out the language used by the gentleman from New York, which reflects on the President. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL and Mr. LEHLBACH rose.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. If the gentleman will refer to the language I used, that is unparliamentary——

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman from Texas has quoted it and by clear implication it reflects upon the President.

Mr. BLANTON. I will read it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, no; the gentleman will read nothing.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman will refer to any language I made reflecting on the President of the United States, I will gladly apologize for it and ask that it be stricken out, but I want the exact language and not what the gentleman from Texas states I said.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Permit me to say that with that statement of the gentleman, if he will now have the language read and stricken out, I will not offer the amendment.

Mr. SNELL. But I want my exact language.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the following language of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] be stricken from this RECORD, which reads as follows, and I quote from the stenographic report——

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. There is pending before the House a motion in the form of an amendment to my motion. Therefore, anything that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] may now move is not presently in order.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. My motion covers it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. And, Mr. Speaker, this being the first opportunity I have had, I make a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama on the ground that the amendment to my motion is not germane. We are dealing with language reported to the House and uttered by the gentleman from Texas, and language spoken in Committee by anybody else is not a germane amendment, to my motion.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York will withdraw his language about the President, I will withdraw mine about him, but he ought to withdraw that first, and I want the gentleman from Alabama to read the language.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will yield, in order that this issue may be clarified I suggest the gentleman from Texas point out specifically the language of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] that he objects to.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me read it, and it was the language I took exception to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Have it reported from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, there is a point of order pending.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] is not germane to my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains that point of order.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Then I ask recognition on my motion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I think it is about time that we respected our dignity as a legislative body and showed, as a matter of self-respect, individually and collectively, that we have no sympathy with the clowning exhibited here on the floor.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order, and demand that that language be taken down.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts) there were 75 ayes and 141 noes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PARSONS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. I should like to know whether or not this is a filibuster and what is the purpose of it?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary question.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, may we have the remarks of the gentleman from Texas again reported?

There being no objection, the Clerk again reported the remarks.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks of the gentleman from New York be read.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I object to that, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman cannot interrupt a roll call in that way.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 112, nays 238, answered "present" 4, not voting 76, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. LEHLBACH was rejected.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. McDuffie with Mr. Merritt.
Mr. Rayburn with Mr. Lemke.
Mr. Steagall with Mr. Sinclair.
Mr. McMillan with Mr. Moynihan.
Mr. McReynolds with Mr. Richardson.
Mr. Sumners of Texas with Mr. Utterback.

Mr. Kee with Mr. Martin of Oregon.
Mr. Wilson with Mr. Hornor.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. PETERSON] was called away on account of the serious illness of his father.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my demand that the words of the gentleman from New Jersey be taken down.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply grateful to my Democratic colleagues for protecting me in my rights here. In general debate, the minority leader, Mr. SNELL, used the following language:

> Mr. Speaker, the only reason given on the floor of the House for making this change is that the President requested it.

Then he later said:

> The only reason I can see why you want to change it is that you have found out that they have $10,000,000 in the Treasury and you want to divide it among deserving Democrats.

It was the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] who made the above serious accusation. That brought forth my reference to it. I made a mistake in brothering the minority leader, and I will not do it any more. [Laughter and applause.] I advise you Democratic Members on the floor not to brother any Republican in the House on the floor.

What did the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] mean when he said that all on earth the bill meant was to divide $10,000,000 among deserving Democrats? Does he mean that the Democrats want to steal from the Hawaiian people $10,000,000? If he did, and that is what the words mean, I had a right to tell him that it was beneath the dignity of the minority leader, and it is beneath the dignity of any leader of the great Republican Party on the floor to attribute such a purpose to our present Democratic organization. [Laughter.]

Oh, that laughter comes from the Republican side, too. If there had been no such assertion from the gentleman from New York, Mr. SNELL, there would have been no such remarks from me.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas is out of order in calling my name.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Texas take his seat.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I put my language properly. I said if there had been no such aspersion from "the gentleman from New York, Mr. SNELL", which is in order. I had a right to use that language.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is improper to refer to any gentleman by name.

Mr. BLANTON. If there had been no aspersion from the gentleman from New York, the minority leader, I would not have made my remarks, but, Mr. Speaker, there is "a new deal" in this House now. You Republicans used to try to hamstring me every time I got on this floor. They have done me injustice after injustice under Republican rule, but, thank God, there is now a new deal in this House. The Democrats are in power, and you Republicans cannot do injustice any more.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the improper remarks I read from the gentleman from New York, together with my reference to him, and also the very improper speech of the gentleman from New Jersey be stricken from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, my remarks stay in then, in answer to the gentleman from New York, in defense of the President of the United States, and the Democratic administration. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN].

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas has just made a very unfair reference to the expenses of the investigation trips made by Members of Congress to the Hawaiian Islands. When I went over there in 1917 with a group of Members from the House and Senate—21 in all—the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii generously provided for the expense.

The unbounded good will and hospitality of the Hawaiian Islands is well known throughout the world, and no reflection against that good will and hospitality will be left unchallenged as long as I am a Member on this floor.

This trip did not cost Uncle Sam a dollar. Members paid their own way to St. Louis, and from there on we were taken care of by Territorial money. It is very important that members of the Committee on Territories—and I was then a member of that committee—should investigate at first hand the Hawaiian Islands and the Alaskan Territory. The boundless resources of these islands and the Alaskan Territory cannot be appreciated unless there is first-hand contact with the Territories and their people. Both of these Territories are veritable storehouses of wealth, and Members of Congress would do well to take of their time and their own money to visit these remote places where the American flag flies in the sky as it does on the mainland and where a pioneer people are still maintaining the pioneer spirit.

Mr. Speaker, I want the splendid people of the wonderful Hawaiian Territory to know that Members of Congress appreciate their hospitality and their good will, and that we will never forget them. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I think it has been rather unfortunate that the attention of the House has been distracted by what has taken place here during the last hour or so from the consideration of the resolution before the House, a resolution involving as it does the fundamental right of a people to self-government. It ought to be considered seriously. It ought not to be befogged or lost sight of by any bickerings here between the Members of the House or by the consideration of any questions of cheap partisan politics. It is an important matter. It relates to the right of a people to self-government. It is of vital importance to the people of Hawaii. The fact that this resolution is before the House today is a striking indication of the distance that the Democratic Party has traveled from its leadership of a few years ago under President Wilson. It is a far cry from his policy of self-determination and the right of self-government of the peoples of small nations to this resolution. That policy was perhaps the most important one of the 14 points announced by President Wilson as the basis for settling the World War. The passion for self-government is inherent in all people, and there is no reason why the people of the Hawaiian Islands should not continue to have this right, the same as they have had since they became a part of the United States.

What is the resolution before the House? What does it propose? I have before me the report of the committee reporting the resolution. It quotes section 66 of the Hawaiian Organic Act. There has been some dispute as to whether this right to be governed by one of their own number was ever assured to the people of the Hawaiian Islands. It was assured to them in the organic act according to the report of the committee. Section 66 provides, so the report says, that the executive power of the government of the Territory of Hawaii shall be vested in a Governor who shall be appointed by the President, and among other qualifications—

> He shall not be less than 35 years of age.

Then the pertinent language, so far as this resolution is concerned, is as follows:

> Shall be a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii, shall have resided therein for at least 3 years next preceding his appointment.

That language of existing law is to be stricken out, if the resolution before us is passed, and there is to be substituted in its stead the following:

> Shall be a citizen of the United States.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] called attention to the fact that the Governor of the Philippine Islands and the Governor of Puerto Rico are usually natives of continental United States. The cases are not parallel at all. Alaska and Hawaii are Territorial possessions of the United States; they are a part of the United States. The Philippines and Puerto Rico are insular possessions, and the same rule does not apply to the Territorial possessions that applies to the insular possessions.

Reference has been made here to the Democratic platform of 1928. I call the attention of Republicans at least to the plank in the Republican platform of 1932 on this subject. It expressly declared:

> We believe that the existing status of self-government which for many years has been enjoyed by the citizens of the Territory of Hawaii should be maintained, and that officials appointed to administer the government should be bona-fide residents of the Territory.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of partisan politics. It is a question of the fundamental right of a people to self-government, and it ought to be settled upon that basis. [Applause.]

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, this "tempest in a teapot" which brought forth the unparliamentary language of my colleague from Texas was in part justified by the language used by the minority leader from New York. He talked about the Democrats, meaning, I suppose, the administration, "dividing $10,000,000 among deserving Democrats." Of course, if you take the number of Democrats who voted in the last election, that would be just about 50 cents a piece.

The Republicans were never such pikers. [Laughter.] They used to take about $500,000,000 a year under a high protective tariff and divide it among about 12 of their chief campaign contributors [applause], and in the course of 12 years they took between four and five billion dollars, and under the guise of "tax refunds" also divided that money among their chief campaign contributors [applause]; so that we Democrats are only "small fry" when it comes to putting our hands into the Public Treasury. The compliment is ours, that we do know "division", which the Republicans never knew. [Applause and laughter.]

Now, this proposition before us is a simple matter. On May 22, 1933, the President of the United States sent the following message to Congress requesting this authority:

To the Congress:

It is particularly necessary to select for the post of Governor of Hawaii a man of experience and vision who will be regarded by all citizens of the islands as one who will be absolutely impartial in his decisions on matters as to which there may be a difference of local opinion. In making my choice, I should like to be free to pick either from the islands themselves or from the entire United States the best man for this post. I request, therefore, suitable legislation temporarily suspending that part of the law which requires the Governor of Hawaii to be an actual resident of the islands.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 22, 1933.

The President has not said he is going to appoint any person other than a resident of Hawaii. All this talk about the "organic law" as if that legislation were a permanent, unrepealable instrument is not consonant with what we know about laws. All laws are temporary, and the Republicans themselves have amended this law in many respects; why they amended it in 1921 by increasing the term of the residence requirement. All this talk as to one particular individual being appointed is a lot of poppycock.

The other day, under suspension of the rules on this bill, some of the Democrats, ill-advised—and I say that respectfully—joined with the Republicans, and the solid Republican front, carrying out the deliberate plan and purpose of the minority in this session to block the President at every move, defeated this bill. Oh, the Republicans may say, "We voted for your bills", but they have never done other than present a united front against the consideration of any of the President's measures. They have stood more solidly against the President's program and the administration program in this session of Congress than at any time within the six Congresses of which I have been a Member. It is no alibi for them to say that on the "final vote" they voted for the bill, because then they were "put on the spot" and they were forced to show whether they were with the attempt to remedy conditions in this country, whether they were with the reconstruction program which our President has laid out to bring us out of this depression. But up to the point of voting for the passage of the bills, on every preliminary rule for the consideration of the measures, the Republicans have stood together to defeat the purposes of the President and the Democratic administration which the people of America have placed in power.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is the history of their help, and the country should know it. This talk of "cooperation", as I said earlier in the session, is just Republican bait to the people, who I am sure will not be deceived.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I know when some Members on the Democratic side have fallen in line with the Republicans it is because they have been misguided. When a little measure like this bill comes before us—one which our President earnestly requests—in that same determined program to block him at every step, the united Republican Party stood here the other day and voted against this simple request. That is the history of this session of Congress when it shall have been written, and the final votes as to whether or not we should have the legislation is no index of any contribution by the Republican Party to cure the desperate situation in our country.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. For a simple question.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman just referred to this resolution as a simple thing. Does the gentleman really consider this proposal as a simple thing?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I certainly do. I do not believe it pertains at all to the "independence" of Hawaii. I believe that is just a partisan cloak to defeat the measure. With that beautiful island out there in the Far East being so important to us, and we being so important to it and its inhabitants, it must be true, as the President said in his message, that, due to "differences of local opinion" he might deem it necessary that someone, who has not yet taken sides, someone who has not stultified himself by reason of residence there, should be placed "temporarily", as the President said, to administer the affairs of that island. The Governor General does not interfere with local self-government. He is merely the head of a government which functions untrammelled.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield for another short question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Is there anything in this bill indicating that it is of a temporary nature?

Mr. O'CONNOR. All laws are temporary. The gentleman must know that, as an experienced legislator. We cannot pass permanent law. Any law that we do pass can be repealed tomorrow.

Mr. MOTT. And the gentleman thinks the President used the word "temporary" in that sense?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do. I believe the President has a real purpose to serve. I do not know that he has made up his mind, but I do know that the concern of the United States and its interest in Hawaii and Hawaii's interest in the United States and the needed protection of the United States for Hawaii is important enough to give the President this power which he has so earnestly requested. [Applause.]

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5767) to authorize the appointment of the Governor of Hawaii without regard to his being a citizen or resident of Hawaii.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 5767, with Mr. FULLER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, may we have some agreement with reference to time?

The CHAIRMAN. That is provided for in the resolution. The Chairman of the Committee on the Territories has 30 minutes, and the ranking minority member has 30 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] stated that there had been a tempest in a teapot. I agree with him insofar as the discussion has revolved about $10,000,000. The fact is there is no $10,000,000 in the treasury of Hawaii. It is not my purpose to question the word of the distinguished gentleman from New York, the minority leader, or the word of any other Member. I want to read from the report of the Governor of Hawaii for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1932. They once had $10,000,000, but today the balance in the treasury from all sources is $4,236,000. In 1931 the balance was $9,137,000. So I believe my colleague from Texas was positively right, in view of this rapid depletion of the funds in the treasury of Hawaii, when he said that the islands needed a Democratic Governor.

We have heard a great deal of discussion this afternoon about the rule of the people in the islands of Hawaii. Just who are the people we hear talked about? Let me say that the native Hawaiians constitute only 6 percent of the whole population of 380,000 people. There are 5 percent of Caucasian Hawaiians, 4 percent of Asiatic Hawaiians, 7 percent Chinese, 9 percent Portuguese, 20 percent Filipinos, and 38 percent Japanese. Are these Asiatics and continentals and orientals the people you are talking about that you want to rule these islands?

I wish I could dispel for a moment the idea of distance that seems to exist in the minds of Members of this House. Forget for a moment, if you please, the 2,100 miles between the Pacific coast and the Hawaiian Islands, and think of them as only a few miles away—and they are really a part of this great country of ours.

The total commerce of the Hawaiian Islands annually is $189,694,404. Of this they export $101,548,555 to the United States. They export only $1,189,280 to foreign countries. In turn, they import $79,092,387 from this country of ours, and only $7,864,381 from all foreign countries.

So these islands are just as much a part of the United States as any one of the 48 States, with the exception that they are out there in the crossroads of the Pacific 2,100 miles away.

Mr. Chairman, the islands of the Hawaiian group are agricultural-producing islands. I find their chief crops are pineapples and sugar. Also they produce coffee, molasses, rice, bananas, nuts, vegetables, wool, hides and skins, honey, and beeswax. I do not mean the hula-hula honeys. They produce some livestock; they produce fish products, and they export these to the United States.

The people of the Hawaiian Islands are a peaceful people. Way back as far as 1857 the then reigning king expressed the desire to have the islands annexed to the United States.

We have heard much about this being a partisan issue. Let me give you some further facts from the report of this Governor, Gov. Lawrence Judd, who was appointed 4 years ago by President Hoover.

We find that in the Legislature in Hawaii in 1931 there were 14 Republicans and 1 Democrat. We find in the house of representatives in 1931 there were 27 Republicans and 3 Democrats. So, of course, I do not censure or criticize my friends on the minority side for hanging on to this one remaining stronghold of Republicanism away out in the Pacific Ocean today. It matters not, Mr. Chairman, that the country was swept from the Gulf to the Lakes, from the eastern coast on the Atlantic to the last promontory on the Pacific by a great Democratic landslide. We should not censure our friends on the minority side for hanging on to this last of all Republican strongholds like a mother to her first-born or the dimpled stenog to the sugar daddy.

Mr. Chairman, we find that in the past 32 years we have only had three Democratic Delegates from the island of Hawaii, including our distinguished colleague, Mr. McCANDLESS. If it were possible that he were to be the new Governor I think I might favor his contention, but since this seems not to be in the picture I certainly want to give the President of the United States full authority and power to appoint whoever he deems is the man to fill this place, whether he comes from the island of Hawaii or any place in these United States of ours.

Do you mean to tell me that among all the 120,000,000 people there is not one qualified or fit to succeed this Republican Governor they boast about? I cannot speak for our friends on the minority side, but what about the 315 Democrats on this side of the House? I am sure every one of them is fully qualified to fill this position, and if in 1934 the people back in his district should vote for a new deal he would gladly offer himself as a sacrifice.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is something more to this bill. Today the agriculture of Hawaii, like the agriculture of our own country, has been going down. This has been going on year by year for the past 12 years. The average production and shipment of pineapples, their chief crop, up until 2 years ago was 12,500,000 cases. Last year the shipment was 6,000,000 cases, and they are still holding millions of cases in storage.

This has necessitated new taxes. So they are in the same position we are. They are wanting a new deal over there, and as the people of this country voted in November 1932, they voted not only for a new deal but they have a man in the White House today who is giving them a new deal; and I say to you on the Democratic side of this House that there is every reason why we should vote en masse for this bill which the President asked us to vote for, and there is no reason whatsoever for any Democrat voting "no" on this measure.

Now, what is it that the President asks? I want to quote you some of the words of this Republican Governor who, they tell us, ought not and should not be replaced. This is from his own report and here is what he says:

The President appoints the Governor, who is held responsible. There should be no divided authority. The one weakness in Hawaii's organic act proved in 30 years is the limitation placed on the Governor's power of removal. He now may remove only with the consent of the Territorial senate. Correction of present limited authority of the Chief Executive is found in the proposed bill to give the Governor the power of removal. He then is directly and completely responsible to the Secretary of the Interior and to the President. He can call his subordinates to account; and this is as it should be.

So the President of the United States is asking for nothing more than this Governor of Hawaii asks for himself. He merely asks to have the right and the power designated by Congress to not be confined to 146,000 Japanese residents, to not be confined to 65,000 Filipinos or 27,000 Chinese, but to be able to go back in the States and pick the best man possible for this job. [Applause.]

REPORT OF THE GOVERNOR OF HAWAII

The production of sugar in Hawaii for the sugar year ending September 30, 1931, was 993,787 short tons harvested from approximately 138,000 acres. The total acres planted in cane in Hawaii approximated 252,000 in 1931.

For a period of 5 years the production of canned pineapples averaged about eight and one half million cases. At this level of production and the then buying power of the consuming public the product moved into consumption at good prices and the industry was prosperous. In the calendar year 1930 the production jumped to 12,672,296 cases, and for the calendar year 1931 amounted to 12,726,291 cases. The output for 1932 will not exceed 6,000,000 cases.

Many thousands of tons of pineapples have been left in the fields and the planting of new areas has been restricted. This unfortunate condition of the pineapple industry has decreased the taxable assets of the Territory, lowered the buying power of many of our people, and thrown others out of employment.

To depart from this sound principle of concentrated executive control is to invite friction, divide responsibility, hamper accountability by promoting the gentle art of buck passing, sow the seeds of bureaucratic competition for political control and favor, * * *.

No one in the United States better understands or appreciates the value of Hawaii as a defensive outpost than the citizens residing in Hawaii. That it is continually on their minds is evidenced by the frequency with which it appears in conversation, the public utterances, and the written documents of old and young. Hawaii has been preaching that doctrine since 1854, when one of the most famous of the Kamehameha kings sought annexation of his domain to the United States. * * *

TAX SYSTEM IN HAWAII

An excise tax on public utilities measured against gross income on a sliding scale in ratio of net operating profit to gross operating income with a minimum rate of 5 percent.

An excise tax measured by net income against Federal and Territorial banks at a rate of 10 percent.

The redrafting of the income-tax law and increasing rate levied against corporation from 5 to 7½ percent.

Making it mandatory on employer to collect the poll tax from employees.

Increasing the tax rate on insurance companies from 2 to 2½ percent.

A motor-fuel sales tax of 3 cents per gallon, proceeds of which are used exclusively for highway purposes.

POPULATION AND RACE STATISTICS

The population of Hawaii on June 30, 1932, as estimated by the bureau of sanitation of the board of health, was 380,507.

The first census of the Hawaiian Islands was taken in 1832 and was followed by censuses in 1836, 1850, 1853, and 1860. These were very simple and rudimentary in character. There was no provision for taking a census at regular periods until 1865, when the legislative assembly made it the duty of the board of education to make a complete census of the Kingdom every sixth year, counting from the year 1860. These were taken until 1896, and in 1900 the first Federal census was taken.

Population of Hawaii, 1832 to 1930

1832	130,313
1836	108,579
1850	84,165

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. McCANDLESS].

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Chairman, the question before us today was settled by the rules of this House 2 days ago, but the powers that regulate things here have gone back to the committee and come back with a horseshoe covered up in a glove to give us a knock-out blow. I see no reason why this should be done. I see no reason why the Democratic Party should desert the Democrats in Hawaii. I was elected against a Republican who belittled the Democrats of the South and said they were going to take our Government away from us, and I pleaded with the people. I said, "Do not believe him. I know the Democrats of the South. I was brought up in West Virginia and I know the people of that country. The Democrats believe in home rule. They were carpetbagged pretty near to death after the Civil War, and I do not believe the Democrats will take the right of home rule away from us."

Now, it is up to you people. It is up to the Democrats to stand by one of your own kind, and I say this in the interest of the Democratic Party in Hawaii, in the interests of all the people of Hawaii, and in the interests of the entire United States.

The gentleman who spoke just prior to me enumerated how many Democratic senators there were in the Hawaiian Legislature. Two years ago we had only one. Now we have four Democrats in the senate. Two years ago we only had 3 representatives in the house of representatives out of 30. Today we have 10, through the last election; and I will guarantee, if you do not pass this bill or if you will leave us alone, the next Legislature of Hawaii will be Democratic.

There has been a great deal said here today about why there is this prejudice against Hawaii. I want to tell you this has been my difficulty since I have been here.

The forestry bill appropriations were denied to Hawaii. We were denied the benefit of the bill you passed here, and the leaders of the Democratic Party turned me down—a Democrat—and did not allow Hawaii to have any benefits under this appropriation.

I have here a cable from the Governor of Hawaii, saying that in the biennial period ending June 30, 1931, we spent in forestry work $290,697.08. For the biennial period ending June 30, 1933, we appropriated $223,708 to take care of the forests, and this year, for the period 1933 to 1935, we appropriated only $65,800, on account of the depression and on account of the condition of our finances in Hawaii. Why should we not participate? The forest lands of Hawaii belong to the United States. They do not belong to the Territory. You reserved the right in the organic act so that you could have all the land that belonged to the Territory that you wanted.

In 1876 a reciprocity treaty was made between our monarchical form of government and the United States.

It would be well if you Democrats would study that reciprocity treaty that was made in 1876 between the King of Hawaii and the United States. You then got Pearl Harbor, where you now put your men-of-war. After that, under that same organic act, all the land of Hawaii was given to the United States without a dollar payment on the part of the United States. And besides that you got the Schofield Barracks, which was government land at that time—consisting of about 4,000 acres—and not a dollar did you pay for it. All this for purposes of Army and Navy defense.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCANDLESS. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman state the area in miles of Hawaii.

Mr. McCANDLESS. It consists of about 7,000 square miles in the eight islands that are inhabited.

Now, Fort Shafter, just outside of the city of Honolulu consists of about a thousand acres of land, worth at that time three or four hundred thousand dollars, and today probably it is worth $10,000 an acre for home purposes.

All that was given to you for nothing, and you have the Schofield and Shafter Barracks there now. This shows we have cooperated in maintaining the national defense of Hawaii.

Why should we not participate in the appropriations? I want to show you what we have been doing.

We are an agricultural community. We are tillers of the soil. Do you people realize that Hawaii, ending June 30, 1932, paid more income tax than Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Idaho, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Utah, Vermont, Wyoming, and Alaska? All these 17 States and Alaska paid less income tax in 1932 than did Hawaii. And yet when it comes to appropriations you have denied to Hawaii a participation in those appropriations.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCANDLESS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Has not the protection of the Stars and Stripes since 1900 been worth all that to Hawaii?

Mr. McCANDLESS. I do not deny that. But do not the Stars and Stripes protect those 17 States I named? And do they not, with their 32 Senators and many more Representatives, get all possible benefits from Federal appropriations, many of which are denied Hawaii?

Mr. BLANTON. And we have protected them without any financial return from the islands. And Hawaii would not lose our protection for 100 times the amount she has paid the Government.

Mr. McCANDLESS. Oh, no. Here is what a man from the Interior Department says about that. He was sent down there to investigate the conditions in Hawaii. He says:

> A balancing of the books as between Hawaii and the Federal Government showed that during the first 30 years that it was a part of the United States it had sent $171,000,000 to Washington, while the Federal Government had spent upon activities that might properly be charged up against the Territory about $32,000,000, leaving a net profit to the Federal Government of some $149,000,000 in taxes received from the islands.

And then you deny us the right to participate in appropriations that you make here.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have been a victim of a certain feeling of antagonism here in this House—not caused by me, not caused by the people of Hawaii.

There was flaunted in my face today the statement that we were not capable of self-government.

You sent a man down there 1 year ago by the name of Seth Richardson, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, and here is what he says about Hawaii:

> We found in Hawaii no organized crime, no important criminal class, and no criminal rackets.
> We did not find substantial evidence that a crime wave, so called, was in existence in Honolulu, either disproportionate with the increase in the population or when viewed in comparison with crime records in cities of similar size on the mainland.

They quoted from a paper here this morning about some Army or Navy men who had been abused at Waikiki. Perhaps they were intoxicated. Who knows? They did not tell you that in the same paper this morning there was a report of where two robbers went into a man's home here in Washington and tied up his family and robbed them. They did not tell you that. You have crime here as well as we have it in Hawaii, and Congress is in direct control of the affairs of this city. In Hawaii we spent $25,000 to learn the truth of this Massie case that you have spoken of. We sent for a Pinkerton man from one of the greatest detective agencies in this land, and here is the Pinkerton report, covering all these cases that you have thrown in our face today. Let me read this paragraph from that report:

> An analysis of the reports of our representatives, together with the reports and statements of the Attorney General's office, the office of the public prosecutor, and the police department, also the testimony at the trial of the defendants, makes it impossible to escape the conviction that the kidnaping and assault were not caused by those accused.

Any gentleman here who would like to read this report I should be very glad to have do it. I plead with the Democrats to stand by your Democratic representatives, to stand by the principle of your Constitution and your country, and not deny the people of Hawaii these rights which you yourselves prize so highly. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the Delegate from Hawaii has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Territories, I want to make just a brief statement, and I think it fully explains why the President has asked for the passage of this law. The only question raised in the committee when this matter was before it was this: It was important for the factions in Hawaii to agree on who should be appointed governor. Therefore the President asked the passage of this bill, to use it only in case they do not agree upon whom they want out there as governor. If they will get together and agree on whom they want for governor, I doubt if the President uses this law at all. That is the reason that the Committee on Territories reported this bill.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. It is my understanding that you did not have any hearings before your committee when this bill was under consideration. Is that right?

Mr. STRONG of Texas. We had hearings. We had the Delegate from Hawaii, and he is the man who made the statement that I have just mentioned. The question was asked of him why they did not get together and agree upon who should be appointed Governor, and he said it was impossible.

Mr. BUSBY. Then I shall put it this way: The only hearings had were opposed to the bill, were they not?

Mr. STRONG of Texas. No. The only hearings we had were in favor of the bill. The only hearing we had was from the Delegate from Hawaii.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Is it not a fact that as a member of the committee I asked that testimony be given before the committee to show the necessity for this bill, and I asked that some representative of the President or of the Department of State be brought before the committee to tell us why it was necessary and expedient to pass this bill, and also if the reply I received from the majority members of the committee was not simply the statement that the President wanted the bill, and that it was not necessary to subpena any testimony?

Mr. STRONG of Texas. We heard the testimony of the Delegate from Hawaii.

Mr. MOTT. If the gentleman will pardon me, he has not answered the question.

Mr. STRONG of Texas. I have only 5 minutes, and I do not care to yield further. I am making this statement to clear up why the President wants this bill. If the people of Hawaii will get together and agree as to whom they want as Governor, I do not believe the President will use the authority placed in his hands after this bill is passed.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Texas. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I just want to place it in the RECORD that I, as a member of the committee, do not agree with the reasoning that the gentleman from Texas gives us, and I do not care to be bound by it.

Mr. STRONG of Texas. The gentleman is a member of the committee and must know that I state the exact facts that happened in the committee, and that is the reason the committee reported this bill, and that is all the explanation there is to it. If the people out there in Hawaii, as I say, will get together and agree, there will be no difficulty. The Delegate said there was another man here from Hawaii now fighting him bitterly, and it was impossible for them to get together. So on that account the President wants this law passed, so that if they will not get together and act as Democrats should, the President can send a man out there who will see to it that the people of Hawaii are protected, and that the people of the United States are protected.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, if what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STRONG] just said is an exact statement of fact, then I say to you that it is the most unusual request that has ever emanated from the Presidency of the United States. He does not go to Illinois and ask the people who is to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and he does not go to Oklahoma and ask the people to agree upon a subordinate or an executive officer of the Government. How strange that it should come before this committee that the President is asking this authority because the people of Hawaii cannot agree! Whom is he going to consult down there, as a matter of fact? Who is to do the agreeing? Certainly the people of Hawaii are agreed on one thing, and that is they do not want this bill. The chamber of commerce does not want it. The business men of Hawaii do not want it. The people do not want it. They are agreed on another thing, and that is that they want a Governor in accordance with the residential requirements now in the organic act.

I am going to make only a brief statement, and I want to say you brethren of the Democracy——

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman had better be careful about calling us "brethren." One Member got into trouble doing that. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. They had an election in Hawaii in November, and they sent a Democrat to the Congress of the United States, a member of your party, and he is here today sincerely and earnestly pleading for representation and trying to bring before this body the exact facts and conditions that exist there. He speaks for his people and asks you not to pass this bill. If you are to make the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. MCCANDLESS] write to his people and say, "I am sorry, but my Democratic brethren in the Congress of the United States turned me down", you are going to make a veritable mockery of representative government. I say also that the element of home rule is involved here. Your blood tingles when you read of the struggle made by Ireland for home rule; of the struggle made by Palestine for home rule; of the struggle made by the Colonies in this country for home rule. By all the traditions of our country we should permit Hawaii the same thing. When you read the Declaration of Independence, you will find that Thomas Jefferson said that one of the reasons why they were at variance with King George III was because he was forcing his agents and officers upon the people of this country. Now, we are going to pick up somebody on the mainland and send him down there among the Asiatics of Hawaii, Filipinos, and Japanese, and say, "This man represents experience; he represents vision; he represents judgment." He has no knowledge whatsoever of all these racial antipathies and these cross currents that are constantly at work, and yet he is supposed, in a meritorious way, to administer the laws of this island.

There is one other element, and that is this: I say to the members of the committee this afternoon that when this change is made—and the steam roller will work—it will be exploited upon the streets of Tokyo and Yokohama, and the newspapers of Japan will be asking the question, "Why, after 33 years, does the Congress of the United States alter the Organic Act of Hawaii and send a Governor from the mainland?" The orientals will ponder on the reason for it and seek to reconcile it with the efforts being carried on in Europe at the present time to effect certain nonaggression pacts and to lay the foundation of peace and all that sort of thing. The Japanese people will put their own interpretation upon it. I need not put any on it in this body. So, while this may seem like an altogether simple and innocuous request from the President, it will have its ramifications and repercussions in the Orient, and it is going to have an unpleasant and disagreeable aftermath. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the House ought not need any further argument in favor of the passage of this bill than the exhibitions on Monday and today by the Republicans across the aisle. Why has there been "clowning" exhibited here? Why are Republicans putting up such a solid front against this bill? They who have appointed, as I said, Horace Towner from this House to act as Governor General of islands such as these; they who have appointed George Butte, and they who have appointed Farrington, and they who have appointed Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., to govern the Philippines and also these islands?

Mr. RANKIN. And the gentleman should not overlook that horse jockey from Kansas whom they appointed Governor of Puerto Rico. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and they who appointed the distinguished law professor from my home State, who happened to be a Republican, to preside over certain islands.

Mrs. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, but I must use this time myself.

Why are the Republicans so disturbed? Why did they change the organic act in 1921?

Mr. ELTSE of California. Because of Pinckney.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I cannot yield now. Yes, they wanted to put Farrington from Massachusetts in control. Why did they change it and fix it 3 years, hoping that it could not be changed, and that their Republican officer could not be put out and supplanted.

I want to say to you, colleagues, that if the Republicans would put up such a solid-front partisan exhibition against a President's bill that they have exhibited from across the aisle on Monday and today, if they would go to so much trouble in trying to hamstring the present Democratic President of the United States at home here in Washington, how can we expect a Republican Governor back in Hawaii to act differently? If Republicans here at home in this House of Representatives on the mainland will try to hamstring a Democratic President, by deliberately attempting twice to defeat a bill which they all acknowledge the President has asked us to pass as a part of his policies and program, why would not Republicans in Hawaii try to embarrass and hamstring him?

And keep in mind and do not forget that local affairs in Hawaii are still in absolute control of Republicans there. In the Senate of Hawaii there are only four Democrats. There are only 10 Democrats out of the 30 Representatives in the Legislature of Hawaii. And if we allow this weak Republican Governor of Hawaii to remain in office there, why could not we expect some deliberate attempts there to embarass our Democratic President and his present Democratic administration.

The man who fills every important appointive post of this Government should not only be an outstanding loyal patriotic 100-percent Democrat, but he should be also a friend of the President, deeply concerned about making the President's administration a successful one, and he should be a Democrat in whom the President at all times and upon all occasions, and in all emergencies, has absolute confidence. The Governor of Hawaii must be an asset and not a liability to the Franklin D. Roosevelt administration.

Ought not we to have a man there who would have no disposition to hamstring the President? Ought not we to have a man in Hawaii as Governor who would not be guided by motives which brought about this exhibition we have had from across the aisle today? Ought we not have a man that the President himself put there to defend and back up his own administration?

This is a most important position. Why, a man of bad judgment, or a man who would try to hamstring somebody just because he was a Democrat, as sometimes the Republicans seem to want to do, and as they tried to do to me here today in this House, and as they have done before when they had the power to do it, is not such a man as we can afford to place in this responsible position.

Do you not think we need a Democrat in Hawaii? I should like to recommend to President Franklin D. Roosevelt that just as soon as we pass this bill he appoint the best Democrat we have got and send him over there so that he cannot involve us in serious difficulties in the Far East.

Talk about Tokyo! Why, Tokyo would like to see a weak-kneed Republican in Hawaii who would hamstring President Roosevelt every time he could. [Applause.] It would carry gladness to the hearts of the people of Tokyo.

We are not going to do that. We are going to protect this administration. We are going to protect the mainland. We are going to protect the people of the United States; and my good friend, LINCOLN MCCANDLESS, the distinguished Delegate from Hawaii, admitted today on this floor that the protection of these Stars and Stripes to Hawaii since 1898 has been worth every dollar that has been spent by the people of Hawaii in income taxes and everything else they have paid this Government. He admits it now and says it was worth it all. It is safe protection of a good and strong government, a humane government, to the people of Hawaii. They would not have been without it for anything. They would not do without it now.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly, I yield to my friend.

Mr. BLANCHARD. What kind of government was that for these 30 years, Republican or Democratic?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, it was a United States of America government that has protected and been of great benefit to Hawaii. We Democrats have not hamstrung the President on his Hawaiian policy during the 12 years of Republican regime, but there will be some hamstringing if we do not look out, over in Hawaii. We are not going to take any chances.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, unanimous consent having been granted me to extend my remarks, I was forcibly reminded today of the unjust attacks made upon me in 1921 by Frank W. Mondell, a former Republican leader of this House, when he tried to persecute me back in the Sixty-seventh Congress. He went out of public life after that Congress, and we who have continued to serve here have seen him a very few times since; yet, strange indeed to say, he turned up here today on the floor of this House; being a former Member, he has the privilege of coming into this Chamber.

Back in 1921 Frank Mondell was the Republican majority leader of this House. He had over 300 Republican Members under him here. Because I had made an exhaustive investigation of the Government Printing Office, and printed a report of my findings in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and had quoted with all improper words deleted an affidavit which an employee of the Government Printing Office had filed with the Public Printer showing that he had been treated inhumanely, Leader Mondell tried to have me put out of Congress. He called the Republicans to his office and demanded that they follow him as their House leader and vote to put me out. But there were many Republicans he could not induce to do such an unjust act. Such Republicans as my colleagues here, Mr. LUCE, of Massachusetts; Mr. FISH, of New York; and Mr. MAPES, of Michigan, who still serve here with honor, refused to be thus influenced by Republican Leader Frank Mondell, and they voted against his motion, and with 300 Republicans in this House under his leadership Frank Mondell was able to muster only 204 votes against me. In discussing the Mondell motion on the floor the distinguished Republican, Mr. Graham, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the great Judiciary Committee, asked the question, "What was his intent in inserting this article in the RECORD?" And Mr. Graham further asked, "Was it to be blasphemous; was it to be obscene?" And, answering his own question, Mr. Graham added, "Not a man in this House can honestly and truthfully say that that is true." Concerning my investigation and report, Mr. Graham then said, "BLANTON was fighting an evil, an evil that he believed to exist honestly and fairly, and he was marshaling all the evidence that would prove that evil did exist." And for fighting an evil I was then persecuted.

And Mr. Graham, the then Republican Chairman of the great Judiciary Committee, added: "BLANTON was simply calling your attention, and my attention, and the attention of the Congress of the United States to the conduct of that Government office which he claimed deserved rebuke, censure, and perhaps punishment." And for doing my duty I was persecuted by Leader Frank W. Mondell. But he did not lead any more after that Congress. He had been the sole and only Congressman Wyoming had ever had for 20 years; yet he carried in the succeeding election for the Senate only one county in the State of Wyoming, notwithstanding that he was beaten by a Democrat, although Wyoming went Republican and elected a Republican Governor.

Since 1921 the complexion of this House of Representatives has changed. It is no longer Republican with 300 Republican Members. It is now Democratic. There is a new deal in this House. Members are not persecuted here for doing their duty. And I was awfully glad that former Republican leader Frank W. Mondell strolled in and paid the House a visit today and witnessed new-deal Democrats dispose of Republican attempts to persecute me. The mills of the gods grind slowly, but they do grind.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate, indeed, that the discussion in large part has degenerated into something resembling a partisan squabble. This bill certainly is not partisan.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Did it not develop into a partisan matter 2 or 3 days ago?

Mr. MOTT. I do not doubt that, but I say it should not develop into a partisan squabble. I may say to the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi that I have never made a partisan appeal in my life, and I appeal to you gentlemen on the Democratic side now not to consider this proposition solely from a partisan viewpoint.

When I talked upon this bill the other day, I said that the adoption of this resolution, in my opinion, would be tantamount to the repudiation by the Congress of a solemn covenant entered into between the Government of the United States and the Republic of Hawaii 33 years ago; and I undertook to point out the reason why this was so.

My distinguished friend, the gentleman from Mississippi, questioned the statement that there was a covenant. I should like to take just a minute or two to prove that there is a covenant and that in adopting this resolution we are repudiating it.

All the laws in connection with Hawaii, including the organic act, are based upon the treaty with Hawaii.

I shall read two articles from the treaty:

This is the preamble:

The United States and the Republic of Hawaii, in view of the natural dependence of the Hawaiian Islands upon the United States, of their geographical proximity thereto, of the preponderant share acquired by the United States and its citizens in the industries and trade of said islands, and of the expressed desire of the government of the Republic of Hawaii that those islands should be incorporated into the United States as an integral part thereof and under its sovereignty, have determined to accomplish by treaty an object so important to their mutual and permanent welfare.

I now read article VI of the treaty:

The President shall appoint five commissioners, at least two of whom shall be residents of the Hawaiian Islands, who shall, as soon as reasonable and practicable, recommend to Congress such legislation for the Territory of Hawaii as they shall deem necessary or proper.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the authority for the organic act. In compliance with this treaty provision and a resolution passed by the House and the Senate, President William McKinley appointed this Commission, consisting of three residents of the continental United States and two residents of the Territory of Hawaii, and in the course of a year, after thorough investigation and after the expenditure of $100,000, provided by Congress for that purpose, they made the report to the Congress of the United States as to what provisions the organic act should contain for the future government of Hawaii. In the report I have here you will find they recommended that the executive power of the island should be vested in a Governor who should be appointed by the President and that the Governor should be a resident of Hawaii.

This provision was incorporated in the organic act upon the recommendation of these commissioners. It was an agreement between the people of the two Republics expressed through their representatives on the Commission appointed by the President. By virtue of this agreement the Congress granted to the people of Hawaii the right to have their Governor chosen from among their own citizens; it made this right a part of the organic law of the Territory. And there, Mr. Chairman, if you please, is the covenant. How can gentlemen say there is no covenant? If this agreement is not a covenant, then what is it?

Now, after 33 years, if you take away from the citizens of Hawaii the most important right they have, the right to have their Governor selected from their own people, then I say again you violate the covenant; and I say furthermore that no reason has been given, either to the Congress or to the committee, why we should do this thing. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to go along with this committee in any matter that affects party organization, and when one cannot go along and has the opportunity he ought to be willing to express the reasons he cannot go along with the majority.

Mr. Chairman, let me say that there is in the heart of every human being in this world a desire to have home rule and home government. This has been the foundation stone upon which democracy in this country has been built, and for the life of me I cannot see why it is that men in this House whose fathers have fought the battle for years in this Nation against anything but home rule can come now and foist alien rule upon the people of these islands.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I have only 5 minutes, if the gentleman will excuse me.

Let me say here and now that my acquaintance with the Hawaiian people dates from the time my former law partner, who was a denizen of that Territory, stood there and saw the Hawaiian flag come down and Old Glory raised in its place.

Some of the people in this country believe that Hawaii is not a part of the United States. They look upon it as some conquered territory or some conquered islands. Hawaii is as much a part of the United States as Oklahoma or as Texas. She came in upon the same kind of footing as the great Republic of Texas. The Republic of Hawaii came into this Nation as a republic, and she is as much a part of the Nation as Texas, and where is the man who would for a moment dare to vote in this House to appoint somebody from some other place to rule over the Republic of Texas?

Mr. Chairman, if you send an alien Governor to the Hawaiian Islands, what does it mean? It means sending a man not familiar with their traits of character, not familiar with their industries, and it means that designing, fawning politicians will whisper into the ear of the new Governor and will carry out schemes which are born and bred in a brain that would destroy the self-respecting citizens who are unwilling to bow their heads for favors. This is not the way to bring the factions of the Hawaiian Islands together.

Let me say further, that missionaries from this country went out to these islands and they have helped to build a civilization there and there are many men and women of fine character, many men of fine ability, many men who are geniuses in business that can carry on in the islands, and I say to you now that when the Navy came to the Judiciary Committee and wanted us to take away from them their right to have a Governor and proposed to establish a military officer as Governor out there, upon the reports that came to us about the outlawry they say existed, we met them and asked them to give us the proof, and when we brought down a man from the Department of Justice, all had to admit that there was more law enforcement in the Hawaiian Islands than there is in the United States, and yet you are going to set up a great example of law enforcement from a country that could not convict Al Capone of anything but evasion of his income taxes. You are going to set up your standards of morality when you allow the hootchy-kootchy and hula-hula dances on your stages when they cannot be shown in the Hawaiian Islands, and yet you are going to say that these people are not good enough for self-government.

I cannot understand why the sons of Erin, an island that grew out of the sea and looks like an emerald, on whose soil no coward was ever born, can force legislation of this kind on another island that grew out of the sea and looks like the blue of the sky, and upon whose soil no traitor can stay. [Applause.]

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY].

THE HAWAIIAN GOVERNOR

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I should like very much to vote for every piece of legislation that is proposed by the administration. I should also like very much to have some reasons given us for proposals that are as important as this bill before us now. We have absolutely no hearings to guide us on this proposal, nothing to show the necessity for it, and we are absolutely in a state of darkness as to why we are proceeding as we are today, except a short letter from the President, and giving full credit to the letter from the President, it gives us absolutely no more information than we have had on other occasions when we made mistakes as bad as we will make today if we enact this proposal into law.

CARPETBAG DAYS OF THE SOUTH FORGOTTEN

I fear that we from the South have forgotten the days from 1865 to 1875, when carpetbaggers were sent there with all the evil influences that go with sending an outside governor to another people.

We have forgotten that. We are acting as if nobody but he who has the might shall rule and govern the people anywhere.

MIGHT DOES NOT MAKE RIGHT

The proposition is not right, it is not fair, and it is not keeping faith with the Hawaiian people as set out in the original compact with them under which they joined the United States.

Section 66 of the agreement proposed by the five commissioners appointed under the treaty with Hawaii, adopted by our Government, provided that the Governor of these islands should be a resident for at least 1 year.

WE HAVE DEMOCRATIC DELEGATE FROM HAWAII

It is a ridiculous thing that we have a Delegate here from the Hawaiian Islands who promised those people that we were Democrats and the Democratic Congress and Democratic administration would see that Democratic rules and treatment would be accorded to the islands.

What are we doing? We are sending him back in disgrace, absolutely taking him out of the proposition, denying every promise that he made when his people elected him. We are not dealing with him in good faith by what we are doing today. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. If Hawaii is entitled to home rule, why is it not a good thing for Alaska and Puerto Rico?

Mr. BUSBY. That is a very good question, but let me say in reply that Hawaii came in under a treaty, articles of agreement, drawn by the Commission that we appointed. That is not true of the other Territories. We bought Alaska. Hawaii came in under a treaty after deliberation with the Commission representing the two countries. That answers the gentleman's question. We bought Alaska and paid for it with our own money.

Mr. KELLER. That is only a partial answer.

THIS ACTION WILL BE A BREACH OF FAITH

Mr. BUSBY. We are making the Hawaiian people antagonistic to the United States. This is a time that we ought to be currying favor with them instead of antagonizing them. We ought to do everything to help and nothing that will interfere with our progress in a military way in those islands when we need them. If we want a Democratic Governor in Hawaii, the President under authority of the Meyer case can remove the present Governor and appoint a Democrat. It is not necessary to enact this monstrosity and break faith with a small and helpless people. Let us do it in a regular way and keep good faith with these people. Let us not follow what was said during the war to be Germany's action in regard to treaties and treat them as a "scrap of paper", tear them up because we have the power. Germany ran over Belgium. Will we run over Hawaii? [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of the time. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the President of the United States has asked for this authority to appoint a Governor of Hawaii to enforce the law.

This bill does not provide that the Governor shall not come from Hawaii, but it gives the President the right to appoint one from outside if he so desires.

I want to answer the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], when he said the thing to do is to reappoint the present Governor.

There are two elements in this matter. One of them is the safety of the people of Hawaii, and the other is the safety of the American people, and that means every man and woman who goes to Hawaii. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] says that we should appoint the same Governor who is there now. Let us show you some things that happened under this same Governor. The report of a recent investigation shows—

> That in the past there have been frequent occurrences of the crime of rape, resulting in the majority of cases in light sentences or acquittal. The committee further finds that the officials charged with the responsibility of enforcing the law having in the past nolle-prossed a case in which an enlisted man in the United States Navy was murdered.

A woman, as we know, and as everybody who reads the newspapers knows, was assaulted. The conditions became such as to almost bring about an outbreak against constituted authority, as it would have done if it had occurred in certain States of this Union. Let me read one more paragraph.

> We respectfully call attention to the case in which one Ahakeulo pleaded guilty to the crime of assault and attempt to ravish and was sentenced to an indeterminate term of 4 months to 15 years. Later he was given a pardon by the Governor of the islands upon the theory that his services were needed as an amateur boxer at Madison Square Garden in New York City, representing the Territory of Hawaii.

Yet the gentleman from New York wants us to reappoint a Governor who pardons the most outrageous brute in the world who raped a white woman, and then appointed him to represent Hawaii in a boxing contest in New York City.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Will he tell us from what he is reading?

Mr. RANKIN. I am reading from the report to the Naval Affairs Committee. Yesterday our own representatives of the constituted authorities of the United States were attacked.

They have been reading telegrams from Hawaii. What did they receive from this Republican Governor as to that. The men who are running this Government, the men who are advising the President, know more about what is going on in Hawaii than any man in Congress. The President is not captious about this matter.

Oh, you spread the report around here the other day and got some votes through it that if this bill passed Judge Ben Lindsay would be appointed Governor. Ben Lindsay does not stand any more chance to be the next Governor of Hawaii than Hoover does to be the next President of the United States. [Laughter and applause.]

No, Mr. Chairman, this is no captious matter. If it were not necessary in order to maintain peace and order and the dignity of the people and the safety of the people of Hawaii, if it were not necessary to maintain our own authority and protect that outpost of our great western frontier, the President of the United States would not have sent a message asking us to pass this bill. I sincerely trust that every man in this House will vote for it.

The Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. MCCANDLESS] says that we were turned down the other day. We had a majority, and lacked only two of having a majority of 2 to 1. If the Membership of the House had known the truth about this Lindsay affair, we would have put it over by a two-thirds vote at that time.

This is not a question of home rule. The President under this bill can appoint a Governor living in the islands. Under the present law, the President of the United States appoints, but he appoints someone living in the islands, and the present President is here asking that he be given the right to appoint someone either from the islands or from continental United States in order that law and order may be properly carried out and the safety and welfare of the people preserved. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 66 of the Hawaiian Organic Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 48, sec. 531), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 66. The executive power of the Government of the Territory of Hawaii shall be vested in a Governor, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and shall hold office for 4 years and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President. He shall be not less than 35 years of age, shall be a citizen of the United States, shall be commander in chief of the militia of Hawaii, and may grant pardons or reprieves for offenses against the laws of the said Territory and reprieves for offenses against the laws of the United States until the decision of the President is made known thereon."

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause. I rise with no partisan thought in mind, but having in mind the obligation of a Member of the United States Congress to his country and to the traditions of his country. We can pass this bill; and when we pass it we make hypocrisy of the finest traditions of America. This country was born in a spirit of self-government. That was the spirit for which the Colonials fought. Throughout the history of this country we have professed that principle. Hawaii came to this country not by conquest nor by purchase. When Hawaii became a part of the United States, the Congress of the United States enacted its organic act. Certainly the very soul of that act was that the executive head of Hawaii should be a citizen of Hawaii. Oh, sure, we have the power—not so much the constitutional power, but the power of might to strike that provision from the organic act.

We are a strong country. We can ride rough-shod over Hawaii if we want to. We can send an American citizen to govern Hawaii, but we cannot do it without breaking faith with the organic act which was enacted when Hawaii became a part of this Republic. We cannot pass this bill today without injuring the soul of America. I am not thinking so much of Hawaii as I am thinking of our own obligations, as I am thinking of our own national respect. That is the question involved. A few moments ago my good friend Mr. O'CONNOR, of New York, stood on this floor and advocated this bill. Here we have the spectacle of the Tammany delegation supporting this bill in the face of the fact that Tammany traditionally, in season and out, berates England because Ireland is not given sufficient home rule. Today a great leader of Tammany defends a bill which would take away from Hawaii home rule, which the Congress of the United States at a former date gave to it.

We cannot pass this bill without making hypocrisy of the splendid American traditions which we, one by one, have advocated. As a Congress we cannot pass it without making hypocrisy of the finest traditions of America. Pass this bill today, and it goes around the world that all America's professions of self-government and the right to self-government by small peoples become cheap hypocrisy.

I say to my Democratic friends, if you pass this bill today, you slander the memory of Woodrow Wilson and repudiate his great efforts at Versailles. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN] has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN].

I rise not as a Democrat or as a partisan but, I hope, as a citizen whose vision on this particular question reaches far beyond the shores of the Hawaiian Islands.

Frankly, I have been somewhat disappointed in the plane upon which the argument on this bill has been pitched, not only on the comical side but on the serious side of the argument. I am only sorry that on the spur of the moment I am not able to summarize and properly present the sole and supreme consideration which moves me to support this bill. The issue involved in this bill, in my judgment, far transcends partisanship or political considerations. So much so, that had I the ability to do so, I would prefer to come over and address my argument to the Republican Membership, because the Republican Party has always stood foursquare for the national defense. It supported a Democratic President in the Great War in every measure necessary to win the war, and it never parted company with him until after victory perched upon our banner; and the Republican Party today stands behind the national defense and is in favor of every measure necessary to the national welfare and security. [Applause.]

I want to say furthermore that the issue in this bill, in my judgment, far transcends any local considerations or the wishes of the people of the Hawaiian Islands. I am not moved by any considerations growing out of the Massie case or of lawlessness in the Hawaiian Islands. I will grant, for the sake of the argument, that they are the most law-abiding people on the face of the earth. But since the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands by the United States I want to remind gentlemen that the picture has wholly changed, until today there is not left a vestige of the original picture or the original conditions existing at the time they were acquired by the United States.

Since that time, Mr. Chairman, a great power has arisen on the far shores of the Pacific, a power which has arisen from absolute obscurity to the front rank among the nations of the world, a power which has as its outstanding ideals militarism and conquest, a power which today is a disturbance to the peace of the world and a threat and menace to the peace and security of this Nation above all nations, a situation which all international observers agree throws an ominous question mark over the Pacific; a question which some day must be answered, just as inevitably as tomorrow's rising sun; and when that question is answered, there will be no Republicans on this side of the aisle or Democrats on that side, but, as in the case of every great national emergency, there will be only Americans on both sides of the aisle. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for 1 additional minute.

Mr. MOTT. Reserving the right to object, I will not object if the gentleman will answer a question.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Let me finish my statement first and then I will answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I just want to say that since we acquired the Hawaiian Islands and this trans-Pacific situation has arisen they have become the American key position in the Pacific Ocean, and the Hawaiian Islands ought to be made the Gibraltar of American defense. If I had my way about it, every resident of the Hawaiian Islands who is not absolutely loyal to that proposition would be deported to the country from which he came or where he really belongs. [Applause.]

It is for that reason that I believe the President ought henceforth to be given the widest possible discretion in appointing a Governor of the Hawaiian Islands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has again expired.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOILEAU) there were ayes 56 and noes 135.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. MCCANDLESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCCANDLESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Chairman of the Committee on Territories to send a delegation from this Congress to visit Hawaii. The gentleman from Mississippi knows nothing about Hawaii. Members talk about Hawaii who know nothing about the conditions of Hawaii, who know nothing about the loyalty of the people there.

The gentleman spoke about Alaska the other day. Since 1910 but one nonresident of Alaska has been appointed Governor. Every other Governor has been a resident of that Territory. Yet he said just the opposite was true. He did not know the truth about Alaska, either.

I realize you are going to vote this bill through, but you will rue the day you passed it. I will tell you why. We are loyal Americans. We are behind the Army 100 percent. We build the roads for the Army and charge them nothing for their use. We do everything for the Army and the Navy, yet they accuse us of being disloyal and not enforcing law in Hawaii.

I hold in my hand a report that cost Hawaii $25,000, and which shows that Hawaii was greatly wronged in being blamed for that Massie case. I ask your indulgence while I read a few excerpts from it:

> Neither do we have any proof of the incidents related by Mrs. Massie from the time she claims to have left the inn until she was picked up on the road by the Ballingers and Clarks, excepting the bruises she bore. The fact that various articles belonging to Mrs. Massie were found near the cement slab in the animal quarantine grounds is of doubtful value as proof that Mrs. Massie was raped at that point. Other circumstances seem to warrant questioning the accuracy of her statements as to what occurred there.
>
> It is quite evident that the public officers charged with the prosecution of the accused most energetically endeavored to convict them. Following the mistrial the case was exhaustively reviewed and investigated by the Attorney General's office with Deputy Attorney General Kay in charge. Still later Mr. John C. Kelley, newly appointed public prosecutor replacing the county attorney in the handling of criminal matters, conducted a further searching investigation, but all to no avail.
> * * * * * * *

Our investigation did not disclose the cause and the identity of the person or persons responsible for the physical attack on Mrs. Thalia Massie. However, the presence of our investigator on the ground and opportunity to inquire into the collateral facts, as well as the main issues, enables us to point out some interesting and important factors having a very definite bearing upon the probability of the innocence of the accused.

These excerpts are taken from a report of the Pinkerton Detective Agency, one of the best in the United States. They show that Hawaii should not be blamed for that unpleasant incident, yet you here would accuse us of laxity in our laws because of wrong impressions of this case. You would take away our rights without knowing the truth about Hawaii, without even bothering to send a committee there to learn the truth about us.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FULLER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5767) to authorize the appointment of the Governor of Hawaii without regard to his being a citizen or resident of Hawaii, pursuant to House Resolution 176, he reported the same back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 237, nays 119, answering "present" 3, not voting 71, as follows:

On motion of Mr. RANKIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

The Chair laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by section 19 of the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916, entitled, "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands", I transmit herewith a set of the laws and resolutions passed by the Ninth Philippine Legislature during its second regular session, from July 16, 1932, to November 9, 1932, and its special session of 1932 from December 7 to 9, 1932.

With reference to Act No. 4053 (H. No. 2516) the following is quoted from an opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, rendered February 14, 1933, prior to the approval of this act by the President of the United States:

4. Sections 6 and 7 are separable from the rest of the measure. If you approve the bill, sections 6 and 7 will be void and inoperative, but the other provisions of the bill will not be affected and will stand as valid legislation.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 7, 1933.

VETERANS' RELIEF (H.DOC. NO. 62)

The Chair also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures and ordered printed:

To the Congress:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 20, title I, of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, I am transmitting herewith a photostat copy of Executive Orders No. 6156 (Veterans' Regulation 1 (a)), No. 6157 (Veterans' Regulation 3 (a)), No. 6158, (Veterans' Regulation 9 (a)), and No. 6159 (Veterans' Regulation 10 (a)), approved by me June 6, 1933, embodying amendments to veterans' regulations approved by me March 31, 1933, relating to veterans' relief. These veterans' regulations have been issued in accordance with the terms of title I of that law.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 7, 1933.

PERMISSION TO FILE REPORT

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may have until midnight tonight to file its report on the bill (H.R. 5950), the views of the minority to be included in the same document.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

PROTECTION OF GOVERNMENT RECORDS

Mr. MCKEOWN submitted the following conference report on the bill (H.R. 4220) for the protection of Government records:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H.R. 4220 having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

TOM D. MCKEOWN,
J. BANKS KURTZ,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOE. T. ROBINSON,
WM. E. BORAH,
TOM CONNALLY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4220) for the protection of Government records, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

This bill as it passed the House consisted of three sections. Section 1 provided that it shall be a crime for any person by virtue of his employment having custody of or access to any records of the Government, to remove, sell, or destroy them for any purpose prejudicial to the Government. This section is merely an extension of existing law (U.S.C., title 18, par. 234; Criminal Code, sec. 128). Section 2 made it a crime for any person without authorization of competent authority to publish or furnish to another any matter prepared in any official code, or for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interest of the United States, willfully to publish or furnish to another any matter obtained without authorization of competent authority from the custody of any officer or employee of the United States, or anything purporting to be such matter. Section 3 provided that proof of the commission of any of the acts forbidden by sections 1 and 2 shall be prima facie evidence of a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interest of the United States.

The Senate amendment struck out the entire House bill after the enacting clause and substituted one paragraph making it a crime for anyone having or having had custody or access to any official diplomatic code, or any matter prepared in such code, willfully, without authorization, or competent authority to publish or furnish to another such code or matter, or what purports to be such, or any matter which was obtained while in the process of transmission between any foreign government and its diplomatic mission in the United States.

The conferees recommend the acceptance of the Senate amendment.

TOM D. MCKEOWN,
EMANUEL CELLER,
J. BANKS KURTZ,
Managers on the part of the House.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL—1934

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conferees may have until midnight tonight to file conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

CIVIL AVIATION

Mr. MCSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article prepared by myself and recently published in Air Transportation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I print the following article prepared by me and published in the June 1933 issue of Air Transportation:

Every thinking person now realizes the paramount importance of air force in any future war. Throughout military history altitude has been one of the determining factors. A position upon high ground is always considered the best. When that position may reach altitudes of 5 miles or more, and when the altitude of the attacking or the defending air force may be changed at will, the supreme advantage of that nation having a superiority in air cannot be doubted for one moment.

If America had superiority in air, then she could readily grant equality to any other nation in fighting sea craft, and could even grant superiority to any other nation in the number of trained and effective land troops. The reason is that America's two best friends are the Atlantic Ocean and the Pacific Ocean. Her next two best friends are the good people of Canada on the north and of Mexico on the south. In view of this highly advantageous situation, America can safely pursue her traditional and deliberately chosen policy of mere defense. We do not covet the land or the riches or the commerce of any other nation. We would not make aggressive warfare upon any people on earth. We want to be the friend of every other nation under the sun. If we cannot develop our own Nation and advance our own commerce by friendly relations with other peoples, then we ought not to expect to succeed. For that reason the unbroken and well-thought-out policy of this Nation, from colonial days to this hour, has been one of mere defense. We have never thought of prosecuting aggressive war upon any other nation.

That being so, our next step is to decide what weapon is more effective for mere defense. In any scheme of government the question of economy must be considered. We must not spend money merely to be spending it but must decide where our money can be best spent. Of course, if it were necessary, we could maintain the largest air force in the world, the largest navy in the world, the largest number and the best-equipped land troops in the world. We have the wealth and the resources to do that. But unless it were absolutely necessary, we would be foolish to burden our people with taxes in order to do such unnecessary things. In view of these obvious considerations, we must apportion and fix the relative defensive value of these different agencies. In doing so, we come to the fundamental proposition that, dollar for dollar, we can obtain more defense for our shores and for our people by a thoroughly trained and equipped air force than by any other. Since it is in the range of early attainment for airplanes to base upon our shores and to fly 1,000 miles out to sea and attack any approaching fleet and beat down the air force based upon the enemy fleet and return to our own shores, it is manifest that principal emphasis should be laid upon our air force. Of course, that does not mean that we must ignore or abandon our fleet. Furthermore, it does not mean that we must discontinue the training of land troops. It merely means that we must put the highest emphasis upon defense by air.

In considering the scheme of air defense, we must apprize both the personnel and the material equipment. In other words, we must have an abundance of trained pilots and adequate aircraft. In order to procure this abundant supply of personnel we should encourage civil aviation. Every young man who is able to pilot aircraft of any kind is a potential defender of his nation in war. It may be that he does not know all the maneuvers of military flying, but he has the basis for the quick apprehension of military aviation. Furthermore, our civilian pilots should all be encouraged to connect themselves with a reserve corps of pilots, whether for the Army, the Navy, or the Marine Corps, and these civilian pilots should be encouraged to take training for a period of approximately 30 days each year in military aviation. This training should not be given to any civil pilots more than 30 years of age. Thirty days a year for 5 or 6 consecutive years, with intervening correspondence studies, would put a civilian pilot in position to be quickly available for defense in time of war.

What is said about personnel applies with equal force to material. Civil aviation for every possible purpose should be encouraged. Not only for carrying mail and for carrying passengers but for carrying light freight, and especially perishable freights, aircraft should be employed on the widest possible scale. Work of this kind would keep our aircraft forces employed, would constantly develop the art, would bring about improvements in every form and kind of aircraft, and would undoubtedly develop designs of the greatest value in time of war.

No man need think that the art of aviation has attained its perfection. In fact, it is just in its infancy. Not 30 years ago was the first short mechanical hop through the air made at Kill Devil Hill, N.C. Hardly 20 years ago was it thought of as a military possibility. It seems but yesterday when the first transoceanic flights were made. Undoubtedly the genius of scientific students will bring yet more marvelous accomplishments to the record of flying machines.

Therefore, the greater the activity in the production of such machines, the greater the competition among the manufacturers of aircraft, the greater the number of young men devoting their thought and attention to aviation, the greater will be the progress in every particular in respect to aviation.

For these reasons I urge with every possible energy the employment of civil aircraft in every phase of transportation and communication. Disasters such as the Akron will neither discourage nor baffle nor deter mankind in its efforts to make conquest over the air. The brain of man is questioning every fact connected with his existence. Those who know most about this conquest over the forces of nature testify that we stand at the threshold of even greater achievements and discoveries. Undoubtedly we will go forward in all directions, and we must not, and will not, fail to connect the possibilities of civil aviation with national defense. So long as men are cool-headed and in right reason, war seems foolish and futile. But all history demonstrates, and our present world condition corroborates, the truth, that men become hotheaded and reason flies away, and then comes war, terrible, destructive war. We must not live in a dreamland. We must face the realities of history. We must be prepared. In such preparation air force and its intimately related fact of civil aviation must be fostered, encouraged, strengthened, and made ready at the shortest notice to function as the first line in our national defense.

J. MARTIN M'KEE

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives, in the death of J. Martin McKee, foreman of the folding room, has lost a faithful servant. With him passed a knowledge of and an experience with public documents which only years of devotion to duty could acquire. To my mind the House has suffered an irreparable loss. Forty-nine years ago Martin McKee, or "Mac" as he was familiarly called, entered the service of this House as a messenger at the east entrance to the floor of the House. He was a bright, alert, and courteous youth, and he soon endeared himself to the Members by his pleasing personality. He won a promotion to a better position in the folding room, where his industry and intelligence justly earned for him the foremanship of that important branch of our service, and until several weeks ago when Mr. McKee was stricken at his post of duty he continued to serve in that capacity with great fidelity.

Even after it was apparent to his associates that the hand of death had been laid upon him, he persisted in reporting for duty and would not relinquish his task until nature rebelled.

No better example could be furnished of conscientious discharge of duty than in the life and service of Martin McKee, covering nearly half a century of time. And the greater part of this service was performed in the subterranean depths of this great Capitol Building, out of the sight of the thousands of Members of Congress he was serving, with few to observe and approve, and without the stimulus of encouraging words.

Members who served here a long time, however, knew McKee and his worth, and were quick to appreciate his untiring efforts to render them service of a high order of intelligence. He was uniformly courteous, obliging, and painstaking, and went out of his way to meet the slightest request. He personified affability combined with a quiet, unassuming dignity. His knowledge of public documents and their contents was prodigious. Whatever the subject, however antique the document, Mac's unerring memory and developed sense of location would produce it promptly from the catacombs where millions of documents were stored. It is almost inconceivable that the mind of man could be the storehouse of information that was McKee's. He was a living index of the folding room's contents, and he cheerfully dispensed the knowledge he had acquired through years of hard study and application to the duties of his particular job. It would sound like an exaggeration to say that 100,000,000 documents came under his personal care and distribution, but I think this a conservative statement.

Mr. McKee, whether serving under a Democratic or Republican House, and he served under both from time to time, was impartial and impersonal, serving each and all alike, with characteristic friendliness, his only object being to serve. And while serving he was called away to higher service.

It is no wonder to his host of friends, who sincerely mourn his death, that "Mac" stayed on and on through the mutations of politics in the job for which he was so well suited and which suited him. It will take years adequately to fill his place.

I knew him for over 20 years, and I cherished his friendship.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by publishing statistical information as to the population and registered voters of the Hawaiian Islands.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the Hawaiian situation.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE "GOLD CLAUSE" IN UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT BONDS

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the veterans' compensation, and also on the gold standard.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, if this bill excepted from its operations the outstanding obligations of this Government, I would vote for it. But it does not do so. Therefore it writes a question mark across the promissory notes of the Nation. I do not think that question mark should be permitted to stand.

Only 5 weeks ago, on April 23, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his invitation to our people to subscribe to a $500,000,000 bond issue, said:

> The principal and interest of the notes will be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value.

On the faith of that promise, the money was loaned. Today we break that promise and say that at no time and under no circumstances will we ever honor it.

We do not say that specie payment is suspended temporarily as an emergency measure during a grave crisis. That could be defended. That it has been temporarily suspended by the act of March 9 and by the later embargo on gold export is something that I thoroughly approve of. But it is one thing to say, "Under present circumstances I cannot perform my contract." It is another thing to say, "Under no circumstances will I ever perform my contract."

Not only the recent $500,000,000 issue but billions of dollars have been borrowed by Uncle Sam under a written promise to pay in gold, if demanded. I understand the soldiers' adjusted-service certificates, with a face value of $2,400,000,000, due in 1945, contain the gold clause. All these promises are now to be permanently broken.

I confine my opposition to this bill entirely to the fact that it repudiates a promise in the notes given by the Federal Government for money borrowed by it.

In my mind a far different case is presented by the gold clause in the bonds of railroads, industries, municipalities, or private individuals. With respect to them it can be argued with great force that the contracting parties loaned and borrowed the money in the light of the knowledge that Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, might thereafter change the statutory value of the gold dollar or make some other medium a legal tender for the payment of such private obligations. The second Legal Tender cases seem to lead to this conclusion.

But here we are wiping out a promise of the Federal Government itself. This point, differing from the effect of private obligations, does not seem to have ever been decided by the United States Supreme Court. The cases relied upon dealt with private obligations alone. For example, in Juillard against Greenwood:

> The power of making the notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of "private" debts, being included in the power to borrow money and to provide a national currency, is not defeated or restricted by the fact that its exercise may affect the value of "private" contracts.

But it has never been held, so far as I know, that the United States can directly repudiate its own contract entered into with one of its citizens. This point has not been covered by the debate. It is too important to go unmentioned.

The United States acts in two capacities, governmental and business. In the exercise of its governmental capacity, which includes the power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof" its power is as plenary as the Constitution. But when it acts in a business capacity, as it does when it borrows money, it is bound by its contract. It has been so held by the courts on many occasions.

Although the States are forbidden to do so, the Congress may impair the obligation of the private contracts of its citizens (Legal Tender cases). But can Congress impair its own contracts? Can or should Congress in the exercise of its governmental functions destroy rights given by it in its business capacity as a borrower of money? Can or should the sovereign exercise sovereign power to render void a sovereign's promise? I do not think so. "Contracts with the Government, like other contracts, must be performed according to their tenor both by the contractor and the United States" (39 Cyc. 743).

Although the clause against impairing the obligation of contracts applies only to the several States, nevertheless the fifth amendment to the Constitution providing that no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law" is binding upon the Federal Government, and in my judgment secures the individual against any action by the Government which divests a property right vested by it in its citizens (12 C.J. 957).

To make a plain case: A dollar is 25.8 grains of gold nine tenths fine. This is another way of saying that 25.8 grains of gold is a dollar. Suppose, as has happened in our history, the Government has to buy gold, and does so, giving for every 25.8 grains of gold it receives, its promise to pay $1 "payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of weight and fineness." Suppose this resolution is then passed by Congress, and shortly thereafter the Government, under the Thomas amendment of the agricultural relief bill changes the weight of the dollar to 12.9 grains of gold. When the Government's promise to pay falls due, it then gives its bondholders 12.9 grains of gold for every 25.8 grains it received, retaining in its Treasury the other 12.9 grains. Is this not a direct taking of property prohibited by the fifth amendment of the Constitution? The 12.9 grains of gold withheld by the Treasury has value; it is "property"; the Government received it from its citizen upon a solemn promise to repay it. It keeps it. It is possible that that may be held to be a constitutional taking by the Government of 12.9 grains of gold. But that it is a taking I think few will deny.

The Congress has the right to regulate weights and measures as well as to coin money and fix the value thereof. Suppose the United States borrowed a million bushels of wheat—each bushel weighing 56 pounds—from its citizens to feed its armies in time of war, the wheat to be returned after the war ended. Suppose then Congress changed the weight of a bushel of wheat from 56 to 28 pounds and tendered back to its citizens a 28-pound bushel for every 56-pound bushel, keeping the other 28 pounds.

Would the Supreme Court hold that the citizen is without remedy under the fifth amendment?

And if it should hold the citizen constitutionally without remedy, what would you think the effect of that transaction would be upon the faith that its citizens would then have in their Government?

And here let me again say that under the Legal Tender cases I raise no point as to the power of Congress to eliminate the "gold clause" in all private contracts. I am referring only to contracts to which the Federal Government is itself a party and I raise the question both of the constitutionality and the wisdom of this action as to the contracts of this Government under, first, the fifth amendment; second, the fourteenth amendment, which states that the "validity of the public debt of the United States authorized by law * * * shall not be questioned"; third, a statute now in force for 64 years, that "the 'faith' of the United States is 'solemnly pledged' to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States"; and fourth, waiving all law points, the wisdom of this action upon the future credit of this Government.

It may be well to point out that the "first line of defense" of this Government is not its Army or Navy. No. The very preservation of the Government has depended, and may well depend again, upon the credit of the Nation out of which alone come the sinews of war. And that credit is simply the belief of our people that, come what may, Uncle Sam is never going to welch on a single promise.

I believe that the Supreme Court will hold that this bill goes beyond the constitutional power of Congress; and believing that, I consider that my oath to support the Constitution prevents me from supporting this bill unless it excepts Uncle Sam's promissory notes from its operation.

But even though I guess wrong on what the Supreme Court may decide, there still remains the question of good faith, of confidence in the sanctity of contracts, a matter that is older than the Constitution of the United States.

Many Federal bonds containing the gold clause are held abroad. Can we expect our European debtors to live up to their promises with us when we break our promises—permanently—with them? It seems to me that this bill furnishes the excuse they may have been looking for, and which they may be glad to seize upon to refuse to pay the billions we loaned them during and since the World War. If so, we shall pay a stiff price for a present benefit.

Many men, abler than I, differ with me as to the legality, the morality, and the expediency of this action. Only time and the Supreme Court can resolve these doubts. I respect the views of those who differ with me. Generally I would defer my judgment to theirs, especially in these critical times. But this question goes deeper than what is wise. It goes to the bedrock of what is right. And on that question I must vote my own convictions regardless of consequences.

Many arguments made for the bill seem to me to be exceedingly flimsy.

It is said that there is not gold enough in America to pay outstanding gold obligations. Well, there are not enough coffins in America to bury every American. But the coffin business gets along pretty well for the reason that we do not all die on the same day. In the same way, banks seldom have enough money to pay their demand obligations. Occasionally there is a run on a bank or a run on the Treasury, as there was the 1st of March, and payments have to be suspended temporarily in order to treat all alike. But that is far different from refusing to pay at any time.

I would suspend specie payment as long as the emergency lasts. But in normal times gold, if paid out to one creditor of the Government, does not go out of existence. It is shortly redeposited and finds its way back to the Treasury to be available when the next creditor demands gold—which is seldom the case.

The specious argument, "How can you pay $100,000,000,000 of gold obligations with only four billions of gold?" is scarcely less sensible than a like question with respect to all forms of money. We have—gold, silver, and currency—only about ten billions all told. Those who think a conclusive argument is made by asking this question never stop to state its correlative, "How can you pay one hundred billions of debts with ten billions of all forms of money?" As a matter of fact it is likely that the ratio of "gold" debts to total gold is less than the ratio of all debts to all money. But no one thinks that the volume of money should always equal the volume of debts.

It is said that when the Federal Government sold its bonds it did not receive gold, and, therefore, should not pay gold. Suppose that to be generally true. But what has it to do with the question? The obligation of a contract is found in its terms, over the signature of the borrower, and not in what the borrower receives. If for 100 bushels of potatoes I give my 90-day note for $100, am I later to refuse to pay dollars because I received potatoes?

It is said that the "gold clause" ought never to have been written in Government bonds. Grant that; but, again, what has it to do with the question? The fact is that the clause is in our bonds and Uncle Sam's name is signed below.

I believe that a change in our monetary system is necessary. I agree with those students of money and depressions, such as George F. Warren, of Cornell, that world gold production is not increasing as fast as the production of all other commodities; in other words, that the money work involved in the exchange of these commodities is increasing faster than gold, and that this is one of the deeper causes of the world-wide depression, if not the only one, which seems to fit into every picture. If this is so, it is manifest we must find large, new gold deposits as we did in the Klondike and South Africa in the nineties, or further reduce the gold metallic base pledged to the redemption of currency, or supplement that metallic base with silver or with a "managed currency."

The gold dollar has unquestionably become too dear in terms of all other commodities. The ruinous deflation of the past 3½ years must be checked and turned. Prices should be restored to the level where the average of debts was incurred in order to give debtors a chance to pay out—in order to save creditors as well as debtors. This, of course, should proceed only with a just regard to the ability of the people to pay the increased prices through increased employment and advancing wages.

But, believing all this, I yet believe this ruinous deflation can be corrected without repudiating the solemn obligations of this Government.

I am not wise enough to foresee the result of today's action. I cannot believe it will be good, but time—perhaps a far-distant time—alone will tell. There is an old maxim that "from a base action no good can arise." But, on the other hand, I know that life is inconceivably complex and good and evil almost inextricably interwoven. In Goethe's Faust, Mephistopheles says:

> I am a part of God not understood, who always wills the bad but sometimes works the good.

"God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform", and it may be that the supposed benefits of this action will overweigh its possible harm. I know that this is what its friends believe. I know they believe it sincerely and that it is justified to them. I trust they are right and that its faults will be absolved in the confessional of time.

But on this matter of breaking the faith of public contracts I "place my feet in the tracks of my forefathers, where I can neither wander nor fall." I go back to General Washington, who said:

> But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

I go back to Andrew Jackson, who said in a veto message in 1830:

> When an honest observance of constitutional compacts cannot be obtained from communities like ours, it need not be anticipated elsewhere, and the cause in which there has been so much martyrdom and from which so much was expected by the friends of liberty may be abandoned, and the degrading truth that man is unfit for self-government admitted. And this will be the case if expediency be made a rule of construction in interpreting the Constitution. Power in no government could desire a better shield for the insidious advances which it is ever ready to make upon the checks that are designed to restrain its action.

And finally, I go back to the first inaugural of the founder of my party. Among the "essential principles of our Government" Jefferson placed "the honest payment of our debts and the sacred preservation of the public faith." This, he said, should be the "touchstone by which we try the services of those we trust."

Upon that rock I stand.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting two confidential documents on the American Vigilantes, which is an effort to start a secret Fascisti in the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KNUTSON. If they are secret documents, I think I will object.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. They are not exactly secret, but they are confidential; not for general publication.

Mr. KNUTSON. Until we know more about it, I object.

CASTE SYSTEMS IN AMERICA—THE UNTOUCHABLES AND UNTAXABLES

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the untouchables and untaxables in the United States.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker and Members, according to the press reports, we are told that justice to our disabled and indigent veterans cannot be granted unless additional taxes are placed upon the backs of our already overtaxed people. Without disputing the theory that additional taxes are required, I will show that the administration has thus far failed to recognize a prolific field for taxation.

It appears that we have a caste system in America in which not only the administration but Congress as well occupies the position of the rajahs of India, who are utterly oblivious to the plight of their own untouchables. We have in America an untouchable and untaxable group, headed by Morgan, Mellon, Baruch, and others, who represent a prolific field of taxation, but whom the administration and the Congress have thus far failed to encompass in that respect.

In India the patriotic Ghandi suffers and sacrifices himself for the untouchables, who comprise approximately one fourth of the population of India. Here in America the untouchable and untaxable group thrive and continue to grow increasingly wealthy because of the exactions their policies inflict upon the unfortunate unemployed, upon the disabled veteran, and the Federal employee.

I suggest that this Congress initiate and enact legislation which will tax all the existing tax-exempt securities of every description and that all future issues shall also be so taxed. The gamblers in Wall Street should be required to contribute a just and fair tax by the taxation of all stock and bond transfers. Inheritance, estate, and gift taxes should be increased to bear their proper share of taxation in the conduct of government. It is preposterous, in my opinion, to speak of adding to the tax burden of the common citizen while we continue to permit unearned and ill-acquired wealth to continue tax-exempt.

In this Congress we have voted almost $9,000,000,000 of additional tax-exempt bonds, the benefit of which is to be extended to the private financial institutions of America, who, instead of passing down this profligacy of the Government to the common citizen, continue to hold and absorb every vestige of wealth which comes within their sphere of influence. It was believed that the farm and home loan provisions would bring relief to our distressed farm and home mortgagors, but we find that the banking and loan companies of America continue to exercise a heartless attitude toward our oppressed citizens and that they are continuing to foreclose mortgages on homes and farm properties wherever possible. This is so pronounced that in my own State of California the senate of the assembly has submitted a joint resolution to the Congress petitioning for a moratorium and relief from the oppressive methods of these federally subsidized private loan agencies, which continue to exact the pound of flesh from our unemployed and distressed citizens who are indebted to them.

The Congress should not adjourn until a national moratorium on home and farm mortgages is enacted. The interest of our distressed citizenry is of paramount importance to that of the loan companies which are using Government machinery to validate their defaulted loans and mortgages.

There are too many untouchables and untaxables in America today, and, in my opinion, they are represented too well in Congress for any relief to be extended to the people under the program thus far advanced.

According to the press reports the senatorial investigation now being conducted on the conduct of America's leading untouchables and untaxables is intended to be squelched or at least not intended to be given publicity. Is it possible that America's untouchables and untaxables are sacrosanct and that their wrongdoings should not and will not be publicized the same as is so freely done in the cases of other gangsters and racketeers?

In my opinion, the fault lies with the administration and the Congress which apparently are more interested in entrenched wealth than they are in the rights of our impoverished and unemployed citizenry. I vision that if Christ came to Congress, he would exercise the lash of scorn as freely with the present Membership as he did with the money changers in the temple. Personally, I am disillusioned, as a Representative of the people, to find such apathy on the part of my colleagues toward the best interest of the masses.

The restoration of purchasing power is of paramount importance. It is vitally essential and effaces entirely the plea of the large financial interests for a continuance of subsidies under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the continued issuance of tax-exempt securities in which the Government guarantees the interest payments.

We are soon to return to our constituents and render an account of our stewardship, and it amuses me to contemplate the alibi which Democratic Members will extend to their constituents on the measure of relief which they should have brought to them. The continued unemployment problem, with little or no visible amelioration through the acts of the special session of Congress, makes it incumbent upon the Representatives to exercise a bit of legerdemain in an effort to hypnotize their constituents into the belief that something effective has been accomplished. The magicians Keller and Houdini are now passed on, but their subtle art of mystification still lives and is born anew, apparently, in the administration efforts which have been blazoned forth with such éclat—far beyond their intrinsic merits. Even though a miracle may be accomplished and a measure of success crown the efforts of the administration in its sincere effort to bring relief to our distressed, there is absolutely no alibi which the administration or a Congressman can advance to his constituents for a continuance of the present unbalanced system of taxation wherein the 5 percent of untouchables in America will continue to be the arch untaxables, while at the same time the great mass of the population, with a small proportion of the wealth, will be called upon to carry the burden of the maintenance of government through an already onerous and too high system of taxation.

The Democratic Party stands upon the theory of equality under the law and equality to all men, but I challenge this theory since, in practice, it is not adhered to by those in national offices who have the power to rectify this disparity but who have failed to do so, and who apparently continue to eat subserviently from the troughs of the untouchables.

The recent disclosures in the Senate and the further disclosures in connection with the purchase of kits for the Civilian Conservation Corps would indicate that honesty as well as efficiency is a lost art in our democracy.

INTERSTATE LIQUIDATIONS—A NATIONAL PROBLEM

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech made by the superintendent of insurance of New York at a meeting of all the insurance experts of the United States in reference to liquidation being a national problem connected with the bill that permits the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to buy preferred stock of insurance companies.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I insert herewith the following address of George S. Van Schaick, superintendent of insurance of the State of New York, at the Sixty-fourth Annual Meeting of the National Convention of Insurance Commissioners, Edgewater Beach Hotel, Chicago, Ill., which should be of interest to the Nation:

All through the depression there has been noted commendable action by insurance companies to improve their condition by the elimination of wasteful and harmful practices. Companies which were most prompt in putting their houses in order generally have come through this long trying period best. The relationship between wasteful and improper practices and the public interest has been repeatedly recognized by this convention.

In the same manner that insurance companies have had occasion to study shortcomings, supervisory officials have noted certain defects in public administrative procedure. Attention has become focused on the liquidation of companies. The public is entitled to high efficiency in the liquidation of insolvent insurance companies. Company failures have been fewer in number than might reasonably have been expected. Those that have occurred clearly demonstrate that methods of liquidation need improvement. How this might be brought about is the subject of this discussion.

It is manifestly impossible to cover the entire subject adequately in one paper. This discussion will be limited to one phase of liquidation and reorganization, namely, the lack of unity in the proceedings taken at the present time upon the failure of an insurance company which has been doing a Nation-wide business, thus needlessly aggravating the tragedy of the failure. This aspect of the subject is chosen for two reasons: First, because the existing lack of coordination between the proceedings in the various States is coming to be a serious condition in and of itself, and second, because this condition may have a direct bearing upon the future of State supervision of insurance.

To provide a background for a better understanding of the defect in the present method of handling insolvent insurance companies it is worth while to classify roughly the outstanding phases in the course of events after a determination has been made to liquidate a company. In the beginning the machinery of liquidation must formally be set in motion. Then comes a preliminary period in which three objects are foremost. It is particularly necessary at this stage to prevent preferences to various individuals, to give information about what has happened and about the existing status of various matters, and to disentangle as far as possible the affairs of third persons. For example, assureds whom the company has been defending under liability policies, must be given opportunity to arrange for their own defenses.

Those having unexpired contracts of insurance should be given warning and opportunity to purchase new insurance.

The third major phase of liquidation is the administration of the assets of the company generally, which consists of ultimately reducing all of its resources to cash. Another important aspect is the determination of claims against the company and includes, among other things, giving of notices, receiving of proofs of claim, and adjudication of claims. Finally, it is necessary to deal with those things which have to do with the distribution of assets.

The setting in motion of the machinery of liquidation customarily consists of an order of receivership in the home State or of a granting of an application by the commissioner of the home State for a statutory proceeding akin to receivership. Regardless of any theory to the contrary, the primary receiver or liquidator has very little authority as such in any other State. The primary court has practically none.

Of late in some cases the primary liquidator has encouraged the prompt commencement of proceedings in other States either through the respective commissioners of such States or by trustworthy creditors. These proceedings, however, are legally distinct and independent from the primary proceeding. Independent reciversship proceedings occasionally are instituted in some of the other States under the auspices of commissioners of insurance. Generally they are sponsored by former employees or by creditors. Such receiverships vary in point of merit. Some deserve high commendation. At the other extreme is a form of receivership in some States in which the moving creditor receives a preference. In the case of the liquidation of one New York company such a receivership by a very large creditor threatens to absorb all of the assets in that particular State. Here, of course, receivership is no better than attachment.

In the balance of the States nothing is done and the affairs of a company are left to drift until the primary liquidator has time to attend to them. Most of those who owe money to the company in such States are able to avoid payment for a considerable length of time and sometimes they never pay. On the other hand, creditors are free to start attachment actions and to otherwise prefer themselves.

The lack of coordination between the various proceedings is clearly apparent in the preliminary stages of the liquidation. To begin with, the files relating to matters in many States may be concentrated in one place, which may or may not be the domicile of the company. It is expensive to segregate these files by States. Yet the various State receivers have no interest in files pertaining to other States. Another difficulty arises when several persons simultaneously seek possession of the same files. In such cases it is likely that no one is in position to answer the legitimate inquiries of those who have an interest in the files. At times the New York superintendent, as local conservator of a foreign company which has failed, has been in possession of files covering most of the eastern part of the country. His helplessness at such times even to make intelligent answers to inquiries has been appalling.

The notices of liquidation, if any, sent out by the various receivers vary markedly. Under the present uncertainty of the relationships between the various proceedings it is at times literally impossible to know what to notify claimants to do in the matter of filing claims.

Several additional difficulties are encountered. There is no uniformity of policy with regard to assisting assureds whom the company was defending under liability policies. The handling of collateral differs widely. At times depositors of collateral in one State find themselves in difficulty because the collateral has been moved to another State. The vagueness of the relationship between the two States makes the return of the collateral uncertain. The employees of a company in some States will have a preferred claim for wages. In other jurisdictions there is no such preference.

The administration of the assets of an insolvent company under the present system is particularly apt to produce conflict between the various receivers. In the case of a creditor receivership the size of the receivers' fees depends upon the amount of assets collected. In the case both of a creditor receivership and one by a commissioner of insurance, each receiver feels obligated to collect as much as possible in order to protect his creditors in the event it is determined that he shall make a local distribution of what he has collected.

In some States title is vested by statute in the liquidator of that State. This solves the asset problem in the home State. However, real estate in a foreign State is not affected. High courts have even indicated that they are not bound by such a statute with regard to personal property within the physical jurisdiction of their respective territories.

A few examples taken at random will show how troublesome this matter may be. A receiver in one State may hold a mortgage on property in another State, and the mortgagor may be in either State or in the third State. Who shall make the collection? One receiver may hold a note payable in another State by a resident of a third State who is temporarily living in a fourth State on a policy taken out and involving business in a fifth State. What receiver is entitled to collect on the note? The debtor of a company on an open account may have property and may be subject to suit in a half dozen or more States. If it involves a substantial amount, each of several receivers may feel himself entitled to it. It is not uncommon for another insurance company doing business all over the country to owe a company in liquidation a substantial amount upon reinsurance likewise scattered countrywide. What receiver may make this collection?

Another situation that comes up occasionally involves a suit by the company in one State which will be a substantial asset in that State, if won, against a defendant who has large claims against a company in other States. A compromise which will be beneficial to the company as a whole may be seriously prejudicial to the interests of the receiver of the first State. What shall the basis of settlement be?

That portion of liquidation which relates to the determination of claims is also productive of controversy between receivers under the present system. Claims against an insurance company, particularly a casualty or surety company, are for the most part unliquidated. Unless there is some general basis for the liquidation of these claims the allowances in the different States will differ considerably.

These variations make it difficult for the courts of one State to recognize without reservation the adjudication by the courts of other States. On the other hand, to require all claimants to come to one State is manifestly a discrimination against those living in distant States who cannot afford the expense involved and as a result are compelled to take whatever is offered to them.

The procedure for handling claims also varies in the different States. In some States the receivers are required to defend all lawsuits brought by claimants rather than to centralize litigation in the receivership proceeding. This offers some advantage to the individual creditors bringing such suits. It similarly penalizes the whole estate and all other creditors by the heavy cost of such defenses. The acceptance of claims filed after the last day set for the filing of claims is another matter in which local practices differ to the necessary disadvantage of the creditors in some States.

In the liquidation of an insurance company more than in any other type of insolvency the problem of contingent claims is present. The law on this subject even in a single jurisdiction is uncertain. That uncertainty is multiplied where the courts of many States are involved. Sometimes the policies of a company are treated as canceled by the order of liquidation in one State at the same time that the courts of another State hold them to be not so canceled.

In the distribution of assets the evils of the present system are also apparent. It is commonly maintained that the general assets collected in any given jurisdiction shall first be applied to claims of (1) those who reside in such jurisdiction, or (2) those whose claims arise in such jurisdiction, or (3) those who have filed their claims in such jurisdiction. The first proposition is plainly unsound. The second proposition is likewise unsound in the case of general assets. The third proposition is unsound where the domiciliary receiver is entitled to public confidence. In addition it always imposes a hardship on creditors. To receive a mathematically correct portion of the estate each general creditor would have to file and prove his claim in every State in which there was a receivership. This is clearly a foolish multiplication of effort.

The laws of some States establish a preference in general assets for claims of certain types, such as claims for wages and claims for compensation. In some jurisdictions claims of the State as a sovereign are preferred. The exact effect of these laws is not clear. The tendency is to deny them any effect outside of the State. It is obvious that the lack of any controlling authority upon this matter contributes measurably to the problem of distribution.

The distribution of special deposits which are trust funds likewise presents opportunity for confusion. Too often there is no coordination between the distribution of the trust funds and the general assets. On the other hand, an effort may be made to withhold dividends from the general funds to those who have shared in a trust deposit. This is of doubtful legality. It is apt to produce costly disputes and litigation.

The possible consequences which will result if this state of affairs remains unchanged are not pleasant to contemplate. It is obvious that public attention must sooner or later be drawn to such a condition. Criticism of insurance supervision seems inevitable, because the public is likely to attribute the evils of liquidation to a lack of adequate supervision in the first place.

It is clear that the basic cause for this defect in our system of liquidation lies in the fact that the State agencies to whom the matter is entrusted do not have sufficiently broad jurisdiction. There is no single system of legal principles, both substantive and procedural, broad enough to supply to every part of the winding up of a company's affairs. Further, there is no central administrative authority.

One word of caution, however, should be given on this score. It is not believed that an insurance liquidation can be efficiently handled entirely from one point without suffering the ill effects of remote control.

A possible solution to the problem may be Federal legislation under the bankruptcy provision of the Constitution of the United States. There is no other method of obtaining a statutory basis for complete uniformity throughout every State in the Union. It must be recognized that uniform State legislation is no more than a Utopian dream.

Insurance companies are presently excepted from the provisions of the National Bankruptcy Act for reasons which are not conclusive. One explanation is that the companies are subject to close State supervision. Another is that the rights of creditors of an insurance company are so complex that the existing machinery of the Bankruptcy Act is not suitable. Recent amendments to the law show a willingness upon the part of Congress to devise special provisions to meet extraordinary conditions. Hence it is not improbable that Congress may at some time in the future consider the advisability of bringing insurance companies within the scope of the bankruptcy act.

Federal legislation under the bankruptcy clause of the Constitution, planned by the Congress in response to the demand of an aroused public, is not likely to be friendly to the interests of State supervision. Legislation proposed and supported by various insurance supervisory officials may well prove to be the solution to this vexing problem.

The broad outlines of such a statute may be rather readily sketched. It would be an amendment to the National Bankruptcy Act following after the recent amendments applying to individuals and railroads. One proposed draft has been worked out along the following lines:

The basic provision of this draft would permit the State supervisory officials at any time to apply to a Federal court within whose jurisdiction a company is domiciled for its liquidation or reorganization. The commissioner of the company's home State might make an individual petition or certain number of commissioners from other States might unite in such a petition.

The court to which such an application should be made would hold a hearing, and in the event of an adjudication would become the primary court fundamentally in charge of the proceeding through the entire United States. The law and practice of such court would prevail throughout the entire proceeding. It would be the court of distribution of all general funds of the company.

Each commissioner would have the right to apply to a Federal court in his State for appointment as ancillary liquidator for such State. If he did not choose to do so the primary liquidator would have authority in such State automatically by operation of law. The duties of the ancillary liquidator would be those of assisting the primary liquidator in a collection of assets and in a determination of local claims. He would also distribute local special deposits and assets in which there were valid local preferences. The expenses of each liquidator would be drawn exclusively from funds collected by him except in extraordinary cases when funds from proceedings in other courts might be available under special order of those courts.

Referees would be chosen from special panels appointed by the judges of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. They should be men professionally fitted to direct an orderly and expeditious handling of the affairs of any proceeding. As under the present bankruptcy system the references would be general in character and would largely dispense with the necessity of appearing before the court.

The preferences in all general assets would be fixed by the statute. This is of great importance in a number of ways. An adequate and yet regulated preference for the wages of employees would apply universally in all States. A uniform preference to workmen's compensation claims would likewise apply throughout every State. Such preference would have a known superiority to claims of the Federal Government. Under the present system this matter is little short of chaotic. There are preferences for compensation claims by statute in half a dozen States. Qualifying bonds are required in others. How far such laws are valid against assets in other States no one knows.

Finally, the claims of the United States of America would receive a preference. It would be a regulated preference amenable to the rest of the law just like other claims. The present Federal preference statute overrides all State laws. In the case of a surety company which is always confronted with contingent claims on bonds to the United States Government amounting to many times the assets of the company, it is not an exaggeration to say that the Federal law literally paralyzes the liquidation of the company and prevents distribution to any claimants, even those holding compensation awards.

The reorganization provisions possible in a Federal law would be particularly useful. Uniformity in the treatment of creditors is particularly important in the case of reorganizations.

Careful study and analysis lead inevitably to the conclusion that such a statute will not constitute a first step toward general Federal supervision of insurance. It would seem to supplement and strengthen rather than encroach upon State supervision.

The chief objection to this proposed solution is that it might be considered to be so controversial that there would be no reasonable prospect of its early adoption.

A less perfect but immediately practical solution of the lack of unity in liquidation would be a positive voluntary program of cooperation under the auspices and guidance of this convention.

It must be frankly admitted that many of the difficulties which have been recited here are entirely beyond the control of the commissioner of insurance. The liquidation of insurance companies with one or two notable exceptions is within the control of the courts. In the case of the exceptions it is regulated by detailed State statutes. The requirements for special deposits and the matters of preference are likewise statutory. Nevertheless the reasons why an insurance company should be liquidated as one unit rather than as an indefinite number of such units are so clear and compelling that many courts will undoubtedly go a long way to surmount ordinary legalistic difficulties if there is a concerted effort upon the part of others similarly situated to conduct the proceeding in an enlightened manner.

The efforts of individual commissioners to tighten the relationships between the various proceedings are insignificant in comparison with what may be done in that direction by the National Convention of Insurance Commissioners. Perhaps brief mention of some of the ways in which it would seem that the convention might function would be appropriate.

The matter would appear to be of sufficient importance at the present time to merit the appointment of a standing committee. To those who have been intimately concerned with liquidation matters during the past year or two, there seems to be a pressing need for a standard form of agreement between domiciliary, or primary, and ancillary receivers. This might well be prepared by such a committee for consideration by this convention.

A written expression of the desirability of cooperation in such form as will be approved by the local court would enable a receiver at times to act in a manner which would otherwise be impossible. Similarly, a form of agreement which is standard and which has the approval of a body of recognized standing would be acceptable at times where an agreement containing the same provisions but enjoying no such prestige would not be entertained.

The convention could also consider with propriety adopting an official attitude upon certain general principles in addition to those embodied in any standard form of agreement. These matters need not be confined strictly to the particular phase of liquidation discussed in this paper. By way of illustration several such principles are suggested:

1. The liquidation of an insurance company should be conducted everywhere under one set of laws, both substantive and procedural.

2. All creditors of the same class, wherever they are, should be treated equally and should share to a proportionate extent in the distribution of assets of the company.

3. On the other hand, when creditors of apparently the same class are in different classes owing to some provision of State law the consequences of this difference should be followed through without any effort to retaliate or to compensate therefor in the liquidation proceeding.

4. The interpretation of any State statute should where possible be left for determination with the courts of the State in question. Unsatisfactory determinations should be appealed rather than nullified in some collateral way.

5. There should be one central distribution of all general assets to all general claimants.

6. Claimants whose claims are contested, however, should have some opportunity for a day in court in the State of their residence, particularly where the claims are small.

7. Claims made both against special trust deposits and generally against the assets of the company should be determined only once.

Much in this paper has been drawn from the experiences of the New York insurance department over the past 2 years in the liquidation and reorganization of companies which were doing business on a country-wide basis. The problems are serious and their solution is difficult. No delusion exists that there is any magic way in which the flood of evil consequences which follow in the wake of the failure of a large insurance company can be stemmed.

It has seemed to the New York department, however, that what is most lacking and what must be supplied is a national point of view to take the place of the prevailing State point of view. Those who handle the winding up of such a company should be able to think of the assets as a whole, of all of the creditors. Otherwise, assets are needlessly wasted and creditors fare unequally.

While the New York superintendent of insurance as liquidator has at times taken positions somewhat inconsistent with this argument, it was not because he approved of such position but because he felt bound to act in the interests of New York creditors as all other receivers were acting for their respective creditors.

No positive preference has been expressed with regard to the alternative methods whereby it is believed this missing essential can be supplied. The one represents perhaps less a break with the past. The other represents a more certain way of attaining the desired end. Perhaps to a certain extent the two are not mutually exclusive.

It is not the purpose of this address to analyze or discuss the merits of Federal versus State supervision of insurance. This much, however, is clear. From the standpoint of State supervision it is imperative that certain existing defects in present methods of liquidation be remedied with all reasonable speed. Unless State insurance supervisors are willing to take the responsibility for bringing about this needed improvement in the liquidation of large insurance companies, and in the reorganization of such companies insofar as it necessarily involves the processes of liquidation, others will probably do so. The problem is one which would seem to demand action by this convention and its individual members in the interest of efficiency, economy, good government, and the well-being of those unfortunately involved in the affairs of delinquent insurance companies.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, the following leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. WARREN, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. PETERSON, for the present, on account of illness of his father.

To Mr. RICHARDSON (at the request of Mr. WALTER), on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. MANSFIELD, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

SENATE ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 1562. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Levy Court of Sussex County, Del., to reconstruct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Deeps Creek at Cherry Tree Landing, Sussex County, Del.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, June 8, 1933, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARING

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS

(Thursday, June 8, 10 a.m.)

The Committee on Ways and Means will hold hearings on H.R. 5888, wine bill, Thursday, June 8, at 10 o'clock a.m. in the Ways and Means Committee room.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII,

Mr. BLAND: Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries. S. 1129. An act to amend sections 361, 392, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, and 412 of title 46 of the United States Code relating to the construction and inspection of boilers, unfired pressure vessels, and the appurtenances thereof; with amendment (Rept. 204). By Mr. PARKER of Georgia: A bill (H.R. 5976) to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon a claim by the Burke County Oil & Fertilizer Co. against the United States arising out of a contract to furnish linters to the United States; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts: A bill (H.R. 5977) for the relief of Catherine Ward; to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

1324. By Mr. BOYLAN: Petition signed by Lilian Randall and 22 other residents of the Fifteenth New York Congressional District, favoring the passage of House bill 3673, a bill to provide equal rights in nationality; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

1325. By Mr. BUCK: Petition of 165 residents of the State of California, urging the United States Senate and the House of Representatives to take such action as is necessary to restore to all service-connected disabled veterans their former benefits, rights, privileges, ratings, schedules, compensation, presumptions, and pensions heretofore enjoyed by them and existent prior to the enactment of the so-called "Economy Act"; to the Committee on Economy.

1326. By Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT: Petition of the disabled American veterans of the World War, through C. Bert Allen, department adjutant-treasurer, Los Angeles, Calif., to restore all former benefits; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

1327. By Mr. FORD: Petition of the California Legislature, memorializing the Congress of the United States to give relief to the distressed oil industry, and thereby to the Nation generally, by immediately levying an adequate tax or tariff upon imported petroleum and its refined products that will enable our domestic oil industry to meet importations of foreign oil and its refined products on a competitive basis as shown by the report of the Tariff Commission; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1328. Also, petition of the Legislature of the State of California, urging the Congress of the United States to immediately enact Senate bill no. 752, introduced by the Honorable HIRAM W. JOHNSON, designed to limit the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States over suits wherein injunctions are sought by public-utility corporations to restrain the enforcement of orders issued by State administrative bodies fixing the rates of public utilities; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1329. By Mr. GRIFFIN: Resolution of Sound View Civic League of New York City, urging early enactment of the home-mortgage relief bill; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

1330. By Mr. KELLER: Petition of the members of the Illinois State Senate, asking that the veterans' hospital at Dwight, Ill., be retained; to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

1331. By Mr. KOPPLEMANN: Petition of the Hardware City Chapter Post, No. 8, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, New Britain, Conn., advising that their organization and every other veterans' organization will give to Members of Congress their support and cooperation to the end that more fair treatment from the Government may be accorded all war veterans; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

1332. By Mr. LINDSAY: Petition of the United States Gypsum Transportation Co., New York City, urging favorable consideration of House bill 4871; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1333. By Mr. LUNDEEN: Petition of Rice County Post, No. 1562, Veterans of Foreign Wars, at Faribault, Minn., opposing any naval appropriation for the United States of America that includes cruisers with less armament than that of 8-inch guns on a parity with Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan; to the Committee on Appropriations.

1334. By Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts: Petition of Post No. 62, the American Legion, Reading, Mass., requesting that the National Economy Act be so amended as to prevent unfair and unjust treatment of disabled war veterans; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

1335. By Mr. RUDD: Petition of the United States Gypsum Transportation Co., New York City, favoring the passage of House bill 4871; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1336. By Mr. WELCH: Senate Joint Resolution No. 24, memorializing Congress to provide relief for the oil industry; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1337. Also, resolution adopted by Nelson A. Miles Camp, No. 10, United Spanish War Veterans, in regard to Public Law No. 2, to maintain the credit of the United States Government as it affects Spanish-American War veterans; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

1338. Also, Senate Joint Resolution No. 23, relative to memorializing Congress in regard to mining claims; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

1339. Also, Senate Joint Resolution No. 26, relative to extension of time by institutions receiving Federal aid or assistance for the payment of certain debts secured by mortgage or deeds of trust; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1340. Also, Senate Joint Resolution No. 16, relative to memorializing Congress to enact legislation providing for the suspension in payment of charges due from Federal reclamation project settlers to the United States, and providing for a loan to the reclamation fund to replace the income thereto thus suspended; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.
